further writ, direction or order restraining the Department from setting off the refund against the tax dues and directing them to hand over the balance of the Official Liquidator.

The High Court held that the demand of Rs. 8,737-12-0 in respect of the assessment year 1948-49, being adjudged and certified, came to have all the incidents and character of an unsecured debt payable by the Official Liquidator to the Department. The High Court observed that

"this claim thereafter was governed by the provisions of the Company law and could be paid to the creditor only in accordance with the provisions of the Company law. No other remedy nor any other method of obtaining satisfaction of this claim was available to the creditor thereafter. It was no longer the amount of tax remaining payable by a person to whom the refund was due within the meaning of Section 49E of the Income Tax Act. In our opinion, therefore, the provision of Section 49E was not available to the Department for setting off the amount of the excess towards the balance of its claim of Rs. 8,737/15/- which the department had proved in the insolvency of the company and was being dealt with in the Insolvency."

The High Court accordingly set aside the orders passed by the Department in so far as they set off the amount of the refund towards the tax remaining payable, and directed the Income Tax Officer to deal with and dispose of the claim of the present respondent for the refund and pass appropriate orders in respect of the said amount of refund under the provisions of s. 48 of the Income-tax Act.

The learned Additional Solicitor-General, on behalf of the appellant, contends that s. 49E gives statutory power to the Income-tax Officer, inter alia, to set off the amount to be refunded or any part of that amount against the tax remaining payable by the person to whom the refund is due, and this statutory power is not subject to any provision of any other law. He says that the Companies Act does not take away this power. Section 49E is in the following terms:

"Where under any of the provisions of this Act, a refund is found to be due to any person the Income-tax Officer, Appellate Assistant Commissioner or Commissioner, as the case may be, may, in lieu of payment of the refund, set off the amount to be refunded, or any part of that amount against the tax, interest or penalty, if any, remaining payable by the person to whom the refund is due."

On the face of this provision, there is no doubt that this section is not subject to any other provision of law. But it will be surprising if this power can be exercised in such a way as to defeat the provisions of the Indian Companies Act. It is not denied by the learned Additional Solicitor-General that the State has no priority in respect of this claim. The question then arises whether s. 49E is subject to the Insolvency Rules contained in the Companies Act. Section 228 of the Companies Act, 1913, provides:

"228. Debts of all descriptions to be proved.—In every winding up (subject in the case of insolvent companies to the application in accordance with the provisions of this Act of the law of insolvency) all debts payable on a contingency, and all claims against the company, present or future, certain or contingent, shall be admissible to proof against the company, a just estimate being made, so far as possible, of the value of such debts or claims as may be subject to any contingency or for some other reason do not bear a certain value."

Section 229 provides:

"Application of insolvency rules in winding up of insolvent companies.—In the winding up of an insolvent company the same rules shall prevail and be observed with regard to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and to debts provable and to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities as are in force for the time being under the law of insolvency with respect to the estates of persons adjudged insolvent; and all persons who in any such case would be entitled to prove for and receive dividends out of the assets of the company may come in under the winding up, and make such claims against the company as they respectively are entitled to by virtue of this section."

The effect of these statutory provisions is, inter alia, that an unsecured creditor must prove his debts and all unsecured debts are to be paid pari passu. Therefore, once the claim of the Department has to be proved and is proved in the liquidation proceedings, the Department cannot by exercising the right under s. 49E of the Income-tax Act get priority over the other unsecured creditors. If we were to read s. 49E in the way suggested by the learned Additional Solicitor-General, it would be defeating the very object underlying ss. 228 and 229 of the Companies Act, 1913. If there is an apparent conflict between two independent provisions of law, the special provision must prevail. Section 49E is a general provision applicable to all assesseees and in all circumstances; ss. 228 and 229 deal with the proof of debts and their payment in liquidation. In our opinion, s. 49E can be reconciled with ss. 228 and 229 by holding that s. 49E applies when insolvency rules do not apply. Accordingly, agreeing with the High Court, we hold that the Income-tax Officer was in error in applying s. 49E and setting off the refund due. The Commissioner was equally in error in affirming this order.

The learned Additional Solicitor-General also urged that the application under art. 226 was misconceived because the Income-tax Officer had jurisdiction. But if we interpret s. 49E as we have done, it is a clear case of lack of jurisdiction. At any rate, there is an error apparent on the face of the orders and the High Court was quite right in exercising its jurisdiction under art. 226.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

—death caused by.

Where there is a balance of probabilities as to whether death is caused by accident or design and there is no clear evidence as to the cause of death, death must be presumed to be accidental. An innocent cause of death must be preferred to a cause which, if accepted, would lead to an inference of crime.

ACCOMPLICE EVIDENCE, corroboration of.

It is not safe to accept the evidence of an accomplice as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused as a piece of evidence lending assurance to the mind of the Court in considering the evidence of the accomplice. There may, however, be exceptional cases where evidence of an accomplice could be taken as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused could be relied on for lending assurance to the mind of the Court. In considering the question as to whether a conviction could be founded on a testimony of the accomplice without corroboration, the latter part of s. 114, ill. (b) of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is relevant.

The word "tenancy" as used in s. 6(iv)(d) of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, relates to tenancy as understood under the ordinary law, which is interest in immovable property, and not to statutory tenancy under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, which is not tenancy of immovable property.

Therefore, a suit by a sub-tenant of the original tenant for a declaration that he is entitled to be the sub-tenant of the landlord on the termination of the tenancy of the head-tenant in view of s. 14 of the Rent Act and for an injunction restraining the landlord from evicting him from the suit premises, is not a suit governed by s. 6(iv)(d) of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959. The appropriate provision applicable to the suit is s. 5(iv)(f) of the Act.

Quære: Whether power of revision given to the Courts of appeal under the Rent Act is only in respect of such decrees or orders in suits or proceedings where the right of appeal is taken away by the provisions of s. 29 of the Act itself and not in respect of those from which no appeal lies under the Civil Procedure Code.

session of assessee's creditor—Goods damaged during subsistence of attachment—Suit against Government by creditor to recover amount of debt secured by pledge whether maintainable.

The defendants, who were constituents of the plaintiff-bank, took advances under an agreement from the plaintiff on the security of certain agricultural produce. A part of the produce was kept in the defendants' godown and the key of the same was handed over to the plaintiff, thus giving the goods in its possession. The defendants owed a sum towards income-tax dues and the Income-tax Officer issued a certificate under s. 46(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and forwarded it to the Collector and by a letter called upon him to make recoveries by attachment and sale of the goods lying in the defendants' godown. The Collector forwarded the letter to the Mamlatdar for taking necessary action. The Circle Officer under order from the Mamlatdar went to the godown and, notwithstanding the plaintiff's protest, attached the goods. During the subsistence of the attachment the goods were badly damaged as a result of rain water leaking through the roof of the godown. The plaintiff filed a suit against the defendants, the State of Bombay, the Collector, the Mamlatdar, the Circle Officer and the Union of India, alleging that the attachment and seizure of goods from its possession was illegal and claimed the amount of the debt secured by the pledge. It was contended inter alia by the Government that it was not responsible for the illegal attachment as it had not ratified the act of officers attaching the goods:—

Held, that crown debt such as e.g. income-tax dues, cannot have priority over secured debts.

that the question of special authorisation or of subsequent ratification did not arise in the circumstances of the case, as the Circle Officer had exercised powers delegated to him under the provisions of law when he proceeded to attach the goods.

that in seizing the goods he had acted in excess of the powers and the seizure of the goods was, therefore, illegal and unconstitutional, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree against all the defendants.

The immunity of the State in respect of the acts of its subordinates in the exercise of its sovereign powers cannot be treated as a dogma or a mantra and will have to be considered on the facts of each case. Immunity cannot be claimed for acts which are either illegal or unconstitutional.

The distinction between rr. 43 and 46 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is of prime importance. When the goods are in possession of a pledgee, the seizure of the goods amounts to wrongful deprivation of the goods which the pledgee is entitled to retain in his possession.

The combined effect of s. 4(2) of the Bombay Paragana and Kulkarni Watans (Abolition) Act, 1950, and s. 70 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, is that the occupancy of land regranted under s. 4(1) of the Act is not liable to be sold or partitioned by execution of an order of a Court. BOMBAY PERSONAL INAMS ABOLITION ACT (Bom. XLII of 1953), S. 5—Inamdar in possession of uncultivated lands on appointed date—Whether such lands will vest in State Government under s. 7.

Section 7 of the Bombay Personal Inams Abolition Act, 1952, does not apply to lands which on the appointed date were in actual possession of the inamdar even if they were uncultivated lands. Therefore, where it is shown that the lands, cultivated or uncultivated, were in possession of the inamdar on the appointed date, the inamdar would become the occupant of such lands under s. 5 of the Act and such lands will not vest in the State Government under s. 7 of the Act.

Section 7 of the Act deals with lands and other properties, which were not in the possession of any person on the appointed date, while s. 5 of the Act makes provision for lands, which on that date were in possession of the inamdar or some other person.

ing police officers under procedure prescribed in Appendix II of Civil Services etc. Rules.

There is no bar under the Bombay Police Act, 1951, or the Rules made thereunder preventing the State Government from ordering a fresh departmental enquiry in connection with charges of misconduct against a police officer in respect whereof he has been exonerated in a prior departmental enquiry.

In matters of departmental action taken by officers authorised under s. 25(2) of the Act for punishment of members of the subordinate ranks, the State Government can at any stage intervene under the power of superintendence reserved to it under s. 4. In those very cases, if it finds it necessary, the State Government can directly for itself proceed to exercise punitive powers and after enquiry inflict necessary punishments. There is no direct provision in the Act providing for ordering of a further fresh enquiry for punishment of members of Police Force in respect of their misconduct. That, however, does not result into a position that there is no jurisdiction in the authorities mentioned in ss. 4 and 25 to order further fresh enquiry when the facts of a particular case warrant such directions.

There is no prescribed procedure binding on the State Government in connection with punitive powers exercised by the State Government under the first part of s. 25 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951.

Act XXII of 1951—Distinction between s. 161, Bombay Police Act and s. 197 of Criminal Procedure Code.*

The accused who were police officials were charged with the duty of proceeding with the investigation in connection with a suspected murder case and they questioned the suspects for that purpose. In order to enable them to carry out this duty, they wrongfully detained these persons and assaulted them for the purpose of extorting statements or confessions in course of that investigation. On the question whether the acts of the accused came within the ambit of s. 161(1) of the Bombay Police Act, 1951:—

Held, that the wrongful acts of detention and assault were committed by the accused in the course of their official duty of investigation and though their impugned acts were not by virtue of their duty and though they were in dereliction of their duty, they were clearly under the cloak of duty within the meaning of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951.

Held further, that the impugned acts were in excess of the accused's duty or authority of questioning the witnesses for the purpose of investigation and consequently their acts would also be covered by the clause "in excess of duty imposed or authority conferred on them," and therefore the acts would come within the ambit of s. 161 of the Act.

BOMBAY PROHIBITION ACT (Bom. XXV of 1949)—Test whether liquid claimed to be liquor is in fact liquor or not—Syke's Hydrometer test whether a reliable test for this purpose.

Syke's Hydrometer test furnishes no data to determine whether a particular liquid is liquor or contains alcohol. Once it is known that a particular liquid contains alcohol, the percentage of alcohol in that liquid may be found by the Hydrometer test. Therefore when the basic question to be determined is whether the liquid does or does not contain alcohol, the Hydrometer test alone is not the proper test to come to any such determination.

BOMBAY PUBLIC TRUSTS ACT, S. 79—(Contd.)

A person who was not a party to the proceedings under the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, but finds that his property is registered as trust property pursuant to the said proceedings, is not precluded under ss. 79 and 80 of the Act from filing a suit for declaration of his title to such property in a Civil Court.

A Hindu widow who had inherited her husband's property donated it to a Jain Mandir by a gift-deed executed in 1945. After her death the plaintiff as one of the reversioners filed a suit for partition and separate possession of his share in the property on the ground that the widow who had a limited estate had no right to donate the property. On the question whether the Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit in view of s. 80 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950:—

Held, that the question for determination in the suit was whether the widow had the authority to create the trust, that the said question was not covered by s. 79 of the Act, and that, therefore, the suit was not barred under s. 80 read with s. 79 of the Act.

Under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, in connection with premises first let after September 1, 1940, the standard rent should be ascertained as regards the land involved by determining fair return on the basis of the market value of the land at the time of the first letting. Even so, it would be open to the Court to consider the circumstance of the landlord having become owner of the land for a much smaller price at anterior date than the date of first letting and as to how the amount of standard rent should be affected because of that circumstance. Therefore before fixing the amount of standard rent the Court is bound to consider all the relevant circumstances of the case.

—S. 11—Standard rent whether to be fixed only by apportionment of rents—"Premises", meaning of word in s. 11(1)(c).

BOMBAY RENTS, HOTEL & LODGING HOUSE RATES CONTROL ACT, S. 11—(Contd.)

Standard rent of a part of a building cannot exceed the standard rent of the whole building and the standard rent of the whole building cannot be more than the total of the standard rents of the different parts. Any investments made by the landlord must be considered and a fair return on such investments must be given to the landlord. If the property is wholly changed then apportionment of rent for different portions becomes a difficult problem. If it has not so changed the Court considers such apportioned rent and all such other circumstances as are brought to the notice of the Court. If no other circumstances are proved before the Court then such apportioned rent is the standard rent.

The word "premises" in s. 11(1)(c) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, is used in the wider sense meaning the whole building of which part was let then or now. The qualifying word "separately let" in s. 5(8)(b) of the Act does not apply to it.

Under s. 13(1)(i) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, "suitable residence" cannot be only for one purpose; it must be suitable for the tenant's reasonable needs. Therefore, in order to decide suitability of residence for the tenant, the Court has to consider the needs of the tenant and his family and consider whether or not the other accommodation that has been acquired by the tenant is suitable for his needs.

A mortgagee in possession cannot be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939.

One of the presumptions in law is that the Legislature does not intend to make any substantial alteration in the law beyond what it explicitly declares, either in express terms or by clear implication, or, in other words, beyond the immediate scope and object of the statute. In all general matters outside those limits the law remains undisturbed. General words and phrases, therefore, however wide and comprehensive they may be in their literal sense, must usually be construed as being limited to the actual objects of the Act.

The petitioner who was a tenant of certain lands made defaults in payment of rent to the opponents-owners for the years 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54. A notice terminating the tenancy was served on the petitioner on December 29, 1954 and on March 23, 1957 the opponents made an application under s. 29 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, for obtaining possession of the lands. The petitioner contended that the opponents' application was time-barred under s. 29(2) of the Act, whereas the opponents contended that as the right to obtain possession of the lands accrued to them on the expiry of the period of notice terminating the tenancy i.e. on March 29, 1955, their application was in time:—

Held, that the period of limitation must be counted from the date on which there were defaults in the payment of rent, that the last default which took place being for the year 1953-54, the last date for pay-that as the application for possession was made more than two years later i.e. on March 23, 1957, it was beyond the period of limitation and was consequently not maintainable. DATTU BALA v. VINAYAKRAO.

Section 33B(5)(a) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, can only apply if the other land is resumed before the application is made under this section. It will have no application if the order under s. 31 of the Act is made after the application under s. 33B was filed, and the landlord will not be deprived of his right to have his application under s. 33B disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the Act. BHAGIRATHIBAI v. —S. 65(1)—Enquiry to be made under s. 65(1) whether should be made only by delegate of State Government himself.

Section 65(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, requires that the State Government and, therefore, its delegate may after making such enquiry as it thinks fit, declare that the management of the land shall be resumed. In what form the enquiry should be held is a matter left entirely in the discretion of the State Government or its delegate. Therefore, where the Dy. Collector is the delegate of the State Government, s. 65(1) of the Act does not require that the Dy. Collector must himself go to the agricultural fields and enquire on the spot whether they are lying fallow. He may, if he so desires, record evidence himself, or the recording of the evidence and the actual inspection on the spot can be left to some subordinate officer.

rent within three months—Whether Tahsildar can further extend time under proviso to s. 30(1) on failure of tenant to pay arrears within time originally fixed.

Under the proviso to s. 30(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch area) Act, 1958, the extended time is permissible to be granted to the defaulting tenant in the very first enquiry contemplated by s. 30(1) of the Act.

The proviso and the main s. 30(1) have to be read together and are part and parcel of the same scheme under which the statute permits the defaulting tenant to get an extended period for payment of arrears of rent, ordinarily as a matter of course for three months, but in case of failure to make payment due to failure of crops or similar calamity, up to a period of one year. This proviso cannot be interpreted as creating a further locum penitentiae without payment of rent merely because an order passed by the Tahsildar under s. 30(1) may come to be made in a year in which there may be failure of crops.

Act XCIX of 1958—Whether tenant entitled to claim restoration of possession from transferee—Applicability of s. 52.*

The word "landlord" in s. 52 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch area) Act, 1958, is restricted to those landlords who had terminated the tenancy under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, and who were in possession of land on the date of the coming into force of the aforesaid Tenancy Act and on the date on which the cause of action for the ex-tenant to claim restoration of possession accrued.

Section 52 of the Tenancy Act postulates a case of the landlord who entered into possession after terminating the tenancy under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act but also continued to hold the ownership of the property as a tenure-holder after the Tenancy Act came into force and was in a position to comply with the provisions thereto; s. 52 cannot apply to a person who lawfully came on land prior to the coming into force of the Tenancy Act. SHAMJI DEOJI v. Seventh Schedule, Provincial Legislative List, entry 48—Whether notice under s. 10(1) of Act XXI of 1947 necessary before proceedings under s. 11(5) can be started against unregistered dealer—Provisions of s. 11(5) whether can be invoked for entire period for which tax liability incurred—Hire-purchase agreement, nature of law to be determined—Terms of option to purchase to buyer and of liberty reserved to him to return goods whether conclusive of nature of transaction—Transactions in substance sales or containing predominant element of sale whether "sale of goods".

A notice under s. 10(1) in Form VI of the C.P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947, is not obligatory in the case of an unregistered dealer before a proceeding for a best judgment assessment can be started against him under s. 11(5) of the Act.

The provisions of s. 11(5) of the C.P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947, can be invoked only for the period or periods of a quarter or quarters which are within three years from the date of the notice issued under this section.

The proper test to determine what the true nature of a hire-purchase agreement is, is to look at the substance of the transaction, the intention of the parties in entering into that transaction, and what it is really intended by them to be. An option to purchase given to the buyer may be indicative that no sale may have been intended by the parties. The mere circumstance that an option to the buyer has been given may not necessarily involve the conclusion that it is not a sale, nor intended to be a sale. What has got to be considered is to consider the terms of the contract including the option which may have been given to the buyer under the terms of the contract and consider what is the real nature of the transaction.

In determining the true nature of a transaction of hire-purchase the term of option given to the hirer and the term of liberty reserved to him to return the goods during the continuance of the contract are terms which have an important bearing in determining the nature of the transaction; but they are not in every case conclusive of the nature of the transaction. They are of great help in determining the true nature of the transaction, but it is on a consideration of the entire terms of the contract read in the light of the surrounding circumstances that the true nature of the transaction has to be determined, and it is possible that even in cases where the option to purchase and the liberty to return the goods are reserved in the contract, the contract in its true nature may still be a contract of sale and not merely a contract of hiring with an option to purchase. It is necessary to see what is the purpose of introducing the terms as to the option to purchase and liberty to return the goods during the subsistence of the contract. If on a consideration of all the terms of the agreement, it is found that these terms have been intended for the benefit of a buyer who has not made up his mind to buy at the time when he entered into the contract, to leave him free to make up his mind at any later stage and have an option of buying or not buying the article and return it to the owner at any time he liked, then the contract will not be an agreement of sale. If, on the other hand, it is clear that the parties to the contract have intended it to be a sale although they have introduced these terms in the working out of the contract for their mutual benefit and convenience, the mere presence of the terms will not destroy the character of the contract between the parties as an agreement to buy and to sell. What is necessary to consider is whether the transaction in substance is a transaction of sale although an element of bailment is added to it, or whether it is a contract of hiring with an added offer to the hirer to buy the hired article at his option.

C.P. & BERAR SALES TAX ACT, S. 10

Transactions which are in substance sales or which contain to a predominant extent an element of sale in them can come within the expression "sale of goods" in entry 48 in the Provincial Legislative List in the Government of India Act, 1935, or entry 54 in the State List in the Constitution of India.

Arts. 226, 32—Decision of High Court on merits on writ petition under art. 226—Whether such decision operates as res judicata in subsequent suit between same parties in respect of same matter—Provisions of s. 11 whether exhaustive—Applicability of general principles of res judicata.*

On the general principle of res judicata, the decision of the High Court on a writ petition under art. 226 of the Constitution of India on the merits on a matter after contest will operate as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit between the same parties with respect to the same matter.

The provisions of s. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, are not exhaustive with respect to an earlier decision operating as res judicata between the same parties on the same matter in controversy in a subsequent regular suit and on the general principle of res judicata, any previous decision on a matter in controversy, decided after full contest or after affording fair opportunity to the parties to prove their case by a Court competent to decide it, will operate as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit. It is not necessary that the Court deciding the matter formerly be competent to decide the subsequent suit or that the former proceeding and the subsequent suit have the same subject-matter. The nature of the former proceeding is immaterial.

Decisions on matters in controversy in writ proceedings under arts. 226 or 32 of the Constitution are not precluded from operating as res judicata in subsequent regular suits on the same matters in controversy between the same parties.

Quære: Whether the principles of constructive res judicata can be invoked by a party to the subsequent suit on the ground that a matter which might or ought to have been raised in the earlier proceeding was not so raised therein.

The distinction between rr. 43 and 46 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is of prime importance. When the goods are in possession of a pledgee, the seizure of the goods amounts to a wrongful deprivation of the goods which the pledgee is entitled to retain in his possession.

A suit filed under O. XXI, 103, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, by a person who has obtained possession of the property on the basis of a contract of sale for protecting that possession is maintainable on the basis of the doctrine of part performance under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, inasmuch as such a suit is essentially of a defensive character.

Such a suit, however, is not maintainable against an auction purchaser of the same property, as the latter is not a person claiming under the transferor within the meaning of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Express provision is made by O. XXXVII, r. 4, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, for setting aside a decree passed under O. A proceeding which is initiated by filing a winding-up petition for realising a debt due to a creditor of the company is a proceeding for realization of the property within O. XL, r. 1(1)(d) of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

A Court Receiver appointed in a partition suit who has assumed management and administration of the entire joint family property can file a winding-up petition in his own name in respect of a debt due from the company to the members of the joint family. In such a case under ss. 434 and 439 of the Companies Act, 1956, read with O. XL, r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, the Court Receiver would be a creditor of the Company.

Section 434 of the Companies Act, 1956, does not require that a notice issued under it by a creditor should make a demand upon the debtor to make payment of the debt to himself. It is competent for the creditor to direct his debtor to make payment to a third party under such notice.

COMPANIES ACT (1 of 1956), S. 17—Application for confirmation of alteration in objects of company involving new departure from existing business—Whether Court can refuse confirmation—Present desire to carry on new business in near future whether essential for such confirmation.

Under s. 17 of the Companies Act, 1956, the additional business proposed to be carried on by a company in respect of which confirmation from the Court is sought may involve a new departure from its existing business. The additional business may be one which is different from the original business, but that by itself is not a sufficient ground to refuse confirmation. What the Court has to consider is whether the additional business is destructive of or inconsistent with the existing business. If it is not so, then it may very well be capable of being conveniently and advantageously combined with the existing businesses of the company.

Unless there is a present desire on the part of the company to carry on the new business in the near future, the Court cannot grant the application for confirmation of alteration in the objects of the company.

In the exercise of jurisdiction under s. 17 of the Act, the Court should not overlook the fact that it is for the shareholders to decide what business should be carried on by the company and it is not for the Court to tell the company what business it should carry on and how it should be carried on.

ART. 235—*General Clauses Act (X of 1897), Sec. 16—Government of India Act, 1935 [25 & 26 Geo. 5, Ch. 42], Secs. 253, 254, 255—Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. Appendix 1. Under the Constitution of India the disciplinary jurisdiction over District Judges and Judges subordinate to them vests exclusively in the High Court except making an order of dismissal or removal. The decision in the matter of starting a departmental enquiry or action for misconduct against a District Judge or a Judge subordinate to a District Judge vests exclusively with the High Court. The power of dismissal and removal of District Judges and Judges subordinate to District Judges vests in the Governor. Thus exercise of the aforesaid power of dismissal and removal of District Judges by the Governor has to be in consultation with the High Court.

Where on preliminary investigation the High Court comes to the conclusion that the probable consequence of the charges against a judicial officer being proved would be one of dismissal or removal of the judicial officer, the course that should be adopted would be to refer the matter to the Governor recommending appointment of an enquiry officer which is the first stage of giving a reasonable opportunity to a public servant.

The power conferred on the Governor by art. 233 read with art. 310 of the Constitution and s. 16 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, to dismiss or suspend a civil servant has to be exercised in the same manner as the power of appointment under art. 233 is to be exercised, that is, in consultation with the High Court.

The observations of the High Court made on the report of the Enquiry Officer appointed by the Governor on the recommendation of the High Court to hold a departmental inquiry on a charge of corruption against a civil servant and also the observations of the High Court on the cause shown by the civil servant form part of the consultation provided for in art. 233, and the civil servant cannot make a grievance for non-disclosure of these observations to him. Such observations do not form part of the evidence which goes to establish his guilt or innocence.

The observations of the High Court would be a privileged document and, therefore, no complaint can be made of non-disclosure of that document.

Where the original order of dismissal itself is passed by the Governor there can be no appeal to the Governor against his own order under r. 57 of the Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules.

The authority which is enjoined with a duty to act in a quasi judicial manner must disclose to the person against whom action has been taken material which is in the nature of evidence on the acceptance or rejection of which turns the decision as to the guilt or innocence of the person against whom an enquiry is held or against whom an action is being taken. Evidence tendered to establish a case must not be received behind the back of the person inasmuch as that would result in denial of an opportunity to that person of rebutting that evidence.

When the validity of an act, rule, regulation or order made by an executive authority, to which the power has been delegated by legislation, is challenged, then, it is open to the Court to see whether the act done by the delegated authority has any connection with securing or realisation of the purposes for which the power has been conferred on the delegated authority.

In considering the degree or nature of such connection required to be established the tests laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court that the connection must be "real and proximate and not far-fetched or problematical" and by the Privy Council that the connection should be "capable of being related to the authorised purposes", are not of general application. One of the presumptions in law is that the Legislature does not intend to make any substantial alteration in the law beyond what it explicitly declares, either in express terms or by clear implication, or, in other words, beyond the immediate scope and object of the statute. In all general matters outside those limits the law remains undisturbed. General words and phrases, therefore, however wide and comprehensive they may be in their literal sense, must usually be construed as being limited to the actual objects of the Act.

testing the validity of legislation.

(Per Naik J): There are two rival tests, one for testing the validity of a legislation passed by a Legislature whose powers have been defined and limited under the Constitution as also a legislation which makes an encroachment or an invasion upon the fundamental rights of the citizens. In judging the validity of a legislation which encroaches upon the legislative functions of another legislative body or which invades upon the fundamental rights of the citizens the test which must be followed is the test of direct, proximate and intimate nexus between the exercise of the powers and the authority conferred upon the Legislature. In a matter of this nature, the Court is the sole judge to decide as to whether the powers have been exceeded. Another, in the case of a delegated legislation where there is no inherent lack of jurisdiction in the parent body which delegates the power and where the delegate has been given wide discretion in choosing the topic. In the latter case the test that will have to be invoked is whether the exercise of legislative authority is wholly unrelated to the purpose or is not capable of being connected to the purposes for which it is meant to be exercised.

The principle that should be applied in testing the validity of the Rules framed on the authority of a section which is as widely worded as s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, is the principle enunciated by the Privy Council in Attorney General for Canada's case (1952 A.C. 427). When wide powers have been conferred upon the Central Government and when the Central Government have been given the right to choose the topic in respect of which legislation is to be framed, the principle that would hold good would be the principle whether the Rules framed are capable of being connected with the purposes for which they were intended. It is not the direct, proximate and intimate connection that should be insisted upon, but some connection which would correlate the Rules with the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) or with the matters enumerated in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962.

While construing a statutory provision the Court must give the words used their ordinary grammatical meaning. A word may take colour from the context, and in the setting in which it is used may have a wider or narrower meaning. The words must be construed, therefore, with due regard to the context, the circumstances under which the same came to be enacted and the mischief that was intended to be prevented.

67 Bom. L.R. 702.

CONTEMPT OF COURT—Contempt by defendant appearing in person—Defendant at hearing threatening plaintiff's advocate with prosecution for defamation for statements made by advocate at hearing—Whether such threat amounts to contempt of Court.

In the course of the hearing of a case in Court the defendant, who appeared in person, gave a threat to the plaintiff's advocate suggesting that prosecution for defamation would be launched against him in respect of statements made by him against the defendant which were supported by unimpeachable evidence. One prosecution for defamation for similar statements was launched by the defendant against the advocate before the threat was administered and a second prosecution for defamation against the advocate for statements made by the advocate in the aforesaid litigation was subsequently started by the defendant. On the question whether the threat held out by the defendant amounted to contempt of Court:—

Held, that the threat held out by the defendant was intended to operate upon the mind of the advocate so that he should flinch from performing his duties towards his client, the plaintiff, and that, therefore, it amounted to contempt of Court.

A piece of conduct intended or calculated to bring pressure upon a party, which must necessarily include his advocate, not to pursue the matter according to his choice, would amount to an attempt to interfere with the administration of justice. The threat need not be direct in the sense that the contemner specifically asserted that he would take such action. It is sufficient if the context showed that the action contemplated was the action of the contemner himself.

The question as to whether the words amounted to a threat is not of the essence of the matter. What is of the essence of the matter is the course of conduct adopted by the contemner, and if, on the whole, the conduct has a tendency to interfere with the course of administration of justice or subvert the course of justice it would amount to contempt of Court. The nexus between the threat and the demand for doing something or refraining from doing something need not be express or need be expressly stated. It is enough if from the context the link between the two is apparent.

COURT, discretion of, in ordering production of document or thing.

Section 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, confers no right upon any party to a criminal proceeding to obtain production of any document or thing. The provisions of the section can be invoked at any stage of any investigation, inquiry or trial and they confer discretion upon the Court enabling it to order production of any document or thing. Before the Court exercises its discretion and orders the production of any document or thing under this section, it must satisfy itself that such production of the document or thing is either necessary or desirable for the purpose of the trial and in deciding that question the Court has to exercise its discretion judicially, in the sense that it must satisfy itself that the document or the thing has a bearing upon and is relevant to the case. While deciding whether production of a document or a thing is necessary or desirable or not, the Court must take into consideration the aspect of the relevancy of such document to the issues involved in the case but that is not the only consideration which would guide the Court for ordering production. Everything that is relevant to the facts in issue may not necessarily be either necessary or desirable for the purpose of a trial. Therefore, the relevancy of a statement or document or thing of which production is sought would be one of the considerations which the Court will have to take into account, while deciding the question of the necessity or desirability of production of such statement, document or thing. Before ordering production of any such statement, document or thing the Court might consider whether such statement, document or thing is being suppressed or might be tampered with or destroyed by the party in whose possession it is or might be lost altogether or whether it would come before it in a normal way without resorting to the compelling processes contained in s. 94 or 96 of Chapter VII of the Code. These considerations would also weigh with the Court in exercising its judicial discretion while deciding the question whether the production of a document or a thing is either necessary or desirable for the purposes of an inquiry or trial.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE CODE (Act V of 1908), S. 94.

Section 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, confers no right upon any party to a criminal proceeding to obtain production of any document or thing. The provisions of the section can be invoked at any stage of any investigation, inquiry or trial and they confer discretion upon the Court enabling it to order production of any document or thing. Before the Court exercises its discretion and orders the production of any document or thing under this section, it must

———S. 173(4)—Accused in warrant case upon private complaint—Whether accused entitled to copies of statements and documents on which prosecution going to rely—Whether such copies to be made available on principles analogous to s. 173(4)—Prosecution witness's name disclosed after framing of charge—Maintainability of accused's application for reasonable time to prepare cross-examination of such witness—Permissibility of accused's request for roving discovery of all materials collected by prosecution during investigation—Court under s. 94 how should decide question of necessity or desirability of production of documents or thing.

Section 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, is applicable only to those cases in which the investigation has been made by a police officer and that too under Chapter XIV of the Code. Therefore, an accused person against whom a warrant case has been launched on the basis of a private complaint is not entitled as a matter of right to get copies of all the statements of witnesses whom the prosecution is going to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution is going to rely at or before the commencement of the inquiry or the trial against him. Copies of such statements and documents cannot also be made available to the accused on principles analogous to the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Code.

In a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint if the prosecution examines any important witness whose name has been disclosed for the first time after the charge was framed and if such witness gives out a long drawn out or complicated narration, it would be open to the Magistrate to entertain or grant a request for reasonable time on the part of the accused to enable him to prepare for cross-examination of such witness.

Where in such a case an offer was made by the prosecution before the Magistrate that copies of the previous statements of all witnesses who would be examined—either before a charge was framed or thereafter—would be furnished to the accused as and when the examination-in-chief of each of such witnesses was over and the documents on which the prosecution were going to rely as and when they would be tendered in evidence, Held, that such an offer met the ends of justice and fair trial.

A request made by an accused in a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint for roving discovery or fishing inspection of all the materials collected by the prosecution during investigation, irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to make use of such materials at the trial or not, on the ground that a study of such materials might be helpful to the accused in the preparation of his defence cannot be granted.

Section 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, confers no right upon any party to a criminal proceeding to obtain production of any document or thing. The provisions of the section can be invoked at any stage of any investigation, inquiry or trial and they confer discretion upon the Court enabling it to order production of any document or thing. trate can proceed against person whose name not mentioned in complaint.

A person becomes an accused person only when a process is issued against him by a Magistrate. It is only such an accused who is incompetent to depose at the trial against his other co-accused in absence of any conditional grant of pardon under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, by a competent authority, or withdrawal of the prosecution case against him under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code and after a formal order of discharge or acquittal having been recorded by a Magistrate in that respect. A person over whom the Magistrate does not exercise jurisdiction by issuing a process against him is a competent witness against his accomplice. There is no legal bar to the admissibility of his evidence.

It is not obligatory on a police officer to forward to a Magistrate each and every person who might be guilty of having committed an offence. A discretion has been given to him in this matter. Sections 169 and 170 of the Criminal Procedure Code read together make it clear that on completion of the investigation, the investigating officer has to consider whether there is "sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify the forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate to stand his trial." If he comes to the conclusion that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground to justify the forwarding of the accused then s. 170 makes it obligatory on him to forward him to a Magistrate and not otherwise.

Similarly, when an accused is forwarded to a Magistrate, and the Magistrate has taken cognizance of an offence, it is not obligatory on the Magistrate to issue process against each and every person, shown to be an accused, and forward him for trial. But, on the other hand, under the provisions of s. 204 the Magistrate has, at that stage, before issuing process, to apply his mind and, it is only if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding against the person on the material placed before him, he has to issue a process.

A mere admission of guilt or confession during the investigation of an offence does not necessarily amount to sufficient evidence within the meaning of s. 170 of the Criminal Procedure Code, requiring the Police Officer to forward an accused person to a Magistrate; neither such admission or confession necessarily amounts to a sufficient ground for proceeding against him within the meaning of s. 204 of the Code.

When a complaint is made by a Customs Officer under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, it is open to the Magistrate before whom the complaint is lodged, to proceed against a person against whom in his opinion there is sufficient material on record, even if his name is not mentioned as an accused in the complaint filed by the Customs Officer.

A wife living separate from her husband on the ground that her husband has contracted marriage with another wife, is entitled to maintenance under s. 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

The proper approach to the case of such a husband's offer to maintain on condition of his wife's living with him, whether made before the issue of any order under s. 488(1) of the Code, or, after the issue of the order under s. 488(3) of the Code, would be to hold that there was no valid offer by the husband to maintain his wife. And, if there was no such offer, it must be held in view of the contest raised to the claim that there had been either neglect or refusal to maintain the wife within the meaning of s. 488(1) of the Code.

Desertion by the wife at some anterior date is not made a ground under s. 488 of the Code for disallowing maintenance. It is her refusal to go back to her husband, when a genuine offer is made which disentitles her to maintenance.

The marriage referred to in the explanation to the proviso under s. 488(3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, may have been contracted at any time and will refer to the first as well as the second marriage.

The rule of Damdupat does not apply with respect to the interest adjudged payable by a trustee on his committing breach of trust with respect to the trust funds in his hands.

Though a trustee who has custody of trust funds, has a pecuniary liability to make good those funds if he has used them and may, on the basis of such a liability, be said to be a debtor of a trust, yet he, as an individual, is not a borrower of the funds from the trust and cannot be said to have taken a loan from himself as a trustee in charge of the trust funds. His liability to pay interest, when ordered by the Court on equitable grounds, does not come within the provisions dealing with interest in Hindu Law, as mentioned in Colebrooke's Digest.

When a trustee in breach of his duty retains the trust money in his own hands uninvested or mixes it with his own money or property he is liable to pay interest on it. There is no fixed rate of interest which a trustee is liable to pay but in general he is charged simple interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

DEFENCE OF INDIA RULES, 1962 [PART XIIA, GOLD CONTROL], RULES 126A-126Z—Defence of India Act (51 of 1962), Secs. 3, 44—Constitution of India, Arts. 25, 26—Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), Sec. 123(2)—Rules 126A-126Z whether ultra vires rule making power of Central Government—Relation inter se between s. 3(1) and 3(2) of Defence of India Act—Connection between rules framed and purposes prescribed under parent Act, nature of—Expression "authority" in s. 44 whether includes Central Government—Construction of statute—Circumstances in which enactment passed whether could be considered by Court.

Rules 126A to 126Z of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, are not ultra vires the rule making power of the Central Government and are not a colourable piece of legislation in the sense that they have been framed for some purpose other than the prescribed purposes in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962.

Per Tambe J. No additional or independent rule making authority or power is conferred on the Central Government in any of the clauses of s. 3(2) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. Therefore, the limitation imposed in s. 3(1) of the Act will be equally applicable and govern the rule making power of the Central Government relating to the subjects mentioned in clauses 1 to 57 of s. 3(2) of the Act. The power of the Central Government to make rules on any of those subjects is exercisable only for securing the purposes authorised by s. 3(1), in the event the Central Government forms an opinion that it was necessary or expedient for it to do so.

The connection that is required to be established between the rules framed and the purposes prescribed under s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962, must be one which is real and not far-fetched, problematical, hypothetical or too remote. It need not necessarily be proximate. Therefore, rules which would, if observed, serve to promote one or more of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Act will be within the rule making power conferred on the Central Government thereunder.

DEFENCE OF INDIA RULES, 1962
[PART XIII. GOLD CONTROL] RULES
126A-126Z—(Contd.)

When validity of an act, rule, regulation or order made by an executive authority, to which the power has been delegated by the legislation, is challenged, then, it is open to the Court to see whether the act done by the delegated authority has any connection with securing or realization of the purposes for which the power has been conferred on the delegated authority.

In considering the degree or nature of such connection required to be established the tests laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court that the connection must be "real and proximate and not far-fetched or problematical" and by the Privy Council that the connection should be "capable of being related to the authorised purposes", are not of general application. The tests laid down are in the context of the contents of the relevant legislative power which their Lordships were considering in each case.

The circumstances in which an enactment has been passed is a relevant circumstance from which assistance could be sought by Court. Therefore, it is permissible for the Court to ascertain the conditions prevailing which caused the mischief to cure which the enactment was directed.

The expression "authority" in s. 44 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, does not include the Central Government, nor does s. 44 impose any fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government, but is directive relating to administrative or executive acts performed by any person or authority in execution of the powers delegated to them by the Central Government.

Per Naik J. There is no conflict between sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. The clauses listed in s. 3(2) are mere elaboration of what is stated in a general way in s. 3(1). These clauses make explicit what is implicit in s. 3(1). The clauses are 'statutory definitions' and would stand by themselves, unless there is any ambiguity about any of them.

There are two rival tests, one for testing the validity of a legislation passed by a Legislature whose powers have been defined and limited under the Constitution as also a legislation which makes an encroachment or an invasion upon the fundamental rights of the citizens. In judging the validity of a legislation which encroaches upon the legislative functions of another legislative body or which invades upon the fundamental rights of the citizens, the test which must be followed is the test of direct, proximate and intimate nexus between the exercise of the powers and the authority conferred upon the Legislature. In a matter of this nature, the Court is the sole judge to decide as to whether the powers have been exceeded. Another, in the case of a delegated legislation where there is no inherent lack of jurisdiction in the parent body which delegates the power and where the delegate has been given wide discretion in choosing the topic. In the latter case, the test that will have to be invoked is whether the exercise of the legislative authority is wholly unrelated to the purpose or is not capable of being connected to the purposes for which it is meant to be exercised.

[PART XIII. GOLD CONTROL] RULES

The principle that should be applied in testing the validity of the Rules framed on the authority of a section which is as widely worded as s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, is the principle enunciated by the Privy Council in Attorney General for Canada's case (1952 A.C. 427). When wide powers have been conferred upon the Central Government and when the Central Government has been given the right to choose the topic in respect of which legislation is to be framed, the principle that would hold good would be the principle whether the Rules framed are capable of being connected with the purposes for which they are intended. It is not the direct, proximate and intimate connection that should be insisted upon, but some connection which would correlate the Rules with the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) or with the matters enumerated in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. Therefore, the Court can set aside the Rules if on the face of them, the Rules appear to be wholly unrelated or if it is found on examination that they are not capable of being related to any of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Act.

Any step or proceeding including a Search Authorization taken under rule 126L of the Defence of India Rules, 1962 (Part XIII. Gold Control), is of an exploratory nature for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of the Rules has been committed or not and is not a step or proceeding amounting to an accusation of an offence.

In a Search Authorization issued under r. 126L of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, the mere use of the present tense to the effect "that gold... is secreted" and the further fact that the same was authorised to be seized, will not convert the Search Authorization into any accusation of an offence.

The penal provisions of rule 126P(1) (ii) of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, will be attracted if a person fails to furnish information by omitting to make statements when he is interrogated by the officer concerned under r. 126L(4) of the Rules.

DISCRETION AND DISCRIMINATION, comparison between.

A discretion given under a law, however wide it may be, cannot necessarily be equated with discrimination, and in so far as there is a possibility of the misuse of a discretion the normal presumption of law is that the authority invested with a discretionary power will act fairly and honestly and not abuse it. If it does however abuse it in a given case, that is an indication of human frailty rather than the power being discriminatory.

The notification issued by the Government of Bombay on February 9, 1953, under s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, before its amendment, was actually and factually in force on the date on which s. 33 as amended by the Indian Electricity (Amendment) Act, 1959, came into force.

The notification to the extent that it requires notice to be given regarding the particulars mentioned therein must be considered to be an absolute requirement which must be complied with. But to the extent to which it says that it must be in writing, it must be treated to be directory and not absolute. Substantial compliance with the requirement of notice, if proved, must be treated as sufficient compliance for the purpose of s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910.

The expression “unless it is otherwise expressly provided” in s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, means that the notifications, rules, etc. under the repealed Act shall continue in force provided they are not inconsistent with the re-enacted provision, unless there is an express provision in the re-enacted legislation to the effect that they shall not so continue in force.

An officer of the Central Excise Department is not a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, for all purposes, though he may be such a police officer so far as he conducts an investigation in respect of offences under the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944. Therefore, an Excise officer while discharging his duties under the Sea Customs Act, 1878, is not a police officer within s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Confession recorded by an officer of the Central Excise Department while enquiring into a case falling under the Sea Customs Act, 1878, under which latter Act he is also appointed an officer, cannot be said to be made to a police officer and is, therefore, not hit by the provisions of s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Under s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, it is open to the Central Government to adopt any mode of appointment of officers of customs. It may make a general order of appointment by issuing a notification, or it may make appointment by issuing an order individually appointing any individual person named in the order to be an officer.

Section 24 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, contemplates that the threat referred to therein must emanate from the person in authority. Therefore, where a person in authority before recording the confession of an accused merely explains to him the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, the confession is not hit by the provisions of s. 24 of the Indian Evidence Act as it cannot be said to have been obtained by a threat within the meaning of s. 24. Further, in merely explaining the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act to the accused making the confession there is no threat given by the person in authority recording the confession which could have raised any hope in the mind of the accused or led him to suppose that he was to gain any advantage in reference to the proceeding against him relating to the offence of smuggling.

Section 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, does not contemplate the service of a summons as a condition precedent enabling the Customs Officer to record the statement under s. 171A of the Act.

It is not safe to accept the evidence of an accomplice as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused as a piece of evidence lending assurance to the mind of the Court in considering the evidence of the accomplice. There may, however, be exceptional cases where evidence of an accomplice could be taken as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused could be relied on for lending assurance to the mind of the Court. In considering the question as to whether a conviction could be founded on a testimony of the accomplice without corroboration, the latter part of s. 114, ill (b) of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is relevant.

A person examined under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, does not stand in the character of an accused person inasmuch as there is no formal accusation made against him by any person at that time. The fact that subsequent to the making of the statement he becomes an accused person is not sufficient to bring the statement within the mischief of art. 20(3) of the Constitution of India.

There is no provision in the Sea Customs Act, 1878, requiring the Customs officer to maintain any diary.

JAGANNATH SONU v. STATE.

—S. 8(1)—Defence of India Rules 1962. Rule 141—Mens rea whether an essential ingredient in respect of offence under s. 23(1-A)—Publication of rules of statute, what constitutes—Whether necessary for Indian law to be published outside country to operate in Indian territory—"Cargo", term used in Reserve Bank notification of November 8, 1962, connotation of.

Under s. 8(1) read with s. 24(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, there is no scope for the invocation of the rule (of mens rea) that besides the mere act of voluntarily bringing gold into India any further mental condition is postulated as necessary to constitute an offence of the contravention referred to in s. 23(1-A) of the Act.

The very concept of "bringing" or "sending" would exclude an involuntary bringing or an involuntary sending. Thus, if without the knowledge of a person a packet of gold is slipped into his pocket it is possible to accept the contention that such a person did not "bring" the gold into India within the meaning of s. 8(1) of the Act. Similar considerations would apply to a case where the aircraft on a through flight which did not include any landing in India has to make a forced landing in India—owing say to engine trouble.

Where there is a statutory requirement as to the mode or form of publication and they are such that, in the circumstances, the Court holds to be mandatory, a failure to comply with those requirements might result in there being no effective order the contravention of which could be the subject of prosecution but where there is no statutory requirement the rule is that it is necessary that it should be published in the usual form i.e., by publication within the country in such media as is generally adopted to notify to all the persons concerned the making of the rules.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE REGULATION ACT, S. 8(1)—(Contd.)

In most of the Indian statutes, including the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, there is provision for the rules made being published in the Official Gazette. Therefore, publication in the Gazette of India is the ordinary mode of bringing a rule or subordinate legislation to the notice of the persons concerned.

For an Indian law to operate and be effective in the territory where it operates viz., the territory of India, it is not necessary that it should either be published or be made known outside the country.

The knowledge of the existence or content of a law by an individual will not always be relevant, save on the question of the sentence to be imposed for its violation.

The term "cargo" occurring in the notification of the Reserve Bank of India published on November 8, 1962, is used as contra-distinguished from personal luggage in the law relating to the carriage of goods, the latter meaning as whatever a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, either with reference to his immediate necessities or for his personal needs at the ends of his journey.

Per Subba Rao J. It is a well settled principle of common law that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a criminal offence. A statute can exclude that element, but it is a sound rule of construction adopted in England and also accepted in India to construe a statutory provision creating an offence in conformity with the common law rather than against it unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication excludes mens rea. There is a presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a statutory offence; but this may be rebutted by the express words of a statute creating the offence or by necessary implication. But the mere fact that the object of a statute is to protect welfare activities or to eradicate grave social evils is in itself not decisive of the question whether the element of guilty mind is excluded from the ingredients of the offence. It is also necessary to enquire whether a statute by putting a person under strict liability help him to assist the State in the enforcement of the law; can he do anything to promote the observance of the law? A person who does not know that gold cannot be brought into India without a licence or is not bringing into India any gold at all cannot possibly do anything to promote the observance of the law. Mens rea by necessary implication can be excluded from a statute only where it is absolutely clear that the implementation of the object of a statute would otherwise be defeated and its exclusion enables those put under strict liability by their act or omission to assist the promotion of the law. The nature of mens rea that will be implied in a statute creating an offence depends upon the object of the Act and the provisions thereof.

Under a deed of settlement executed in 1958 the wife of the settlor-assessee acquired the beneficial interest to receive interest and income of the trust fund during her life-time. Thereafter the property was to go to his children and others as provided in the deed. On the question whether the assessee was entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Gift-tax Act, 1958, to the extent of the value of the gift to his wife if any:—

Held, that by creating the settlement the assessee had transferred interest in the trust fund to his wife and as it was voluntary and without consideration it was a gift of an interest in the trust fund, and that the assessee was entitled to the exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act to the extent of the value of the gift to his wife as ascertained in accordance with s. 6 of the Act and the rules framed under s. 6(3).

When a larger relief is claimed by the assessee before the Tribunal on the strength of a certain provision of law, he is not prevented from arguing in a reference that he is entitled to a lesser relief under the same provision of law on the ground that the claim for a smaller relief is not one arising out of the order of the Tribunal.

The expression "charitable purpose" in s. 5(1)(vi) of the Gift Tax Act, 1958, includes "religious purpose".

Presumption as to the change of intention on the part of the Legislature on account of the variation in language between an earlier Act and a later Act is of the slightest weight especially when the omission of certain words in the later Act is of words, which were more or less superfluous in the earlier Act. In such cases the omission of words cannot necessarily be said to be indicative of a change of intention on the part of the Legislature. HIGH COURT—(Contd.)

Judges subordinate to them vests exclusively in the High Court except making an order of dismissal or removal. The decision in the matter of starting a departmental enquiry or action for misconduct against a District Judge or a Judge subordinate to a District Judge vests exclusively with the High Court. The power of dismissal and removal of District Judges and Judges subordinate to District Judges vests in the Governor. The exercise of the aforesaid power of dismissal and removal of District Judges by the Governor has to be in consultation with the High Court.

Where on preliminary investigation the High Court comes to the conclusion that the probable consequence of the charges against a judicial officer being proved would be one of dismissal or removal of the judicial officer, the course that should be adopted would be to refer the matter to the Governor recommending appointment of an enquiry officer which is the first stage of giving a reasonable opportunity to a public servant.

The observations of the High Court made on the report of the Enquiry Officer appointed by the Governor on the recommendation of the High Court to hold a departmental inquiry on a charge of corruption against a civil servant and also the observations of the High Court on the cause shown by the civil servant form part of the consultation provided for in art. 233, and the civil servant cannot make a grievance for non-disclosure of these observations to him. Such observations do not form part of the evidence which goes to establish his guilt or innocence.

HINDU ADOPTIONS AND MAINTENANCE ACT (LXXVIII of 1956), S. 11(vi)—Widow adopting a son—Whether adoptee adopted son of deceased husband.

Under ss. 11(vi) and 12 of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, the necessary consequence of a widow adopting a son would be that the adoptee would be the adopted son of the deceased husband.

The true effect of these provisions of the Act is that, when either of the spouses adopts a child, all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth become completely severed, and these are all replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. This would be so for each and all different purposes. Therefore, the result of adoption by either spouses is that the adoptive child becomes child of both spouses.

In a petition for judicial separation under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, on the ground of cruelty the defence of insanity is not available even if the offending spouse is not capable of knowing what he is doing if the conduct is held to be objectively cruel regardless of motive or intention.

The petitioner filed a petition under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, for judicial separation on the ground inter alia that the respondent, her husband, had treated her with such cruelty as to cause reasonable apprehension in her mind that it was harmful for her to live with the respondent. It was found at the trial that the respondent had to be sent on three different occasions to a mental hospital for treatment, the last of which was necessitated as he had attempted to strangle his minor son and his brother-in-law. It was also established that he was suffering from schizophrenia and that he was not aware of the acts he was committing. The respondent's defence was that whatever he did, he did under fits of insanity:—

Held, that the schizophrenia from which the respondent had a predilection to suffer periodically was no defence to the plea of cruelty put forward by the petitioner; that the question whether the respondent was capable of forming an intention to be cruel or actually intended to be cruel was a matter of no consequence in this case; and that as there was no knowing when the respondent would relapse into a fit of schizophrenia, the apprehensions entertained by the petitioner were well-founded and she was, therefore, entitled to a decree for judicial separation.

In s. 14(1) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, the word "possessed" means the state of "owning and having a disposing power" i.e. a right in the property which is capable of enjoyment whenever the widow wills so to do.

A Hindu widow who has interest in the joint family property which she got on her husband's death can be said to have possession of the property within the meaning of that phrase in s. 14(1) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. It is not necessary under that section that she should reduce her share to possession either by actual partition or even by asking for partition.

In the case of members of a joint family even if a member has gone out for a considerable length of time and has not enjoyed the benefit of the property his rights in the property are not lost. In order that adverse title can be prescribed ouster must be proved.

The Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, is not a tenancy legislation and, therefore, the exception in s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, does not apply to it.

Under s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, the ordinary law of inheritance, survivorship or bequest operates. If a holder is governed by any special law, customary or statutory, then the devolution is intended to be governed by the same.

The words "subject to his personal law" in s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, mean personal law by which he was governed when the succession opened.

HIRE PURCHASE AND SALE.

The proper test to determine what the true nature of a hire-purchase agreement is, is to look at the substance of the transaction, the intention of the parties in entering into that transaction, and what it is really intended by them to be. An option to purchase given to the buyer may be indicative that no sale may have been intended by the parties. The mere circumstance that an option to the buyer has been given may not necessarily involve the conclusion that it is not a sale, nor intended to be a sale. What has got to be considered is to consider the terms of the contract including the option which may have been given to the buyer under the terms of the contract and consider what is the real nature of the transaction.

In determining the true nature of a transaction of hire-purchase the term of option given to the hirer and the term of liberty reserved to him to return the goods during the continuance of the contract are terms which have an important bearing in determining the nature of the transaction; but they are not in every case conclusive of the nature of the transaction. They are of great help in determining the true nature of the transaction, but it is on a consideration of the entire terms of the contract read in the light of the surrounding circumstances that the true nature of the transaction has to be determined, and it is possible that even in cases where the option to purchase and the liberty to return the goods are reserved in the contract, the contract in its true nature may still be a contract of sale and not merely a contract of hiring with an option to purchase. It is necessary to see what is the purpose of introducing the terms as to the option to purchase and liberty to return the goods during the subsistence of the contract. If on a consideration of all the terms of the agreement, it is found that these terms have been intended for the benefit of a buyer who has not made up his mind to buy at the time when he entered into the contract, to leave him free to make up his mind at any later stage and have an option of buying or not buying the article and return it to the owner at any time he liked, then the contract will not be an agreement of sale. If, on the other hand, it is clear that the parties to the contract have intended it to be a sale although they have introduced these terms in the working out of the contract for their mutual benefit and convenience, the mere presence of the terms will not destroy the character of the contract between the parties as an agreement to buy and to sell. What is necessary to consider is whether the transaction in substance is a transaction of sale although an element of bailment is added to it, or whether it is a contract of hiring with an added offer to the hirer to buy the hired article at his option.

In cases in which the inam was abolished with effect from July 20, 1955, under the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, and in which the inam land had been leased to a tenant before that date, the relationship of landlord and tenant continued to subsist between July 20, 1955 and July 1, 1960, and the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950 applied thereto.

Under the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, the tenancy of a land terminates on the date on which the landholder makes an application for possession of the land to the Tehsildar as provided in s. 44(2) of the Act.

In order to be entitled to the rights of an occupant under s. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, as the case may be, the inamdar or other person should have been in lawful possession of the land on July 1, 1960.

The inamdar is, entitled to the rights of an occupant under s. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, as the case may be, if in the application for possession made by him under the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, a final order for possession had been made in his favour before July 1, 1960. He would also be so entitled if an order for possession was made before July 1, 1960 and if such order is not set aside in appeal or revision or other proceeding by a superior Court. Where, however, no order for restoration of the possession to the landholder had been made before July 1, 1960, or if the order for possession was subsequently set aside, the tenant would become the occupant with effect from July 1, 1960.

INCOME-TAX ACT (XI of 1922), S. 10—Expenditure laid out on scientific research, what is—Amount paid by assessee to another merely to obtain knowledge whether allowable deduction—Whether necessary that research should be carried on by assessee.

In order to bring a case within s. 10(2)(xii) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, it is incumbent on the assessee on whom the burden lies, to establish that the expenditure incurred by him was on a research carried on either by himself or on his behalf or at his instance for the purposes of his own business. The sum paid by an assessee to another merely to obtain the knowledge gained by him by carrying on research for himself cannot be said to be an expenditure incurred by the assessee on scientific research, because it is neither carried on by him, nor on his behalf, nor at his instance.

For an expenditure to be one laid out and expended on such scientific research, there must be some direct or at any rate proximate nexus or connection between the expenditure and the scientific research and the research and business of the assessee.

A company dealing in drugs, chemicals, pharmaceuticals etc. was in possession of very valuable technical knowledge and practical experience as a result of its long and extensive research in the pharmaceutical field. It had obtained patent rights in respect of certain products and had also registered its trade marks. Under an agreement the company granted to the assessee, which was one of its subsidiaries, the user of the patents and trade marks and gave the assessee the technical "know-how" and assistance. The use of the knowledge or the practical experience was limited only for the purpose of the conduct of the business during the period of the agreement which was of a duration of five years. The assessee in return agreed to give to the company a certain percentage of the sale price of the pharmaceutical products manufactured by it. On the question whether the payment so made by the assessee to the company was an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922:—

Held, that in the transaction between the company and the assessee there was no transfer of any property or asset, nor any capital element was involved therein and, therefore, the transaction was not "capital in nature", that the payment was laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the assessee's business, and that, therefore, the assessee was entitled to the deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act in respect of this payment.

67 Bom. L.R. 792.

———S. 10(2)(xv)—Loan secured by assessee by mortgage of land and building constructed for sale—Expenditure incurred over execution of mortgage—Whether such expenditure a deductible revenue expenditure.

The assessee firm which was brought into existence solely for the purpose of constructing a building and selling it, not having sufficient funds for the construction of the building secured a loan from some persons. This loan was secured by executing mortgages of the land and the building under construction in favour of the creditors. The firm incurred a certain expenditure over the execution of the mortgages and in its assessment proceedings for the year 1956-57 it claimed this amount as an admissible deduction against the profits which it had made from the construction and sale of the building. The Tribunal disallowed the claim on the ground that the said expenditure was incurred solely for the purpose of raising capital and not for the purpose of the running of the assessee's business or for acquiring the stock-in-trade:—

Held, that the expenditure incurred by the assessee for executing the mortgage in favour of the mortgagee-creditors for obtaining monies for construction and completion of the building was an expenditure not of a capital nature but wholly laid out in the business of the assessee for obtaining profits and gains therefrom, and that, therefore, the said sum could be claimed by the assessee as a deductible revenue expenditure under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

What is required under s. 26A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, is a single document or a number of documents all existing in the relevant account year which will together form an instrument of partnership. If the documents by themselves do not have that effect, then there is no instrument of partnership as required under s. 26A of the Act.

Under s. 26A the instrument has to be an instrument not of any partnership, but of the partnership of certain specified individuals. A mere record of some terms of partnership will not make the document an instrument of partnership of certain specified individuals.

Under s. 26A it must be the document itself which must constitute the instrument of partnership and not the document coupled with certain other evidence.

The word "instrument" as used in s. 26A means a document of a legal nature, by which any right or liability is or purported to be created, transferred, limited, extended, extinguished or recorded.

The amendments effected in the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, by the State Government by virtue of s. 3(4) of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act, 1957, empowering the Commissioner to acquire land under ss. 4, 6, 9 and 17 of the Land Acquisition Act, are valid amendments so far as the State is concerned.

Sections 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, do not infringe art. 19 of the Constitution of India.

Sub-clause (2) of s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, added by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, which includes certain purposes within the definition of public purpose are within the connotation of that expression in art. 31 of the Constitution of India.

Section 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, read with s. 3(f)(2) of the Act as amended by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, does not infringe art. 14 of the Constitution of India.

A discretion given under a law, however wide it may be, cannot necessarily be equated with discrimination, and in so far as there is a possibility of the misuse of a discretion the normal presumption of law is that the authority invested with a discretionary power will act fairly and honestly and not abuse it. If it does however abuse it in a given case, that is an indication of human frailty rather than the power being discriminatory.

The definition of “public purpose” in s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, as amended by the inclusion of cl. (2) therein by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, is intra vires of art. 31 of the Constitution of India as well as s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act.

The question whether there is a public purpose or not does not fall to be considered merely upon the recitals of the particular notification impugned, but must be gathered from the facts and circumstances before the Court.

When moneys are advanced by the State to a Corporation for the payment of compensation for lands acquired by the Corporation, the compensation to be awarded cannot be said to be paid “wholly or partly out of public revenues” within the meaning of that expression in the proviso to s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.

LAND ACQUISITION ACT, Ss. 4, 6, 9, 17—
(Contd.)

The conditions in s. 17(1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, namely (1) the existence of urgency, (2) a direction from the appropriate Government or Commissioner, (3) waste or arable land, (4) need for a public purpose and (5) need for a company, are all conditions prescribed for the exercise of the power or jurisdiction of the Collector to take the citizens' property under those provisions. Upon the non-fulfilment or non-existence of any one of those conditions the exercise of the power must be interdicted. The conditions must be strictly fulfilled and are not left to the subjective satisfaction or opinion of the authority concerned.

Agricultural land cannot be said to be arable land within the meaning of s. 17(1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.

In considering whether any land is “waste or arable” it is the nature of the land and its substantive use that one must have regard to and not what it is formally dubbed in archaic revenue records.

Where dictionaries differ as to the meaning of a word used in a statute, a judicial interpretation of the word even in a “persuasive” precedent will be of prime importance. SADRUDDIN v. PATWARDHAN.

LICENSEE, ejectment proceedings against, whether terminate on his death.

Ejectment proceedings against a licensee under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, do not expire with his death but are liable to be continued upon death of the licensee against his legal representatives.

The ejectment application proceedings against persons mentioned in s. 41 of the Act are proceedings relating to property rights and/or recovery of properties and are not proceedings which are relating to personal causes of action. Those proceedings do not die with the death of a party to the proceedings whether he may be applicant and/or opponent but are such as could be continued against legal representatives of a deceased party to the proceedings.

LIMITATION ACT (IX of 1908), ART. 85—Indian Partnership Act (IX of 1932), Secs. 46, 47—Mutual, open and current account between plaintiff and defendant firms—Suit for dissolution of plaintiff firm and appointment of Court Receiver—Suit by Receiver against defendant firm for balance due to plaintiff at foot of account—Applicability of art. 85.

There was a mutual, open and current account between the plaintiff firm and the defendant firms. One of the partners of the plaintiff firm filed a suit for dissolution of the firm on July 24, 1950. The Court Receiver was appointed to manage the property of the firm and to realise the assets. On November 3, 1953, the Receiver filed a suit against the defendant for recovery of the balance due to the plaintiff at the foot of the accounts. In the plaintiff's account relating to its transactions with the defendant the last debit entry was made on June 17, 1950, and as the accounting year ran from Divali to Divali, during the relevant year 1949-1950, November 9, 1950 was the closing date of the accounting year. On the question whether the suit filed by the Receiver was barred by limitation, the Receiver contended that the account continued to be mutual, open and current till the date of the suit and, therefore, art. 85 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, applied and the suit was within time. The defendant contended that the account had ceased to be so on the dissolution of the plaintiff firm on July 24, 1950, and that the suit was barred by limitation:—

Held, that as the plaintiff firm was dissolved on July 24, 1950, and it became incapable of continuing the dealings between the parties, the account had ceased to be mutual, open and current at the date of the suit, and that, therefore, art. 85 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, was not applicable and the suit was barred by limitation.

LIMITATION ACT, ART. 182(5)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 6, 7—Application for rectification of name of one of judgment-debtors in decree sent to executing Court—Whether such application covered by art. 182(5) of Indian Limitation Act.

An application made by a decree-holder to the Court which passed the decree that the copy of the decree sent to the Court to which the decree was transferred for execution should be rectified so as to give the correct name of one of the judgment-debtors, is an application "to take some step in aid of execution of the decree" and is covered by art. 182(5) of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

In deciding whether an application was "to take some step in aid of execution", the relevant question is whether the Court was requested by that application to take some step in aid of execution, and not whether the decree-holder in filing the application had acted in furtherance of execution.

There is no express provision in the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, that the board of directors be elected by a society at its general meeting. In each case it will have to be seen whether by reason of the bye-law made by the society, right to elect directors is given to the general meeting or not. If the bye-laws give a right to the general meeting to elect its directors, rule 22 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961, would govern the election of the board of directors. If, on the other hand, the bye-law does not give a right to the general meeting to elect its board of directors, but otherwise provides for the election

The correct practice when a dispute is referred to the Registrar under s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, is for the Registrar to issue notices to both the parties and give them an opportunity of being heard on the question whether a dispute exists. It is only after the Registrar has heard the parties or given them an opportunity of being heard that he can decide or satisfy himself whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act exists. It is his decision so arrived at which will be final under s. 91(2) of the Act.

The question whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act exists so as to enable the Registrar or his Nominee to entertain a reference in respect of such dispute must be decided by reference to the averments made in the application for reference made under rule 75 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961.

The words “claiming through a member” in s. 91(1) (b) of the Act mean deriving such title or rights through a member as the member possessed or had acquired by reason of his being a member or in his capacity as a member.

A dispute in regard to the occupation of accommodation provided by a Co-operative housing society between a member of the society and the person to whom he has given such accommodation is a dispute touching the business of the society within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act.

A dispute in regard to rent or compensation payable to a member of a co-operative housing society by a person to whom he has given his tenement for occupation will not ordinarily touch the business of the society. But a claim for mesne profits is consequential or incidental to a claim for possession and if the Registrar or Nominee is competent to entertain the application for possession made against such a person, he will also have jurisdiction to decide the claim for past as well as future mesne profits made against him until possession is given.

Section 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, does not operate as a bar to a dispute between a co-operative society and its employee in regard to a demand for a change in the terms of employment or for reinstatement of the employee, being decided under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, or the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.

The words “any dispute” in s. 91(1) of the Act must be given a limited meaning and mean any dispute which the Registrar is competent to try and decide.

The non obstante clause in s. 91(1) of the Act excludes the operation of other laws, which confer jurisdiction on some other Court, authority, or Tribunal to try the disputes mentioned therein. If there is any other law which lays down that a matter, which under s. 91 the Registrar has jurisdiction to decide, may be tried by some other Court, authority or Tribunal, then the application of that law is excluded by the non obstante clause. But this clause does not alter or modify the substantive rights of the parties, nor does it confer any additional powers on the Registrar.

Section 91(2) only empowers the Registrar to determine a jurisdictional issue; it does not enlarge the jurisdiction conferred on the Registrar by s. 91(1).

The word "convene" in s. 49(2) and subss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act before their amendment, meant call or summon.

The Court should, if possible, so construe a provision in an Act as will make it and the other provisions of the Act workable and as will not render any of them ineffective or incapable of being carried out. —in Criminal offence.

(Per Subba Rao J.) It is a well-settled principle of common law that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a criminal offence. A statute can exclude that element but it is a sound rule of construction adopted in England and also accepted in India to construe a statutory provision creating an offence on conformity with the common law rather than against it unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication exclude mens rea. There is a presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a statutory offence; but this may be rebutted by the express words of a statute creating the offence or by necessary implication. But the mere fact that the object of a statute is to protect welfare activities or to eradicate grave social evils is in itself not decisive of the question whether the element of guilty mind is excluded from the ingredients of the offence. It is also necessary to enquire whether a statute by putting a person under strict liability help him to assist the State in the enforcement of the law; can he do anything to promote the observance of the law? A person who does not know that gold cannot be brought into India without a licence or is not bringing into India any gold at all cannot possibly do anything to promote the observance of the law. Mens rea by necessary implication can be excluded from a statute only where it is absolutely clear that the implementation of the object of a statute would otherwise be defeated and its exclusion enables those put under strict liability by their act or omission to assist the promotion of the law. The nature of mens rea that will be implied in a statute creating an offence depends upon the object of the Act and the provisions thereof.

The restrictions on the tenants' right to hold property enacted by ss. 354R and 354RA of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act are not unreasonable and the provisions of the sections are valid.

Finality is given to a clearance order under s. 354RA of the Act after its confirmation by the Government and its publication in the manner prescribed in clause (1) of Schedule GG to the Act, subject only to the result of an appeal preferred under clause (2) of Schedule GG by a person aggrieved. If no such appeal is preferred or if such appeal is filed and dismissed no remedy by suit is available to a person like a tenant who contends that he is aggrieved.

The words “and specifying the time with-

The expression “any person aggrieved” in clause 2 of Schedule GG to the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act is sufficiently wide to include not only a tenant but also an occupant of a building who is likely to be dishoused as a result of the action taken under a clearance order.

It is open to a tenant of the building included in the area to which a clearance order made under s. 354RA of the Act relates, to lodge an objection to the proposed order under s. 354RA(4).

Order XLI, r. 27(1) (b) of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, does not entitle the High Court to let in fresh evidence at the appellate stage where even without such evidence it can pronounce judgment in a case. It does not entitle the appellate Court to let in fresh evidence only for the purpose of pronouncing judgment in a particular way. It is only for removing a lacuna in the evidence that the appellate Court is empowered to admit additional evidence.

It is not open to a Court to compel a party to make a particular kind of pleading or to amend his pleading and it is also beyond its competence to virtually oblige a party to examine any particular witness.

The provisions of Entry No. 53 in List I of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India, and the provisions of Entries Nos. 1, 5 and 6 in List II of the Constitution do not stand in conflict with one another.

It will be clear from the object, scheme and design of the impugned legislation that the Legislature wanted to provide for topics which clearly fall in List II. The pith and substance of the impugned legislation, therefore, is not to deal with or dabble in petroleum and petroleum products as such, but to devise special measures for ensuring the protection and safety of the citizens of a crowded city like Bombay. In so far as the Parliament has passed a legislation which makes provision for these matters, it can, in a sense, be said that there is some amount of impingement or encroachment or trespass into the field of legislation reserved for the

An order made by the State Government under s. 23(7) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, removing the President of a municipality, governed by the Act, from the office of President, is a quasi-judicial order.

The President of the Bhor Municipality, governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, presided at a meeting of the municipality which passed a resolution disallowing two of its members to sit in the house. The State Government made an order under s. 23(7) of the Act removing the President from the office of President for neglect and of incapacity to perform his duty as President on account of his failure or omission to disallow the said resolution:—

Held, that as under the Act or the Rules framed thereunder by the municipality there was no duty cast on the President to suo motu

A right of a member or councillor to attend the meeting of a municipality is not a fundamental right as enshrined in the Constitution of India.

Under rule 25 of the rules contained in the Second Schedule to the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909, the Official Assignee is entitled to hold an inquiry and for that purpose to receive evidence on oath to decide whether a debt is genuine and owing to the creditor.

In the absence of any legislative provision to guide the exercise of the discretion in the matter of issuing passports, the Government of India must issue passports to all Indian citizens who apply for them.

Article 14 of the Constitution of India is expressly directed to the "State" (which includes the Government of India) and its effect is that, in the absence of any regulations in regard to the issue of passports, the Government of India must issue passports to all Indian citizens who ask for them, or to none at all.

Moreover, art. 21 of the Constitution recognises and protects the right of every person to "personal liberty" of which he cannot be deprived, "except according to procedure established by law." An Indian citizen has, therefore, the right, in the absence of any law to the contrary, to obtain a passport which is necessary for the exercise of his right to go abroad, which right is clearly a part of the "personal liberty" guaranteed to him. CHOITHRAM v. STATE v. RAMCHANDRA. 67 Bom. L.R. 472.

PENAL CODE (XLV of 1860), S. 292—Constitution of India, Arts. 19(1) (a), 19(2)—Whether s. 292 void by reason of art. 19(1) (a)—Whether knowledge of obscenity ingredient of offence under s. 292(a)—Mens rea whether required before offence of selling or keeping for sale obscene object completed—Obscenity and pornography, difference between—Test of obscenity in India—Whether test laid down in Hicklin's case to be discarded—Obscenity and art.

Section 292 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, is not invalid in view of art. 19(2) of the Constitution of India.

Section 292 of the Code embodies a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public because the law against obscenity seeks no more than to promote public decency and morality.

Section 292(a) of the Code does not make knowledge of obscenity an ingredient of the offence but absence of such knowledge may be taken in mitigation.

Mens rea will be required before the offence of selling or keeping for sale of an obscene object can be said to be complete. The offender must have actually sold or kept for sale, the offending article. The circumstances of the case will then determine the criminal intent and it will be a matter of a proper inference from them.

There is some difference between obscenity and pornography in that the latter denotes writings, pictures etc. intended to arouse sexual desire while the former may include writings etc. not intended to do so but which have that tendency. Both offend against public decency and morals but pornography is obscenity in a more aggravated form.

The test of obscenity to adopt in India (regard being had to community mores) is that obscenity without a preponderating social purpose or profit cannot have the constitutional protection of free speech and expression and obscenity is treating sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature, or having that tendency. Such a treating with sex is offensive to modesty and decency but the extent of such appeal in a particular book etc. are matters for consideration in each individual case.

PENAL CODE, S. 292—(Contd.)

The test of obscenity laid down by Cockburn C.J. in The Queen v. Hicklin, (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 360, should not be discarded. It makes the Court the judge of obscenity in relation to an impugned book etc. and lays emphasis on the potentiality of the impugned object to deprave and corrupt by immoral influences. It will always remain a question to decide in each case and it does not compel an adverse decision in all cases.

An overall view of the obscene matter in the setting of the whole work would be necessary, but the obscene matter must be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so decided that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influences of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall. In this connection the interests of our contemporary society and particularly the influence of the book, etc. on it must not be overlooked.

Where obscenity and art are mixed, art must be so preponderating as to throw the obscenity into a shadow or the obscenity so trivial and insignificant that it can have no effect and may be overlooked. In other words, treating with sex in a manner offensive to public decency and morality, judged of by the national standards and considered likely to pander to lascivious, prurient or sexually precocious minds, must determine the result. A balance should be maintained between freedom of speech and expression and public decency and morality but when the latter is substantially transgressed the former must give way.

In order to establish a charge of negligence under s. 304A of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, it must be shown that the accident was the direct cause of the negligence or rashness of the accused. The guilt of the accused must be proved beyond reasonable doubt.

There is a distinction between rashness and negligence. When one does an act with utter indifference to the consequences of which the doer may be conscious and which he hopes may not take place, one is said to be rash, while criminal negligence is neglect to take that precaution which a reasonable and pru-

Under s. 405 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, in order to establish "entrustment of dominion" over property to an accused person the mere existence of that person's dominion over property is not enough. It must be further shown that his dominion was the result of entrustment.

Therefore, in a prosecution against a partner for an offence under s. 406 of the Code on the ground that his failure to account for monies belonging to the firm in which he is a partner amounts to criminal breach of trust, the prosecution must establish that dominion over the assets or a particular asset of the partnership was, by a special agreement between the parties, entrusted to the accused partner. If in the absence of such a special agreement a partner receives money belonging to the partnership he cannot be said to have received it in a fiduciary capacity or cannot be held to have been "entrusted" with dominion over partnership properties.

In most Indian statutes, including the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, there is a provision for the rules made being published in the Official Gazette. Therefore, publication in the Gazette of India is the ordinary mode of bringing a rule or subordinate legislation to the notice of the person concerned.

—S. 123—"Statement in relation to candidature," meaning of expression in s. 123(4)—Whether expression means "statement in relation to the candidate"—Construction of statute—Circumstances under which words in statute have wider or narrower meaning.

In order that a statement "in relation to the candidature, or withdrawal" of a candidate should amount to corrupt practices within s. 123(4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, it should be in connection with the continued candidature of a candidate or his withdrawal from the candidature. It must be a statement of a fact connected with the candidature of a candidate and which affects his continued candidature during the election.

It is necessary in every case to examine the statements alleged to have been made and find out whether they are made in relation to the public and political character of the candidate or otherwise. It is possible that in some cases the criticism of a candidate's political and public activity may contain aspersions on his character or fitness to be elected. In that case the statements would be covered by the first part of s. 123(4) of the Act. But if that is not so, then merely because his party or his political and public activities or character is attacked by the statements, they are not "statements in relation to his candidature."

While construing a statutory provision the Court must give the words used their ordinary grammatical meaning. A word may take colour from the context, and, in the setting in which it is used it may have a wider or a narrower meaning. The words must be construed, therefore, with due regard to the context, the circumstances under which the same came to be enacted and the mischief that was intended to be prevented.

In order that an election should be set aside under s. 100(1)(d) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, it is incumbent on the petitioner to produce sufficient number of witnesses and evidence to show that all the votes wasted would have been acquired by the defeated candidate.

SEA CUSTOMS ACT, S. 171A.

Section 24 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, contemplates that the threat referred to therein must emanate from the person in authority. Therefore, where a person in authority before recording the confession of an accused merely explains to him the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, the confession is not hit by the provisions of s. 24 of the Indian Evidence Act, as it cannot be said to have been obtained by a threat within the meaning of s. 24. Further, in merely explaining the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act to the accused making the confession there is no threat given by the person in authority recording the confession which could have raised any hope in the mind of the accused or led him to suppose that he was to gain any advantage in reference to the proceeding against him relating to the offence of smuggling.

Section 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, does not contemplate the service of a summons as a condition precedent enabling the Customs Officer to record the statement under s. 171A of the Act.

If the property is wholly changed then apportionment of rent for different portions becomes a difficult problem. If it has not so changed the Court considers such apportioned rent and all such other circumstances as are brought to the notice of the Court. If no other circumstances are proved before the Court then such apportioned rent is the standard rent.

TRADE AND MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT (XLIII of 1958), Ss. 11, 12—Burden of proof under ss. 11(a) & 12(1)—Construction of 12(1)—Where marks identical whether permissible to consider manner of intended user of mark applied for registration for limited class of goods—Where marks not identical whether enquiry limited to comparison of two marks—Nature of such enquiry—Tests for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion.

Under ss. 11(a) and 12(1) of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958, the onus is upon the applicant to establish to the satisfaction of the Court that there is no real and tangible danger of confusion. On the other hand, the objections put forward by the opponents must equally be real and not fanciful. It is not for the Court to consider imaginary and unlikely cases in order to bring s. 12(1) of the Act into operation. Even though the burden is on the applicant their case is not to be defeated by constructing rather fantastic or far-fetched imaginary cases involving a combination of circumstances which, however possible it may be, has no reasonable probability in any business sense. The Court is not concerned with hypothetical possibilities but with the ordinary practical business probabilities having regard to the circumstances of the case. If at the conclusion of the enquiry, the answer to the question: Is deception or confusion likely to occur? is "yes" or if the matter remains in dubio, registration must be refused.

Section 12(1) of the Act deals with two types of cases. The first type of cases deals with two identical trade marks. If the mark of which registration is sought and the mark which is already registered are identical, the registration must be refused. It is not then permissible to proceed to consider whether notwithstanding the circumstances that the marks are identical, the manner of intended user of the mark applied for would justify allowing the registration in respect of some limited class of goods. The second type of cases are those in which it is necessarily postulated that the two marks under consideration are not identical. Here the enquiry is not limited to the comparison of two marks but involves a comparison of the two marks in relation, as regards the existing mark, to the goods in respect of which the marks are registered and in relation as regards the proposed mark, the goods in respect of which registration is applied for. In the conduct of this enquiry, the surrounding circumstances properly to be taken into account must be considered. When the marks have been considered in relation to the goods, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the question must be answered: "Is there likely to be confusion or deception if the application is granted?" When the question is answered, the enquiry under the section is concluded for all purposes and if the answer to the question is either in the affirmative or that the matter remains in dubio, it is incompetent to the tribunal to take into account any further matter in order to consider whether, in the light of those matters, the probability of confusion would be removed and thus the answer already given might be otherwise.

The Act does not lay down any criterion for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. Every case must depend on its own particular facts and the value of authorities lies not so much in the actual decision as in the tests applied for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. A trade mark is likely to deceive or cause confusion by its resemblance to another already on the register, if it is likely to do so in the course of its legitimate use in a market where the two marks are assumed to be in use by the traders in that market. In considering the matter, all the circumstances of the case must be considered. F. HOFFMAN ETC. CO. v. SANITEX CHEMICAL.

Such a suit, however, is not maintainable against an auction-purchaser of the same property, as the latter is not a person claiming under the transferor within the meaning of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. MARUTI GURAPPA v. KRISHNA BALA.

The plaintiff who owned a flat in Bombay employed the services of a broker for the purpose of giving the premises on the basis of leave and licence. The broker inserted an advertisement in a newspaper that a licence was intended to be granted in respect of the premises. The defendant approached the broker in pursuance of the advertisement and paid a certain amount to the latter by way of deposit and also a substantial sum by way of brokerage. Subsequently an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby the plaintiff "agreed to grant leave and licence to use and occupy the flat, furniture and fittings for eleven months renewable at the option of the Licensee every eleven months...on the following terms...1. that the Licensee shall pay monthly compensation for use and occupation; 2. that the premises shall be used for residence and business... 5. that if the Licensee fails to observe the terms of the agreement or if she commits nuisance, the licence shall stand revoked and the Licensor shall have the right to eject the Licensee forcibly; 6. that the Licensee shall not allow any other person to use and occupy the premises...7. that the Licensee shall not claim any right as a tenant...". The premises were given in the exclusive possession of the defendant. On the question whether the agreement between the parties created a relationship of landlord and tenant:

He'd, that on the terms of the agreement and the circumstances of the case, the relationship between the parties was that of landlord and tenant.

While construing a document, the Court has to consider the whole document and cannot refuse to give effect to a term of the document on the ground that it is placed at one place and not at the other. Therefore, as long as the agreement between the parties is clear, the place where a term of the document is found cannot matter much.

Section 8 or s. 10 of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, does not lay down any special procedure for the inquiry. Section 8 of the Act only gives discretion to the Court to hold "such inquiry as it deems proper" and s. 10 only confers powers of a Court upon the Court or the Commissioner holding the inquiry.

contained in show cases exhibited in drawing-rooms do not form part of the show cases as items of furniture and where they are intended to be excluded, a specific provision is made for their exclusion, e.g. in clauses (xii) and (xiii) of s. 5(1) of the Act. Gold caskets although contained in a show case which is part of the drawing-room furniture, are not entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii).

The expression "household utensils" in s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act means utensils which are in fact household utensils i.e. articles which are normally and commonly used by the assessee for his personal or household use and not something which is merely in the shape of household utensils but never intended to be used as such. The use must be according to the ordinary ideas, habits, customs and notions of the class of society to which the assessee belongs or according to the well established habits, customs and traditions of the family of the assessee. The mere possibility that the articles are capable of being put to a personal or household use will not be sufficient to treat them as intended for a personal or household use. The question whether the articles are intended for personal or household use has to be considered with reference to the facts and circumstances as they exist at the time when the question has to be determined.

The personal use contemplated in s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act is the use of a like nature as the use of other items mentioned in the section, namely, furniture, household utensils, wearing apparel and provisions. The use as a decoration in the drawing-room in the house, which is only calculated to give the person making the use a pride of possession is not contemplated in the section. The articles which are intended to give pride of possession and not intended for sale by the assessee are provided for in the other clauses of the section, for instance, cls. (xii) and (xiii). Souvenirs or mementoes which are articles not intended for sale but are only possessed to give the possessor a pride of possession are, however, not exempted under any of the clauses of s. 5 of the Act.

The words "accident arising out of employment" in s. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, mean that there should be a direct connection between the accident and the employment. If the accident has occurred on account of a risk which is an incident of the employment, the claim for compensation must succeed, unless the workman has exposed himself to an added peril by his own imprudent act.

It is open to a Court to find on an inference that the accident arose out of employment though no human being was present who could give direct evidence how and when the accident happened.

The expression "out of employment" is not confined to the nature of the employment, but applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations and its incidents. If by reason of any of these, the workman is brought within the zone of special danger or is injured or killed, the accident would be one arising out of employment. If the employment brings the workman within or allows him to be within proximity of the peril to which the injury or death can properly be ascribed, the accident can be said to have arisen out of employment.

If the workman is properly in a place to which some risk attaches and an accident occurs which is capable of being attributed to a risk which is ordinarily inherent in the discharge of his duties, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as regards the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to the risk and to hold that it arose out of employment.

It is not necessary to prove that the workman was engaged in a particular duty in the discharge of which he was at a particular spot where the accident happened. By the place of danger is meant not a particular spot of danger but the entire place, as for example, the ship or the train.

A seaman's employment puts him in a dangerous position, the ship on high seas or in deep waters being a place to which some risk is incidental. There are perils, surrounding the seaman's life and duty, which are inherent in his employment.

As the employment of a seaman, by the very nature of it, exposes him to certain dangers, whether at work or not, as for example, the danger of falling overboard or being swept overboard, there is a prima facie presumption, if death by drowning be proved, that the death was caused by an accident which arose out of employment.

The presumption thus arising can be rebutted by the employer by leading evidence of facts and circumstances showing that the workman had at or about the time of his death departed from the controlling incidents of his employment or that he had added to the peril by his own imprudent act.

Where there is a balance of probabilities as to whether death is caused by accident or by design and there is no clear evidence as to the cause of death, death must be presumed to be accidental. An innocent cause of death must be preferred to a cause which, if accepted, would lead to an inference of crime.

Whether an inference of accidental death can properly arise must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. But the view that one cannot hold a death to be accidental unless there is an eyewitness to the accident is a rigorous view of the rules of evidence and will defeat the protection afforded to the workers in a large number of cases, especially in cases of seamen whose death is caused by drowning.

Section 108 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is not exhaustive of the circumstances in which death can be inferred. There may be cases in which death cannot be presumed under s. 108 of the Act, as for example, cases in which a person has not been heard of for less than seven years and yet the fact of death can be inferred from the circumstances of the case.

Under the first proviso of s. 30(1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the decision of the Commissioner if the questions raised in appeal are pure questions of fact, or even if the appeal raises but a settled question of law.

PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE TO-DAY.*

WHAT is the presumption of innocence? What is the historical background of this great principle? What is its scope? Is it subjected to any modification? If so, is there any further scope for modifying the presumption of innocence? And if so, to what extent in the context of to-day? These are some of the salient questions which I propose to discuss here.

In the words of Lord Sankey L.C.

'throughout the web of the English Criminal Law one golden thread is always to be seen; that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt subject to the matters of defence of insanity and subject also to any statutory exception.'¹

'It is an essential principle of our criminal law that a criminal charge has to be established by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt.'²

The principle underlying the rule is the oft-quoted maxim that it is better that ten guilty persons should escape than one innocent person suffer.

This great principle of presumption of innocence is a matter of the law of evidence. It is immediately connected with the questions of burden of proof, proof beyond reasonable doubt and benefit of doubt. That is why I treat these aspects of proof as part and parcel of the connotation of the expression presumption of innocence. It is also mediately linked up with the questions of raising false defence, making false denials, the failure to explain circumstances adverse to the accused, testimonial compulsion, extorted confessions, quantum of onus on the accused, double standard of proofs for civil and criminal cases, mens rea, circumstantial evidence and the strict construction of criminal statute, and the like. These latter problems, it is submitted, fall within the scope of the presumption of innocence.

The effective force of this vital presumption can hardly be exaggerated considering the range of significant legal concepts and consequences associated with it. The presumption of innocence is in truth merely another form of expression for a part of the accepted rule for the burden of proof in criminal cases, i.e. the rule that it is for the prosecution to adduce evidence and to produce persuasion beyond a reasonable doubt. As to the measure of persuasion the presumption says nothing. As to the burden of proof the presumption implies that the accused may remain inactive and secure, until the prosecution has taken up its burden and produced evidence and effected persuasion.³ A necessary corollary to this presumption is that a Court should consider nothing but the evidence on record and hence extraneous considerations are ruled out. Thus in the words of Wigmore 'the presumption of innocence is particularly a warning not to treat certain things improperly as evidence'⁴. In practice, the presumption stimulates the search for independent evidence.

Stephen says that this is one of the most characteristic features of English criminal procedure, and it presents a marked contrast to that which is common to all continental countries.⁵ The presumption of innocence may be contrasted with the presumption of guilt of the prisoner. The latter presumption gives rise to a number of inhuman practices like torture to extort confessions. Under the Roman law torture formed an essential part of the procedure. However, evidence obtained by torture was to be used with caution.⁶ Under the ancient Indian law the institution of ordeal seems to be based more or less on the presumption of guilt e.g. a person accused of theft was subjected to the ordeal of oil and was asked to pick up by hand a piece of metal from boiling oil. If his hands emerged unscathed he was deemed to be innocent, otherwise guilty.⁷ In the Mrichhakatikam the hero is warned by the Judge to tell the truth on pain of being flogged.⁸ In marked contrast we find that the presumption of innocence is a healthy salient feature of the common law of England.

Bombay was the first province in India in which a Penal Code was enacted by the Regulation of 1827, replacing the traditional Indian Law. That Code was applicable only to the Courts of the East India Company and continued till it was substituted by the Indian Penal Code in 1860.⁹ The presumption of innocence was given effect to by the British in India from early times. It was held in the case of Nobokisto that the golden rule of criminal jurisprudence is that an accused is presumed to be innocent till he is proved to be guilty; hence the law requires the accuser to prove all facts compatible with his guilt and incompatible with his innocence.¹⁰ And in this respect law does not weigh in golden scales the conflicting testimony offered by each side, but taking its stand on the side of the accused, it examines all facts and circumstances with care and circumspection so that it may not abuse the liberties of those who are placed under its protection.¹¹ The presumption of innocence is given effect to in s. 101 of the Indian Evidence Act. See Illustration (a) to it. Section 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, also gives effect to this presumption.

The presumption of innocence is immediately connected with the questions of burden of proof, proof beyond reasonable doubt and benefit of doubt. No doubt the burden of proof of establishing the guilt of the accused is cast by s. 101 of the Evidence Act on the prosecution because he who asserts must prove. The expression 'burden of proof' has a two-fold meaning viz., the burden of proof and the onus of proof. The Supreme Court of India has recently observed in the case of Raghavamma v. Chenchamma,¹² that there is an essential distinction between burden of proof and onus of proof. Burden of proof lies upon the person who has to prove a fact and it never shifts but the onus of proof shifts. Circumstances may shift onus of proof. Such a shifting of onus is a continuous process in the evaluation of evidence. Lord Denning calls the former a legal burden¹³ while the latter type of burden is called the provisional or tactical burden.¹⁴ The burden of proof or the legal burden i.e. the duty of the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused does not shift to the accused and continues upon the prosecution till the end of the trial. But the onus i.e. the duty of going forward with the evidence may shift to the accused as in case of a person accused of being in possession of stolen property by reason of s. 114, ill. (a) of the Evidence Act. In that event it will be for the accused to rebut the presumption of the guilt by explaining his possession. It is true that the burden of proof does not shift on the accused, but it is equally true that under certain circumstances as illustrated above the onus shifts on to him. This way lies the breach in the castle of the presumption of innocence. We may call it a modification of the presumption of innocence.

The legal burden continues to be on the prosecution till the end of the trial. In case of acquittal the presumption of innocence is strengthened and is sometimes called a double presumption. This has given rise to the well-known doctrine of 'very substantial and compelling reasons' which an appellate Court is to keep in mind while upsetting an order of acquittal.¹⁵

The scope of the burden of proof gives rise to the question of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Woodroffe observes that the doctrine of presumption of innocence depends upon the doctrine of proof beyond a reasonable doubt.¹⁶ It is indeed difficult to define the phrase reasonable doubt. Chief Justice Shaw in Webster's case laid down that

"It is not mere possible doubt, because everything relating to human affairs and depending upon moral evidence is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge."¹⁷

A reasonable doubt is a doubt for which a reason can be given.¹⁸ The doctrine of the proof beyond reasonable doubt brings in its wake the difference in the quantum of proof between the civil and criminal cases. This difference is maintained despite the fact that the definition of 'proved' in s. 3 of the Evidence Act does not make such a distinction in terms.

The quantum of proof as traditionally known to the law have been two and have been regarded as distinct. The higher standard (conveniently, if inaccurately, called the criminal standard) is defined as "proof beyond reasonable doubt". The lower standard (conveniently, if inadequately, called the civil standard) is defined as 'proof upon the balance of probabilities'. Lord Denning in *Miller v. Minister of Pensions*¹⁹ has observed thus about the criminal standard:

"That degree is well-settled. It need not reach certainty, but must carry a high degree of probability. Proof beyond reasonable doubt does not mean the proof beyond the shadow of a doubt. The law would fail to protect the community if it admitted fanciful possibilities to deflect the course of justice. If the evidence is so strong against a man as to leave only a remote possibility in his favour, which can be dismissed with the sentence 'of course it is possible but not in the least probable' the case is proved beyond reasonable doubt but nothing short of that will suffice."

In the same case he contrasted the position as obtained in civil cases thus

"That degree is well settled. It must carry a reasonable degree of probability, but not so high as is required in a criminal case. If the evidence is such that the tribunal can say, 'we think it more probable than not', the burden is discharged, but if the probabilities are equal it is not".

Thus the criminal standard of proof is more strict than its civil counterpart. In the former all the points of doubt must be eliminated before a judgment can be recorded for the prosecution, while in the latter on a mere preponderance of evidence or probabilities a judgment can be given for the plaintiff. The moment a criminal Court is convinced that there are some points of doubt or suspicion militating against the guilt of the accused the benefit of doubt must go to the accused. Hence the Supreme Court has held that suspicion, however grave, cannot take the place of proof²⁰ and, therefore in such cases the accused is given the benefit of doubt.

The presumption of innocence confers valuable privileges on the accused which fall within the scope of the presumption of innocence. The accused is not bound to answer any questions and can keep his lips sealed and rely on the presumption of innocence as was held in Ajmer Singh's case. He need not lead any evidence in defence. No oath can be administered to him (s. 342(4), Criminal Procedure Code). The accused shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer questions by the Court nor by giving false answers to them, though the Court in that event may draw inference from such refusal or answers as it thinks fit (s. 342(2), Criminal Procedure Code). Questions in the nature of cross-examination are to be avoided by the Court while examining the accused. The accused cannot be compelled to give evidence on oath in his defence except at his request in writing (s. 342-A, Criminal Procedure Code). The accused cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself (art. 20(3), Constitution of India). The scope of this privilege against self-incrimination was explained by the Supreme Court of India in M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra.²¹ Subsequently, the Supreme Court has reviewed its own decision in the case of Kathi Kalu v. State of Bombay.²² The accused cannot be convicted on his involuntary confession and hence torture is eliminated to a certain degree. The safeguards to be observed by the Court recording a confession as provided in s. 164 read with s. 364, Criminal Procedure Code, also tend to secure the accused from coercion, threat or inducement.

In this connection, we may consider the question of quantum of proof to be led by the accused to rebut the onus cast on him under certain circumstances. It is well-settled that the burden of proof on the accused is less rigorous than on the prosecution.²³ The Supreme Court of India has held in the case of *C. I. Emden*²⁴ that it is enough proof if explanation offered by the accused is reasonably probable. This judicial interpretation of the definition of 'proved' as contained in s. 3 of the Evidence Act in making a concession in favour of the accused in the matter of the standard of proof the defence is to lead is, it is submitted, also rooted in the principle of the presumption of innocence of the accused.

The well-known canons of construction of statutes are also in favour of the strict construction of criminal statutes. If the words used in a criminal statute are reasonably capable of two constructions, the construction which is favourable to the accused should be preferred; in construing the relevant words it is obviously necessary to have due regard to the context in which they have been used.²⁵

Kenny has pointed out that the scope of the presumption of innocence extends also in every civil case where any allegation is made that a criminal act has been committed. Thus, in an action on a life-insurance policy the presumption is against suicide.²⁶

Mayne has brought out the difference between the French, the British and the Indian Law on the subject. Thus there are two well-known systems of dealing with prisoners, which are directly opposed to each other. In France, the accused is the first and principal witness for the prosecution. Naturally he is an unwilling witness, and accordingly the presiding Judge, who conducts his interrogation, cross-examines him, brow-beats him, puts every sort of criminating statement into his mouth, and assumes his guilt throughout in a manner which, to our ideas, is far from edifying. In England, no question can be put to a prisoner, for fear his answer might prejudice his case. The result is that, if in his own interest it is desirable to clear up any difficulty, it is impossible to apply for information to the only person in Court who can give it. No doubt he is told at one time that he may cross-examine the witnesses; at another time, that he may say anything he wishes to the Court or jury; but in general this is a mere farce. It hardly ever happens that a prisoner, however innocent, understands the real difficulty of his case, and the mode in which it might be cleared up. If he does show any such perception, he is generally a hardened and habitual offender. The Indian system aims at avoiding the evils of each system, and simply tries to assist justice, which is equally desirous to convict the guilty and to acquit the innocent. This is effected by s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code.²⁷ Stephen points out that

"The British system effectively avoids the appearance of harshness not to say cruelty, which often shocks an English spectator in a French court of justice, and I think that the fact that the prisoner cannot be questioned stimulates the search for independent evidence. The evidence in an English trial is, I think, usually much fuller and more satisfactory than the evidence in such French trials as I have been able to study."²⁸

It may be mentioned that recently in February 1964 the New Judges' Rules were published in England. Lord Shawcross in his address to the West Riding Magistrates at Leeds last year suggested that it might be an advantage for a magistrate to have the power to interrogate potential witnesses and suspects, with a view to the discovery of the absolute truth; he referred to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

The next question for inquiry is whether there are any existing modifications of the presumption of innocence. The answer is, Yes. These modifications can be grouped under three heads: (A) Legislative; (B) Procedural; and (C) Judicial.

(A) There is a well-worn saying current in International Politics viz. a war to end the war. On those lines we find presumptions enacted by statutes to whittle down or end the presumption of innocence. There are a number of such presumptions which shift the onus to the accused, to the prejudice of the presumption of innocence, for example, the presumptions under ss. 66(2) and 85(2) of the Bombay Prohibition Act, s. 124 of the Bombay Police Act, s. 114(a) of the Indian Evidence Act, s. 3 of the Railway Stores (Unlawful Possession) Act, 1955, and also under s. 5(3) of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1955. See also s. 106 of the Evidence Act. These are only illustrative and not exhaustive presumptions.

(B) There are some features of the Criminal Procedure which militate against the sanctity of the presumption of innocence; however the people have taken them for granted. The secrecy with which the first information report is lodged with the Police, the publicity of the arrest, the commitment to lock up while under trial, the demand of bail, refusal of bail and the like. Judge Wiglittle of the U.S.A. has remarked that they are so many steps and strokes to blacken the accused before he is permitted to open his mouth.²⁹

(C) The last but not the least inroad in the presumption of innocence is constituted by the judicial modifications thereof i.e. the modifications effected by case law. The point may be illustrated as follows:

False Denials: Formerly it was loosely believed that an accused has a privilege to tell lies and to take up false defences. However, in the case of *Pershad v. U.P. State*³⁰ in construing s. 114 of the Evidence Act the Supreme Court held that

"where in a murder charge the accused falsely denied several relevant facts which have been conclusively established, the Court would be justified in drawing an adverse inference from this against the accused."

Failure to Explain: It was formerly axiomatic that it was also the privilege of the accused not to open his mouth. But take the case of Deonandan v. State of Bihar.³¹ The charge was of murder and the evidence was circumstantial. The Supreme Court held that in a case where the various links have been satisfactorily made out and the circumstances point to the accused as the probable assailant with reasonable definiteness and in proximity to the deceased as regards time and situation and the accused offers no explanation, which if accepted, though not proved, would afford a reasonable basis for a conclusion on the entire case consistent with his innocence, such absence of explanation or false explanations would itself be an additional link which completes the chain of circumstances against the accused.

Mens Rea: In his monograph on Mens Rea in Statutory Offences, Dr. Edwards has only pointed that the rules of mens rea are embedded in the principle that no man shall be punished for committing a crime unless a guilty mind can be imputed to him.³² It is, however submitted that mens rea is also a safeguard flowing from the presumption of innocence. Proof of the mental state of the accused while committing an offence casts an additional burden on the prosecution in order to rule out any chance of convicting an innocent person. We find a tendency to dispense with the proof of mens rea in social welfare offences. In *Sarjoo Prasad v. State of U.P.*³³ the Supreme Court held that no mens rea was necessary under s. 7 read with s. 16 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954, for sale of food by a servant in the shop, as it is not necessary in the case of his master.

Circumstantial Evidence: An unmistakable tendency is discerned to base a conviction on circumstantial evidence alone even in capital cases. In the case of *State of U.P. v. Deoman*³⁴ a death sentence was passed on circumstantial evidence. In the recent case of *M.G. Agarwal v. State of Maharashtra*³⁵ the Supreme Court of India has held that "It was settled law that a conviction can be reasonably founded on circumstantial evidence if it is wholly inconsistent with the innocence of the accused and consistent only with his guilt. If the circumstances proved are consistent either with innocence or guilt, the accused person is entitled to the benefit of doubt. But in applying this principle a distinction must be made between primary facts which have to be proved in the ordinary way and the inference of guilt to be drawn therefrom. It is in connection with the latter aspect of the problem that the doctrine of benefit of doubt can apply and an inference of guilt can be drawn only if the proved facts are wholly inconsistent with innocence, and consistent only with guilt."

It will be seen that the Supreme Court has now made a distinction between primary facts in the evidence and the inference of guilt to be drawn from them for the purposes of giving benefit of doubt to the accused.

In view of the multitude of modifications question arises, is there further scope for modification of the presumption of innocence? Let us consider the purpose of this presumption.

This great presumption of innocence crystallizes the sanity and security of law. Law is sane as it provides for the prevention of punishment of the innocent by reason of this presumption. Law is secure as people feel safe under the wings of this presumption. Further, this presumption affords protection against the possibilities of arbitrary State action. In the words of Stephen 'it contributes greatly to the dignity and apparent humanity of a criminal trial.'³⁶ Most people accused of crime are poor, stupid and helpless and many go undefended. The presumption of innocence ensures a fair trial and helps justice. The right to fair trial is a fundamental right. It is at once a natural right of man as well as a constitutional right being enshrined collectively in arts. 20, 21 and 22 of the Indian Constitution. These articles are appropriately grouped under the heading right to freedom. The denial of the right to fair trial is a denial of the right to freedom, as in that event a person may be deprived of freedom, except according to procedure established by law (art. 21). Prof. Hall of Harvard has analysed the various rights which collectively guarantee a fair trial thus: the trial must be speedy, it must be public, as the judges, prosecutors and witnesses usually behave better in public. The trial must be by an impartial tribunal. At the trial the burden is on the prosecution to prove the accused guilty beyond reasonable doubt. Finally, the primary duty of the prosecution is not to convict but to see that justice is done.³⁷

A fair trial is the best guarantee of the Rule of Law. This is the reason of the rule of presumption of innocence.

Now this reasoning considers only the protection of individual liberty. The problem of the modern democratic States is to hold the scales evenly between individual liberty and social good. The preamble to the Constitution of India mentions inter alia the individual liberty and social good as the objects of the sovereign democratic Republic of India. Time is knocking at our doors like the Porter in Macbeth. Experience is the life-blood of law. Law in a welfare State has to play a dynamic role as an instrument of building up a socialistic pattern of society. Hence in this context a fifth fresh dimension is added to the traditional, deterrent, preventive, reformative and retributive purposes of punishment viz. punishment as a means to deliver the goods of social good. The purpose of law is not only to protect the citizen but its frontiers are now enlarged so as to include, what I may call, a constructive bias of law. Law is now at once a sentinel of liberty and a social engineer.

In view of this consideration I would submit that the presumption of innocence may be reconsidered in its application to social welfare offences.³⁸

Finally, it is submitted that the true scope of s. 106 of the Evidence Act which throws the burden of proving the facts especially within the knowledge of the accused upon the accused may be reconsidered. Reference is invited to the cases of Woolmington and Shambhu Nath v. State of Ajmer.³⁹

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE AND JUDICIAL POWERS.*

THE opinion of the Supreme Court of India in Reference No. 1 of 1964 is not a judgment in the strict sense of the term but nevertheless merits no less respect. It is possible that to many, including legislators, the opinion has come as a jolt; but giving it its due weight, and after an objective consideration of the matter, it will be seen that the opinion offers an easy solution to a situation which can well nigh become insoluble.

Since the establishment of superior Courts in India, over a hundred and fifty years ago, like the Recorders' and Supreme Courts and empowering them to grant the high prerogative writs such as Habeas Corpus, Mandamus etc., the relations between the Judiciary and the Executive occasionally got bedeviled. In the early days there were the two famous cases of Moro Raghunath and Bapu Gunnesb in which the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court was stoutly resisted by the executive headed by Sir John Malcolm in Bombay. On one of these occasions the Judges of the Supreme Court kept the Court closed for one month in protest against the government's refusal to obey the High Court's writ, and the matter was ultimately referred to the Privy Council for its opinion. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which had just been brought into existence by an Act of Lord Brougham, heard the arguments in the matter for several days and held ultimately against the Judges' view that they could issue writs outside the town and island of Bombay.

The Supreme Courts which had been established in the early years of the nineteenth century in the three Presidency towns were replaced by High Courts under Letters Patent issued under an Act of 1862 of the British Parliament. Under these Letters Patent the High Courts succeeded to the same jurisdiction which previously the Supreme Courts possessed to grant the high prerogative writs such as Habeas Corpus but by the subsequent Letters Patent of 1865 these Courts were made subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General-in-Council. By virtue of this power, certain sections of the Codes of Criminal Procedure of 1872 and 1875 placed limitations on the High Court's power to grant writs of Habeas Corpus. In the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1898,

s. 491 with some changes was placed in a separate chapter headed "Directions of the Nature of Habeas Corpus". There was for years a difference of views among the different High Courts in India whether the enactment of s. 491 in the Criminal Procedure Code in effect had taken away the High Courts' right to issue writs of Habeas Corpus. This point was finally set at rest by the judgment of the Privy Council in Matthen v. District Magistrate, Trivandrum.¹ A similar position has once more arisen after the introduction of the Constitution: Whether s. 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code remains independently operative after the inclusion of the fundamental rights in the Constitution.

The Supreme Court in two cases, *Makhan Singh Tarsikka v. The State of Punjab*² and Godavari Shamrao v. The State,³ has held that the right and the remedy given by s. 491(I)(b), Criminal Procedure Code, is the same as in the fundamental right to Habeas Corpus in the Constitution and, therefore, whenever the latter is suspended by law the former is also affected. The difference in the reasoning adopted by the Privy Council in Matthen's case which accepted the decision in the earlier Calcutta case^{3a} and that by the Supreme Court in the two above cases is obvious. The Letters Patent of the High Courts of 1865 having made the High Courts subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General-in-Council, after the Criminal Procedure Code was enacted, the High Courts could no longer issue the writ of Habeas Corpus outside the Code. The Supreme Court, on the other hand, holds that the relief under s. 491, Criminal Procedure Code, after the enactment of the Constitution, in effect, was merged in the wider relief given therein. It is respectfully submitted that a substantial right given by an important and time-honoured piece of legislation cannot be taken away by implication but that a definite piece of legislation is necessary for that purpose.

In England the position is slightly different. There the right exists at common law independently of any statute, though statutes have been passed to confirm and regulate its exercise. Its purpose is to secure speedy release from unlawful custody or unjustifiable detention. If the detention or custody complained against is purported to be for an offence which is bailable, bail could be granted but this is never done in Habeas Corpus proceedings as a separate statute exists for the purpose. Following this English practice, in India petitions for Habeas Corpus never prayed for interim bail but as in the Madras case only asked for an interim order prohibiting removal out of jurisdiction. In England, the Courts refuse Habeas Corpus to admit to or to discharge out of custody where a person has been committed for contempt by the House of Lords or the House of Commons (R. v. Flower).⁴

One preliminary remark is, however, necessary before discussing the merits of the question. It was unfortunate that in the proceedings before the two judges, Beg and Sehgal JJ., in the Habeas Corpus petition, the usual procedure was not followed. In a Habeas Corpus petition there never is a question of granting bail; only whether the custody is legal and if the custody be held not to be legal then the person in custody is set at liberty. As the matter concerns a man's liberty (sometimes minors are involved) the petition on presentation is set down for hearing at the earliest date with notice to the party, in whose custody the person is, to produce him in Court. At this or any subsequent stage bail is not granted. At the hearing, the first issue to be decided is the Court's jurisdiction or competence to hear and decide the petition and grant the relief asked for. The merits of the matter i.e. of the legality of the custody can only be gone into if the Court holds it has jurisdiction. (See *District Magistrate, Trivandrum v. Mammen Mappillai*⁵). Obviously, if this, the usual procedure, had been followed the learned Judges would doubtless have come to the conclusion that the U.P. Vidhan Sabha had acted within its rights and if so that they had no jurisdiction. Clearly, the further unhappy events that took place, including the action against the Judges, would never have happened. It is to be hoped that this matter will receive attention both from the Supreme Court and the Parliament.

The Supreme Court judgment holding that the High Courts under art. 226 and itself under art. 32 had both the duty and the right to entertain petitions for enforcement of fundamental rights, even against Legislatures, is a right one. Considering all the rights, fundamental rights to the citizen and privileges to the Legislatures flow from one source, the Constitution, can the Legislatures claim that they will exercise their privileges but deny the fundamental rights to the citizen? Surely, it is well known that a donee or beneficiary cannot accept a gift, without also accepting the condition, if one is attached to it.

There is also a supreme reason why the superior Courts should have jurisdiction in matters of freedom and liberty of the citizen. Representative assemblies, even the British Parliament, can also become as tyrannical as any monarch or tyrant on occasions. As Charles I said at his trial: "For if power without law may make laws, may alter the fundamental laws of the Kingdom, I know not what subject he is in England that can be sure of his life or anything that he calls his own." Indeed this parliamentary tyranny became so great at one time (during Charles II's reign) that a constitutional historian has recorded: "Every action of the Executive, however reasonable or necessary, was regarded with jealousy and suspicion, and the very judges, though appointed by the Crown, preferred to flout it openly rather than give an angry House of Commons the least reason to suppose that they favoured the cause of authority". As the Supreme Court points out "the supremacy of the Constitution is fundamental to the existence of a federal state". The Indian Constitution (that it is written, necessarily introduces into it a rigidity from which unwritten ones tend to be free) distributes functions of the State between its three arms; executive, legislative, and judicial, and while they are co-ordinate and independent of each other, clashes are bound occasionally to arise between one and any of the other two. On such unhappy and rare occasions it is necessary that there should be an authority in which power is vested to resolve the differences calmly and harmoniously. It is best that this authority should be the Supreme Court. Should public opinion on any particular occasion of controversy not be behind the judicial decision, the Legislature would be justified in effecting a change by its legislative powers. This necessarily arms the judiciary with great authority, and it behoves all the more those who exercise high judicial functions to keep aloof from all matters of public controversy.

Another reason, why it is necessary that the Superior Courts in India should have jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the privileges of Legislatures has not received that attention in the country which it deserves. Of course, it was not relevant to the issues before the Supreme Court, hence it did not find reference in its judgment. The Constitution has given each of the States a legislature either consisting of one House or two. Legislatures naturally tend to become jealous of their powers and privileges and it is conceivable that from time to time conflicts over privileges between the two Houses of a State Legislature or the Legislatures of different States, may arise. How are these conflicts to be resolved peacefully and harmoniously excepting through the detached agency of the Courts? That the Legislatures can be on occasion capricious or even tyrannical in the matters of their privileges or dignity can best be illustrated by two instances. That they concern the British Parliament will surprise many but adds to the force of the argument. The first occasion was when in 1676 Shaftsbury and a few other members, pointing to an old Act of Edward III's sought to prove that a Parliament that had not sat for over a year was ipso facto dissolved. This they did in order to embarrass the King, which most members were desirous of doing.

But instead of winning support for this interesting constitutional thesis the Lords found themselves violently attacked for outraging parliamentary dignity and privilege. They were called upon to apologise or withdraw and on their refusing, their fellow peers ordered them to the Tower. The end of this matter is very interesting. After remaining a prisoner in the Tower for a year Shaftsbury offered in 1677 his most humble apology for his ill-advised action (in endeavouring to maintain that the Parliament was dissolved), the House felt that satisfaction had been received and petitioned the King to order his discharge. What is even more astounding, the House of Lords in 1680 passed this motion: "That the said order and proceedings (of 1676 committing the Lords to the Tower) concerning the said Lords were unparliamentary, from the beginning, and in the whole progress thereof; and therefore are all ordered to be vacated (by virtue of this judgment) in the Journal book of this House, that the same, or any of them, may never be drawn into precedent for the future". (The Shaftsbury case⁶ referred to by the U.P. Vidhan Sabha Counsel at the King's Bench was the outcome of this, when the Court refused to interfere). The other case is known to constitutional historians as Sherley v. Fagg.⁷ The first was a physician to the King and Fagg a member of the House of Commons. Sherley had filed an appeal in the House of Lords (from a lower Court), while the Commons were in session which the Commons held to be a serious breach of their privilege. This brought on a head-on collision between the two Houses. After most of the counsel had been "committed to custody by the angry participants, and the Lords had accused the Commons of 'transcendant misbehaviour, breach of privilege, Magna Carta, subversion of government, and other high provoking and diminishing expressions', the King, after a vain effort to restore peace prorogued Parliament", causing the controversy thereby to lapse.

It will, therefore, be seen what extravagant claims have been or can be made in the name of parliamentary privilege. British Judges have held that because power can be abused is no reason why that power should be denied. But Lord Coleridge C.J. in the same judgment on which so much reliance was placed on behalf of the U.P. Vidhan Sabha also points out: "That, when a question is raised before the Court, the Court must give judgment on it according to its notions of the law, and not according to a resolution of either House of Parliament... Such cases might by possibility, occasion unseemly conflicts between the Courts and the Houses."

In India where there will exist at one time so many Legislatures, it is easy to see what difficulties can arise and the argument of British Judges that possible abuse is no bar to the recognition of power, cannot work in India. It is necessary here, in our special circumstances, in order to prevent Constitutional deadlocks or even to prevent abuse of power by any of the three arms of the State, Legislative, Executive and Judicial, that Constitutional curbs should exist. It follows therefore that the powers and privileges of Legislature should be, without delay, defined as provided for in art. 193 and not be left vague to be ascertained by reference to those of the House of Commons.

Since the Opinion of the Supreme Court was delivered, public opinion, by and large, has shown itself to be clearly behind it. There is, however, a certain section which feels that the opinion has considerably limited parliamentary privilege and that matters should be set right by means of a Constitutional amendment. It is difficult to understand the logic of this demand in view of the clear terms of the earlier part of art. 194(3). "The powers, privileges and immunities of a House of Legislature shall be such as may from time to time be defined by the Legislature by law...". Clearly if the position is to be clarified, it should be in the direction indicated by the relevant article in the Constitution... If this course is followed there will not be the slightest need for a Constitutional amendment.

GLEANINGS.

LEGAL CRUELTY AND CRUELTY

IN the case of Le Brocq v. Le Brocq [1964] 1 W.L.R. 1085, each of the learned lords justices approved the expression "cruel means cruel." If they meant that legal cruelty and "ordinary" cruelty are one and the same thing, it can be demonstrated that they were wrong. If they meant something else, then what they said was confusing.

It has been said many times by judges that it is impossible and undesirable to define legal cruelty, since it can manifest itself in an infinite variety of ways. For instance, Channell, B., said in Kelly v. Kelly (1870), L.R. 2 P. & D. 59, at p. 60:—

"It would be difficult to frame a definition of legal cruelty which should be applicable to all cases which may arise ... It is obvious that the modes by which one of two married persons may make the life or the health of the other insecure are infinitely various, but as often as perverse ingenuity may invent a new manner of producing the result, the court must supply the remedy by separating the parties."

and Lord Tucker in Jamieson v. Jamieson [1952] A.C. 525, at p. 550, said:—

"... judges have always carefully refrained from attempting a comprehensive definition of cruelty for the purposes of matrimonial suits, and experience has shown the wisdom of this course. It is in my view equally undesirable—if not impossible—by judicial pronouncement to create certain categories of acts or conduct as having or lacking the nature or quality which render them capable or incapable in all circumstances of amounting to cruelty in cases where no physical violence is averred."

In spite of this, from time to time judges have sought some formula, or touchstone, whereby cruelty in law can be distinguished from conduct not amounting to such cruelty. We had the test of malignity. Hardly had this been suppressed, when it was supplanted by the test of "aimed at," which, to the discerning, was clearly malignity expressed in another form. The House of Lords, in Gollins v. Gollins [1964] A.C. 644, unanimously rejected this test; but the dust had hardly settled from this contest, when a new test appeared, in the tautological expression, "cruel means cruel." It is not hard to imagine that some courts will find this a substitute for malignity or "aimed at," since cruel conduct is generally malignant, and generally aimed at the other spouse.

That legal cruelty differs from ordinary cruelty (whatever that may mean) is easily demonstrated. Lord Merriman in Jamieson v. Jamieson, supra, at pp. 544-5, said:—

"... it is important to bear in mind that in determining 'what elements were treated as essential to the constitution of saevitia, or cruelty, which entitled to a divorce,' Lord Herschell was careful to point out that judges had not infrequently when speaking of acts as 'cruel,' used the word in its popular sense, and not as indicating that the acts were cruel in the legal acceptance of the term—that is to say, such as would entitle to a divorce' [1897] A.C. 395, (at p. 449), and he quoted pronouncements both of Lord Stowell and of Sir John Nicholl in that sense to illustrate the risk of confusion arising from the use of the words 'cruelty' and 'cruel' in the popular sense. Therefore, when the legal conception of cruelty is described as being conduct of such a character as to cause danger to life, limb or health, bodily or mental, or to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger, it is vital to bear in mind that it comprises two distinct elements: first, the ill-treatment complained of, and, secondly, the resultant danger or the apprehension thereof. Thus it is inaccurate, and liable to lead to confusion, if the word 'cruelty' is used as descriptive only of the conduct complained of, apart from its effect on the victim."

Presumably, what the lords justices in Le Brocq v. Le Brocq, supra, meant was not that legal cruelty and ordinary cruelty are the same, but that legal cruelty contains an essential element, namely, ordinary cruelty.

Hitherto, only two things could be said with certainty about legal cruelty. These were summarised by Scarman, J., in Noble v. Noble and Ellis (No. 2) [1964] 2 W.L.R. 349, at p. 351:—

“There are two tests of cruelty as I understand the law now to be. The first is this: is the conduct complained of sufficiently grave and weighty to warrant the description of being cruel? ... The second test, equally important, is: has the conduct complained of caused injury to health or reasonable apprehension of such injury.”

It is more than probable that the lords justices in Le Brocq, supra, when they said that “cruel means cruel,” meant that the conduct had to be grave and weighty. Indeed Harman, L.J., said as much when he remarked (at p. 1092):—

“‘Cruelty’ is what it always was—some grave and weighty misconduct on the part of the offending spouse which causes injury to health of the other spouse.”

The danger is that the insistence on the words “cruel means cruel” will induce courts to believe that this is an additional requirement to conduct which is grave and weighty. This has already been said by Sir Jocelyn Simon, P., in Mulhouse v. Mulhouse [1964] 2 All E.R. 50, where he lists four requirements to prove cruelty, namely: (1) grave and weighty conduct; (2) injury to health, etc.; (3) causation of (2) by (1); and (4) (at pp. 56-7) “it must be proved beyond reasonable doubt that the whole conduct of the respondent, taking into account its repercussion on the health of the complainant, can properly be described as cruelty in the ordinary sense of that term.”

The writer submits that (4) is not an additional requirement, in legal cruelty, and that at best, it is only admissible as a repetition of (1).

If “cruel means cruel” is a test of legal cruelty, then it is a pretty poor and unreliable one, as the Gollins case, supra, shows. On this test five of the judges concerned in that case would have found no cruelty. In the Divisional Court ([1964] P. 32, at p.46 (D.C. and C.A.)) Sir Jocelyn Simon, P., and Cairns, J., ended their judgment with these words:—

“Above all, we do not consider that the husband’s conduct however reprehensible, can properly be stigmatised by the word ‘cruelty’ in its ordinary acceptation.”

In the Court of Appeal, Harman, L.J., said (ibid., at p. 57):—

“Whatever opprobrious names one may give to this husband, I do not think ‘cruel’ is one of them.”

Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Hodson used similar expressions in the House of Lords.

What is meant by “cruelty in its ordinary acceptation”? It is not enough to say cruelty means what a jury would describe as cruel if the story were fully told, as suggested by Harman, L.J., in Le Brocq, supra, since a jury would have to be properly directed.

Dr. Johnson’s dictionary defines “cruel” of persons, as “pleased with hurting others; inhuman; hard-hearted; barbarous.”

Murray defines “cruel” of persons, and says it is also used in a transferred sense and figuratively of things as “disposed to inflict suffering; indifferent to or taking pleasure in another’s pain or distress; destitute of kindness or compassion; merciless; pitiless; hard-hearted.”

Webster, in its latest edition, defines it as disposed to inflict pain especially in a wanton, insensate or vindictive manner; pleased by hurting others; sadistic; devoid of kindness.”

It will be seen that Dr. Johnson and Murray distinguish between “cruel” as applied to persons, and “cruel” as applied to things or abstractions. When we say a judge is cruel, we mean he is sadistic, that he takes pleasure in punishing, that he does it intentionally, or deliberately. When we say a law is cruel, we mean that it has painful consequences.

As the above definitions show, in its ordinary sense, "cruel" usually means inflicting pain intentionally. It can mean wanton indifference but a jury would usually understand it to mean intentional. Now, since Gollins, supra, and Williams v. Williams [1964] A.C. 698, legal cruelty is to be understood by its consequences, rather than the state of mind of the cruel person.

The judges who said that the conduct of Mr. Gollins was not cruel as ordinarily understood were probably right, but nevertheless his conduct was held to constitute legal cruelty.

The majority judges in the Court of Appeal and House of Lords dealt with the subject as follows. Willmer, L.J., in a very careful judgment, had nothing to say about cruelty as ordinarily understood, but Davies, L.J., referring to words quoted above by the Divisional Court said:—

"This seems, with all respect, to be a dangerous test."

Lord Reid said, in Williams, supra, that "cruelty" in its ordinary or popular meaning was too vague, and in any event he took the view that cruel conduct need not be necessarily "blameworthy." Lord Pearce, in Gollins, says nothing directly on the point, but his view is expressed as follows (at p. 695):—

"I agree with Lord Merriman whose practice in cases of mental cruelty was always to make his mind first whether there was injury or apprehended injury to health. In the light of that vital fact the court has then to decide whether the sum total of the reprehensible conduct was cruel. That depends on whether the cumulative conduct was sufficiently weighty to say that from a reasonable person's point of view after a consideration of any excuse which this respondent might have in the circumstances, the conduct is such that this petitioner ought not to be called on to endure it."

Harman, L.J., in Le Brocq, supra, referred to this view as "a slippery slope." It is suggested that this slope is less slippery than the meaningless "cruel is cruel" slope.

Lord Evershed said in Gollins supra, (at p. 670):—

"The question in all such cases is, to my mind, whether the acts or conduct of the party charged were 'cruel' according to the ordinary sense of that word, rather than whether the party charged was himself or herself a cruel man or woman."

In its context, however, this only means that the test is an objective one, and does not depend on intention.

How, then, should a jury (or magistrates) be directed as to what is legal cruelty in cases not involving physical violence. It is submitted that the direction should be on the following lines.

There can be legal cruelty only if it is first proved that the respondent has caused injury to health, either physical or mental or that there is a reasonable apprehension that he is likely to do so. The conduct must be such that it can be described as grave and weighty. Cruel conduct can take an infinite variety of forms, and it is impossible to say that a particular type of conduct by itself is either cruel or not cruel. The conduct must be looked at as a whole and be related to the parties concerned. The object of the law is not to punish a wrongdoer but to protect the complaining party from injury to health. The test, therefore, is an objective one, namely, how the individual concerned is affected by the conduct complained of. It is no excuse to say that the conduct proceeds from selfishness or defect of character or even insanity. The conduct need not be intentional either in the sense that the respondent intended to hurt, or intended the acts which did hurt but intention is important because some conduct may be quite innocuous without intention to hurt.

There is no need in this direction to say anything about "cruelty" in its normal acceptation. At best, to do so would be redundant; at worst confusing, because it would mean defining that term and showing how it differs from legal cruelty.—L.R. in S.J.

LIABILITY: CONTRACT OR TORT?

IN Clark v. Kirby-Smith ((1964) 2 All E.R. 835) Plowman J. held that the Hedley Byrne principle did not apply as between solicitor and client, since the claim by the latter against the former must be founded on the contractual relationship between the two and did not arise in tort. A similar conclusion was reached by Diplock L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division, in Bagot v. Stevens Scanlan and Company (The Times, 14 July) with reference to the relationship between architect and client. The defendant architects in this case denied negligence but the matter came before his lordship on a preliminary point of law, namely, whether the six year period prescribed by the Limitation Act 1939 ran from the time when the supervision of the architects ceased or from the time when damage due to their alleged failure to exercise reasonable care became manifest. If the former were the test, the action was statute barred; if the latter, it was not.

In holding that the duty created by the relationship of exercising reasonable skill and care arose out of a contract and not otherwise, his lordship pointed out that the complaint was of a failure to do the very thing which the defendants had contracted to do. There might be cases where a similar duty was owed under a contract but were independent of contract. All those cases would turn out to be cases where the law, in the old days, recognised either a status, such as a public calling or that of master and servant, and in such cases it could properly be said that the relationship was independent of contract; or it recognised a relationship which gave rise to a duty of care which was not dependent upon the contractual relationship of the parties. But that did not apply to the present case. There did not appear to be anything in the relationship which could be said to give rise to a kind of status obligation which originated in the common law status relationship such as bailee, common carrier, or innkeeper. Accordingly, the plea that the claim was statute barred was a good defence, and the action was dismissed with costs.—L.T.

NEGLIGENCE

IN Haley v. London Electricity Board ((1963) 3 All E.R. 1003) the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R., Donovan and Danckwerts L.JJ.), affirming Marshall J., held that the defendants, who had protected an excavation in the highway, lawfully made in pursuance of a statutory duty, by a punner hammer set at an angle, were not liable for injuries sustained by a blind man, whose white stick passed over it, since the guard was an adequate and reasonable one for the protection of ordinary members of the public. There was nothing here to fix the defendants with direct notice that a blind man would be coming along the pavement during the course of the work. This decision was reversed by the House of Lords (Lords Reid, Morton, Evershed, Hodson and Guest) ((1964) 3 All E.R. 185), which held that the board's duties extended to blind persons. The punner hammer was a dangerous obstacle to such and it could not be said to be not reasonably foreseeable that a blind person might pass that way.

The plaintiff in Dunne v. North Western Gas Board ((1963) 3 All E.R. 916) sustained injuries from a street explosion due to the escape of gas below the highway. Gas, sewer and water pipes had been laid at various times and were in close proximity. A cracked water pipe led to a leak, which caused the collapse of the sewer, and that led to a fracture of the gas pipe. The trial judge found that the gas and sewer pipes were at the outset in a proper condition, that the gas board's system of inspection and maintenance was adequate, and that there was no negligence on the part of the board or the corporation. The Court of Appeal (Sellers, Danckwerts and Davies L.JJ.), reversing the Liverpool Court of Passage, held that Rylands v. Fletcher (1868, 19 L.T. 220; 3 H.L. 330) did not apply to the situation and that the position was governed by the principle enunciated by Lord Blackburn in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (1878, 3 App. Cas. 430) in these terms: "I take it, without citing cases, that it is now well established that no action will lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done without negligence, although it does occasion damage . . . " Hence the plaintiff could not recover.—L.T.

OCCUPIER'S LIABILITY

THE principle of the liability of an occupier to a trespasser in Latham v. Richard Johnson and Nephew Limited (108 L.T. 4; (1913) 1 K.B. 398), approved in Robert Addie and Sons (Collieries) Limited v. Dumbreck (140 L.T. 650; (1929) A.C. 358) and Edwards v. Railway Executive ((1952) 2 All E.R. 430), was applied by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Lords Radcliffe, Evershed, Guest, Upjohn and Donovan) in Commissioner for Railways v. Quinlan ((1964) 1 All E.R. 897)—a principle which had not been extended, it was held, by Donoghue v. Stevenson (147 L.T. 281; (1932) A.C. 562). In the result one who was a trespasser on a railway crossing, whose presence there was not proved to have been known to the occupier or known to have been likely or probable, was not entitled to damages for injuries sustained as the result of being struck by a passing train.—L.T.

PRIVILEGE (CROWN)

A minister's certificate to the effect that the minutes on an official metropolitan police file ought not to be produced because they belonged "to a class of official documents which it is necessary in the public interest for the proper functioning of the public service to withhold from production" was held by the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R., Harman and Salmon L.J.J.) to be insufficient to support a claim for Crown privilege in Merrick v. Nott-Bower ((1964) 1 All E.R. 717), in which the plaintiffs, serving police officers, claimed damages for libel alleged to be contained in a report from an Assistant Commissioner to the Commissioner. The passage from Lord Simon's speech in Duncan v. Cammell Laird ((1942) 1 All E.R. 587) from which the above-quoted words are taken was obiter and did not bind the court.

In affirming the decision of Ungood-Thomas J. ((1964) 2 All E.R. 674) in In re Grosvenor Hotel Limited (No. 2) to the effect that a further affidavit of the Minister of Transport afforded support for his claim that certain letters were privileged because their production would be contrary to the public interest, the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R. and Salmon L.J., Harman L.J. reserving his opinion) (The Times, 31 July) indicated that in relation to documents in a particular class the court had a residual power to override the executive's veto on production where Crown privilege was claimed unreasonably.—L.T.

REVIEWS.

An Introduction to Islamic Law. By JOSEPH SCHACHT. LONDON E.C.4: Oxford University Press, Amen House. 1964. Demi 8vo. Pages 304. Price 48s. net.

In the words of the author of this learned thesis this book is concerned with the unique historical phenomenon of Islamic law as such, and not with the contemporary laws of those countries in the Near East and elsewhere where Muslims live. It is in two sections, one containing an account of the present knowledge of the history of Islamic law and the other dealing with the system of Islamic law. In the historical section the author has restricted himself to the Sunni community and in the other section he has chosen the doctrine of the Hanafi school of law for exposition. The author traces the development of Islamic law against a varied political and administrative background from its pre-Islamic origins, on to the Koranic legislation and the periods of the Caliphs of Medina and Umayyads, the latter being the first dynasty in Islam under which the Islamic law came into being. This leads to the modern period with the rise of the two great Islamic States, the Ottoman and Moghul empires in which Islamic law attained its zenith. In the second section of the book the author has dealt with the Hanafi school of law because of its historical importance and wide distribution. After considering some of the fundamental concepts of Islamic law various topics like legal capacity and responsibility of persons, ownership and possession of property, obligation and contracts, marriage, divorce, inheritance and the penalties envisaged by Islamic law are dealt with. The book ends with an interesting chapter on the nature of Islamic law. A notable feature of this book is a very imposing bibliography which indicates publications useful or indispensable for further study of the subjects in question. This scholarly investigation of Islamic law which is the first of its kind in English and which is primarily addressed to students of history, social sciences and comparative law is a definite contribution to an important branch of Islamic studies.

Cases on Criminal Law. By J. W. CECIL TURNER, M.C. M.A., LL.D., and ARMITAGE, M.A., LL.B. LONDON: Cambridge University Press. BOMBAY: Macmillan & Co., Ltd., 276, Dr. Dadabhai Naoroji Road. Third Edition. 1964. Demi 8vo. Pages 664. Price Rs. 24; 30s. net.

THIS publication which is the first in the series of Cambridge Legal Case Books, is a well-established book on the substantive English Criminal Law and burden of proof. It is a compendium of cases arranged to follow the order of the subject-matter in the 18th edition of Kenny's classic "Outlines of Criminal Law." The paragraph numbers given at the head of each case correspond to those of the paragraphs in the "Outlines" which contain references to the principles which the case illustrates. The case law is brought down to October 1963. In the summary of cases the law is stated in the ipsissima verba of the Judges who decided them. This excellent handbook on English Criminal law which in its present edition is issued in paper cover so as to be within the reach of the student, will commend itself as an up to date, concise and authoritative statement of the law on the subject.

The Maharashtra Ownership Flats Act, 1963. By A. E. KARMALLI, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, High Court. BOMBAY 2: Kothari Mc-Duneil & Co., "A" Aidun Building, Dhobi Talao, 1st Lane. Demi 8vo. Pages 132. Price Rs. 8.50.

THE construction and sale of flats on ownership basis which began in 1948 led to a number of malpractices and irregularities among builders and contractors. The Maharashtra Ownership Flats (Regulation of the promotion of construction, sale, management and transfer) Act was passed in 1963 as a result of the recommendations made by the Commission appointed by the Government of Maharashtra to enquire into and report on the various aspects of the business of construction and sale of flats on ownership basis. The author has critically and lucidly explained the provisions of this short but unique piece of legislation in the light of some decided cases. Much useful material is included in the appendices e.g. the Rules made under the Act, standard agreements for sale of flats where the land is freehold and leasehold, information required for the purposes of formation of a co-operative housing society and the standard by-laws of a co-operative society. This book will be useful not only to the lawyers but also to ownership flat promoters and flat owners as a guide to their rights and liabilities under the Act.

PUBLIC PURPOSE AND PRIVATE ENTERPRISE.*

THE decision of the Supreme Court in *Somavanti v. State of Punjab*¹ is an important decision on the concept of public purpose. The majority of the Supreme Court upheld the acquisition of land by the State of Punjab for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of refrigeration machinery by a private limited company. The State Government had without resorting to Part VII of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, acquired the petitioner's lands for a public purpose by contributing Rs. 100 from the public funds towards a total cost of acquisition which was roughly estimated at over Rs. 4 lakhs. The majority held that the declaration made by the Government in the notification under s. 6(1) of the Act that the land was required for a public purpose was made conclusive by sub-s. (3) of s. 6 of the Act and that it was not open to the Court to go behind it and try to satisfy itself whether in fact the acquisition was for a public purpose, subject however to the exception that such a declaration could be challenged if there was a colourable exercise of power.

It was, therefore, unnecessary for the Court to pronounce on the nature of the purpose to be served by the proposed factory. However, the Court in meeting the argument that there was on Government's part a colourable exercise of power held that on the face of it the facts stated in the affidavits of the respondents showed that establishing the factory would be a purpose beneficial to the public even though it was a private venture. The decision, therefore, established a proposition of far-reaching importance in the law of compulsory acquisition of property viz. that a non-governmental commercial enterprise whose raison d'être one must assume is to make profit may serve a public purpose in marketing its produce.

That public purposes may be served by agencies which are neither controlled by government nor are charitable or philanthropic bodies is a proposition which is well-established in India. The Land Acquisition Act, 1894, itself permits acquisition of land for companies for the erection of dwelling houses for its workmen or for a work which the public have a right to use, which purposes the Supreme Court has stated are in substance public purposes² or public purposes in the restricted sense³. It has also been held in cases where lands have been acquired for co-operative housing societies that such housing societies subserve a public purpose⁴. These, and other cases under requisition and acquisition Acts also establish the proposition that to constitute a public purpose it is not essential that the use or benefit of the land or service should be available to the entire community or even to a considerable section of it. Provided that the persons using the land or service are benefited not as individuals but in furtherance of the general welfare of the community the test of numbers is generally irrelevant⁵.

The application of these principles becomes difficult when the service rendered to the public by the agency is by way of the products of an industry conducted in ordinary commerce. First, it is obvious that a mere production of the commodity for public use would not constitute a public purpose for if that were the test the production of any commodity from bread to vintage wines, would be a public purpose. Secondly, even where the nature of the produce or service is such that its availability would obviously enhance the welfare of the community like the manufacture of life saving drugs or the generation of electricity, important considerations like prices, profits, supply and distribution may negative the public purpose served by its production. On the other hand State regulation and control of the industry may ensure that its product would be so produced and distributed as best to subserve the public good.

It is well-settled in the United States that the power of eminent domain will not be exercised to enable individuals or private corporations to carry on their business even if the prosperity of the community will be enhanced by their success. In the United States, except in cases in which on account of the peculiar local conditions the acquisition of land for use of private individuals or corporations is justified, a private corporation must to be a beneficiary of the power of eminent domain be a public service corporation or a public utility concern. Such public utilities in the U.S. function either under legislative control or under special franchises and have the legal obligation to serve the public adequately without discrimination and at reasonable rates laid down by administrative agencies and also the duty to ensure continued service to the public.⁶ The compulsory acquisition of land to benefit a private company producing any commodity—even equipment for a public utility—would be inconceivable in the United States.

But, as has been repeatedly stressed in India and also in the United States, what constitutes public purpose is a matter of times, conditions and circumstances of the place where the power is sought to be used⁷. Totally different conditions prevail and political and economic theories hold sway in the United States from those in India. In the United States economic and political theory sharply distinguish the proper roles of the State and private enterprise and, in theory at least, restrict State interference to the minimum necessity in commerce and industry. In India as in many other developing countries the State has assumed a larger function in the economic development of the country and the functioning of a vast number of industries is considered as vitally tied up with the country's economic advancement and well being. Consequently, the State regulates by licensing and controls a vast sector of industry and commerce. Finally, the Constitution and the dominant public feeling approve the restriction or curtailment of individual property rights in the interest of economic advancement of the country. For all these reasons, the establishment of a commercial venture not necessarily of the public utility type may conceivably serve a public purpose and the importance of Somavanti's case lies in the fact that it foreshadows in the field of compulsory acquisition of property what is a fact of economic and political life of the country—that under regulated conditions there can be as much public benefit from the establishment of profit making enterprises by private bodies as from State enterprises.

In Somavanti's case the majority decision held that on the face of it the establishment of a factory for the manufacture of refrigeration parts would constitute a purpose beneficial to the public because of the importance of the undertaking to a State such as Punjab which has a surplus of fruit and dairy products, the general effect of the establishment of this factory on foreign exchange resources, spread of education, relieving pressure on unemployment⁸. Apparently, the majority do not make any reference to any regulation or control of the industry. It is submitted that the silence of the majority of the Court on this aspect is however not conclusive and does not lead to the inference that in the consideration of public purpose the Court will only look to the purported public benefit from the manufacture of the product. This is so because of two reasons.

First, the affidavit of the respondents stated that the Government of India accepting the recommendations made by the Licensing Committee under the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951, issued a licence in favour of the company, and the majority stated that they had no hesitation in acting upon these affidavits⁹. The latter Act it is well-known contains the most detailed provisions for the establishment, development, regulation, control and investigation of a large sector of industries. No such industry can be established without a licence from the Central Government and only on such terms in the licence as the Government deems fit. The Central Government has the power under the Act to regulate the supply, distribution and trade in any article relating to such an industry in the interest of securing its equitable distribution and availability at fair prices. The Central Government has further the power to assume direct management or control of an industrial undertaking in case the undertaking failed to carry out the directions of the Central Government. Therefore, though this aspect of the case does not find specific reference in the judgment of the majority it is clear that the operation of the Act on the industry would ensure that its products were not to be produced or marketed as to negative the public benefit from its manufacture.

Secondly, decided cases have stressed the regulation of a company or corporation in deciding the question of whether an acquisition or requisitioning for it is a public purpose. Thus, in Nanji's case where premises had been requisitioned on behalf of the State Transport Corporation the Supreme Court observed that the Corporation was a public utility concern and was under the effective control of the State Government¹⁰. In a Madras case,¹¹ Venkatarama Aiyer in meeting the objection that the Co-operative Housing Society for which lands had been acquired would benefit its members only and the profits of the society would go to them, referred to the control of the Society under the provisions of the Madras Co-operative Societies Act, 1932, by which profits of the Society were limited. Finally, in a recent case from Andhra Pradesh¹² the control of a company for the manufacture of sewing machines, for which lands had been acquired, under the provisions of a licence issued under the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951, was referred to in upholding the acquisition for a public purpose.

In *R. L. Arora v. State of U.P.*¹³ (The "second Arora" case) the Supreme Court repelled the petitioner's contention that it was not necessary for an agreement between the company and the Government under s. 41 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, to regulate or control the products of the company. Does this mean that the test of availability to the public of a product useful to the public is the only test for determining whether a public purpose is served by

8 The majority also referred to the settled American law that the power of eminent domain could be exercised in favour of public utilities and that facilities for providing refrigeration were regarded in modern times as public utilities. "All the greater reason that a factory which manufactures essential public utilities must be regarded as an undertaking carrying out a public purpose" (page 819). With respect, it is difficult to follow the argument. An undertaking is a public utility not merely because it serves the public but because it is regulated to ensure and achieve that result. The regulatory aspect of one public utility—the State Transport Corporation—is set out in State of Bombay v. R. S. Nanji, [1956] S.C.R. 18, at p. 22.

a company? It is submitted not. In the "second Arora" case the petitioner did not dispute that the purpose of the company for which land was being acquired was a public purpose, but merely contended that the agreement between the company and the Government for the use of land under s. 41 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, should regulate and control the product of the company, a contention which as the Supreme Court rightly observed, was difficult to understand.

The precise outlines of the circumstances under which private enterprises can serve a public purpose have yet to be developed. To use the celebrated language of Justice Holmes "the lines are to be picked out by gradual approach and contact of decisions on either side".

SPOTLIGHT ON EMERGENCY.*

THE emergency provisions in the Constitution have, of late, been the subject of considerable controversy. In what follows it is proposed to discuss the well-known judgment of the Supreme Court regarding this subject, the proposal for the eighteenth amendment and the emergency provision generally and comparatively.

In September, 1962, the Chinese attacked India and in accordance with the Constitution, in October 1962 the President issued a Proclamation of Emergency. By the middle of November resort to Courts to enforce rights to personal liberty¹, fair trial² and equality before law³ was stopped. Under the extraordinary powers thus assumed Parliament passed the Defence of India Act. Under that act the Central Government was empowered to make such rules as appeared to it necessary for the defence of India, public order etc. and for the detention in custody of any person whom the authority empowered suspected on grounds appearing to that authority to be reasonable, of being of hostile origin or having acted or being likely to act in manner prejudicial to the defence of India, public order etc.⁴

The rules framed under this Act completely exhaust the above powers. The detainee has no right to know the grounds of his detention, no right to make any representation and the period of his detention can be indefinite.⁵

The decision under present discussion concerned a group of 26 appeals placed for hearing and disposal before a Special Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court and may for the sake of convenience be referred to as the decision in *Makhan Singh v. State of Punjab*⁶.

As is to be expected personal liberty was the first victim of these powers. The appellants were detained under the above Act and rules and they sought an order under s. 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code for their release on the ground that the above Act and rules were constitutionally invalid and hence they had been improperly and illegally detained.

What is the scope of judicial review under these circumstances? What shall be the powers of the legislature and the executive when there is an emergency and when there is not such an emergency after all? In this connection what does the term emergency mean? Are there various shades of its meaning; is it susceptible of definition? These are the issues which ultimately arise here for a constitutional lawyer.

As can be seen it would be open to the detainees to apply for a writ of habeas corpus under arts. 32 and 226, but since that procedure was denied to them by the exercise of powers under art. 359 they sought to make use of the ordinary law of the land. The majority of the Court held that even in applying under

s. 491⁷ of the Code of Criminal Procedure the appellants were trying to enforce their fundamental right to personal liberty and this was not open to them after the President had exercised his powers under art. 359. The minority view contrary to the above was expressed by Subba Rao J. According to him s. 491 was not a right to move a Court for the enforcement of a fundamental right. It was already there before the Constitution (and hence before the fundamental rights) came into existence. It postulated the existence of the rule of law. Under that no person could be deprived of his liberty except in the manner prescribed by the law of the land. A petition under s. 491 was, therefore, for the enforcement of a right based on the principle of rule of law and not for the enforcement of a fundamental right.

During the course of the hearing it was also argued on behalf of the appellants that what could be suspended under the Presidential order under art. 359 was the operation of art. 32 and not of art. 226. According to them in applying art. 359 two conditions must be complied with, namely (i) the party shall have a right to move any Court and (ii) only for the enforcement of the rights conferred by Part III. Such a right to move for such relief is expressly conferred by the Constitution under art. 32. Therefore, the President's order under art. 359 could only apply to art. 32 and not to art. 226.

For a consideration of this argument interpretation of arts. 359 and 226 became necessary. Various authorities were consulted for this: *Liversidge v. Anderson*⁸, *Rex v. Halliday*⁹ and Gibbons v. Ogden,¹⁰ were summoned in aid and even the opinions of academic lawyers (seldom, if ever, treated with deference in this country) were referred to.¹¹ After a thorough investigation of this all important point of interpretation their Lordships finally opined that the words "right to move", "any court" and "for the enforcement of the rights conferred by Part III" in art. 359 indicated that not only art. 32 but also art. 226 was embraced by art. 359.

But what about the very object of these interpretations? Did it not, (one wonders) concern something called judicial review to check arbitrary executive action for protection of a thing called individual liberty? Was Liversidge v. Anderson merely about the question of interpretation?

Before going into these somewhat feeble if relevant queries the merits of this decision regarding interpretation might be examined.

First of all the type of right under art. 226 is not the same as in art. 32(I). Quite apart from the fact that it is not a guaranteed right it is also not a right so clearly spelt out. On a plain reading of it art. 226 is intended to and only confers power on the State High Courts. The fact that this power is used to vindicate fundamental rights cannot convert that power into a right. Both the majority and the minority judgments admit that under art. 226(I) the High Courts' have a discretion vested in them but they only infer it as a kind of right because the High Courts cannot capriciously or unreasonably refuse to entertain the said applications. Indeed, the minority judgment admits¹² that the Supreme Court under art. 32 cannot say that it will not decide on merits but the High Courts in the exercise of jurisdiction can do so.¹³ Has no meaning to be given to the word 'power'? Is it to be construed as a synonym for a corresponding right? The fact that the discretion cannot be exercised capriciously or unreasonably only means that the Court has to lay down principles on which the discretion would be exercised.

Secondly, see art. cl. (4) of art. 32. It shows that art. 32(I) cannot be suspended except under art. 359. There is no such provision in art. 226. Does it mean that while art. 32(I) can be suspended under art. 359 after proclaiming emergency under art. 352, art. 226 can be suspended under any other circumstances and in any other manner? No such circumstances or method exist under the Constitution. By implication it means that art. 226 cannot be suspended; but there is no question of suspending it because it is not a right. It is only in so far as art. 226 affords a right in the sense that the Courts cannot act capriciously or unreasonably that a right is suspended but the discretion of the High Courts is not taken away. This is the interpretation which gives meaning to the words "any courts" meaning other Courts apart from the Supreme Court. It is only because the citizen under art. 32 can come to the Court as a matter of right and enforce his fundamental rights that the operation of art. 32 needs to be suspended. This is to prevent the citizen from forcing the hands of the Court where for example in an emergency the decision is purely administrative or all facts cannot be disclosed to a Court.

Take a look at arts. 358 and 359. Article 358 suspends the fundamental rights under art. 19, whereas under art. 359 only the right to enforce the rights mentioned in the President's order is suspended. What could be the purpose of this? If the jurisdiction of the Courts under art. 226 was also suspended what could be the purpose of keeping the rights alive?

Again notice the last words of art. 358, viz. "except as respect... ceases to have effect". Such a clause is absent in art. 359. Why should this be so? Was this done in order that the Central and State Government may at the termination of the order under art. 359 be saddled with huge bills of damages for violation of rights kept alive?¹⁴ Indeed, while framing the Constitution a suggestion was made by one of the members that there should be a provision for enabling Parliament to pass an Act indemnifying any person or a authority from the consequence of any act done bona fide during the period of emergency.¹⁵ This was rejected¹⁶. Now, if the jurisdiction of the Courts under art. 226 is not suspended a citizen who after approaching a High Court fails in enforcing his rights, because the Court after considering his application refuses to grant him relief, cannot sue the State in damages.

It has been said above that Liversidge v. Anderson was considered here as a guide to decide the question of interpretation. Now what was Liversidge v. Anderson about? What did it decide? The first thing that strikes one is that it was a wartime decision, when actual fighting was going on. The words which fell for construction were "if the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe". The real question which the Court was deciding was whether the Court would interfere with an executive decision in the interest of the personal liberty of an individual. It was fully conscious of the circumstances in which the statute in question was passed¹⁷, its object and provisions.¹⁸ The decision of the majority turned on the following considerations—

1. The decision for detention by the Secretary of State required political or administrative considerations.¹⁹

2. Fact on which detention order was based could not be disclosed in Court.²⁰

3. A high officer i.e. Secretary of State was entrusted with the power of detention.²¹

4. Under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and Defence (General Regulation) 1939:

(a) The person detained could make a representation in writing to an Advisory Committee.²²

(b) The Chairman of the Committee was to inform him of the grounds on which the order had been made and furnish him with such particulars as were in the opinion of the Chairman sufficient to enable him to present his case.²³

Although the words which have fallen for construction here might be different, the issue here is the same, i.e. the place of judicial review in a national emergency. Are the circumstances here the same? Does the Constitution here provide the same safeguards? Even after the President has passed an order under art. 359 is it not possible to pass a statute which may not always require an administrative decision based on facts which cannot be disclosed in Court? There is no need for an answer.

Since it was here held that the President, under art. 359, can only suspend the remedies for enforcing certain fundamental rights and not the rights themselves the Government became apprehensive about huge bills of damages for violation of fundamental rights at the end of the period of emergency. The eighteenth amendment bill is a result of this feeling of apprehension. It sought to do two things i.e. one, to remove the distinction between arts. 358 and 359, i.e. of suspending the rights and suspending the remedies and two, to provide for indemnity for acts done under Government orders in violation of fundamental rights during the emergency. In view of what has been said above does the Constitution need an amendment?

Be all that as it may, some questions trouble the mind. Is it absolutely necessary to leave the declaration of "emergency" to the subjective satisfaction of the executive? Is the judiciary by its nature incapable of saying anything about it? Thus arise the old questions.

In at least one situation the Courts can and should be permitted to have the final say. That is when there is a state of profound peace—when it is not a question of degree. It does seem rather odd that the Courts should be asked to take for granted that there is a war on when in fact there is none. In this respect the position is the same in India as in England where the certificate of the Secretary of State is conclusive. That such a situation can lead to manifest injustice is clear. In *R.V. Bottrill*²⁵ an interned German was refused a writ of habeas corpus because he was an alien and the Secretary of State had issued certificate that a State of war existed between Germany and England. This was in the year 1946 when actual peace existed between the two countries and there was no danger of fighting breaking out.

The problem is more difficult when there is a war or threat of war, but it is not as if there are no examples before us from which inferences can be drawn. In various jurisdictions, through the interpretation of different heads of legislative power the Courts have taken into account the circumstances in which certain measures may be justified. Thus in Australia the "Defence Power" of the Commonwealth has performed this function. By laying down the requirement that the object of the legislation in question must have connection with the subject of defence the Courts have taken the circumstances into account.²⁶

Again in Canada the "Peace, Order and good Government" power in s.91 of the British North America Act has been construed by Courts as an emergency power, and in doing so, the Courts have invariably taken the circumstances of the use of the power into account.²⁷

²⁴ Regulation 18 B, cl. (6).

On this matter the position in the U.S.A. presents an acceptable via media. It has been held there that great weight is given to the opinion of the Legislature that 'emergency' exists, but that it is not the only judge of this fact.²⁸

Among the modern Constitutions, the Constitution of the Federation of Nigeria recognises the place of Courts in emergencies.²⁹

It may, of course, be said that since the primary duty for protecting the security of the State rests on the Legislature it should be the only judge of the circumstances justifying a particular measure. A democratically elected Legislature, it is argued, knows the requirements of the times better than a Court can. All this may be true but is it suggested that in a constitutional democracy there is no responsibility on Courts? Are Constitutions merely meant to grant powers to Legislatures or are they also meant to safeguard citizens against States? What is to become of that? It is humbly submitted that the Courts have this duty. In excluding the Courts from this function a nervousness is betrayed which is not justified by experience.

With the change in conditions of life and changing international situations the word "emergency" is acquiring an increasingly variable content. There might be war or threat of war, internal subversion or a financial crisis but a new type of emergency is now recognised viz. continuous subversion or threat of subversion.³⁰ This new position in a constitutional set up is something to notice and to think of.

A "law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry and renders judgment only after trial"³¹ is no longer of general applicability.

In the problems discussed above it is difficult to express any definite opinion one way or the other without either being labelled "irresponsible" or being charged with having no regard for democratic rights. Lack of clarity is written in the very nature of things. First it seems clear that safeguards to democratic rights from a Legislature are not adequate where there is one party with an absolute and overwhelming majority. Secondly, when there is provision that Constitutional amendment can only be carried out by two thirds majority there should be a similar provision for approval of declaration of emergency by Parliament since the effect of such declaration of the Constitution is considerable. Thirdly, a plain reading of art. 352 suggests that once Parliament has approved the declaration of emergency, it can do precious little about it. The sole power of withdrawal lies with the President. Should this be allowed to continue? Should not Parliament have any say regarding its withdrawal? How about requiring the President to get a renewal of proclamation periodically? Fourthly, while art. 359 enables the President to suspend the enforcement of fundamental rights in any part of India it does not oblige him to confine such suspension only in those parts where the emergency really exists. Should this co-relation not be established?

GLEANINGS.

THE LOST WILL

THE loss of a will after the death of a testator but before it has been proved does not necessarily frustrate the last wishes of the deceased, the Court having power to grant probate of the will as contained in a completed draft or a reconstruction of that instrument. The position is more difficult in a case where the deceased person was known, or believed, to have made a will, but the document cannot be found among his papers after his death. In a case of this kind there is a presumption that the will was destroyed by the testator animo revocandi, though this presumption is capable of rebuttal. On an application to prove a lost will the Court must be satisfied as to the following points:

(i) How the will came to be lost, in so far as this is possible, and what efforts have been made to find it.

(ii) Whether the missing paper was a properly executed will.

(iii) Whether the testator had destroyed it animo revocandi or adhered to it at his death.

(iv) What were its contents.

It is proposed to discuss these various points and consider some of the relevant cases decided by the Courts.

If the will has come into the possession of a person after the death of the testator, the circumstances in which the will was lost or mislaid can usually be given, but where the will cannot be found after the testator's death the matter is more complicated. It would have to be shown that a thorough search had been made in all possible places where the deceased kept his papers; enquiry could be made at his bank or place of business, or of any solicitor with whom he had had dealings and of relatives and friends. An advertisement could be inserted in an appropriate newspaper or legal journal; in fact the enquiries should be thoroughly exhaustive.

Where the witnesses to the will are known and can be traced, this should present no difficulty, especially if the will was prepared by a solicitor and witnessed by members or employees of the firm. It may be that evidence of due execution could be obtained from a fourth party who, although not signing as a witness, was present at the time of execution. Failing this, if there is evidence that the missing paper bore the signatures of the testator and of two witnesses, the Court may apply the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta if the circumstances so warrant, as was done in the case of Re Webb (deceased), Smith v. Johnston ([1964] 2 All E.R. 91). In Harris v. Knight ((1880) 15 P.D. 170), Lindley, L.J., said (at p. 179): "The maxim comes into operation only where there is no proof one way or the other; but where it is more probable that what was intended to be done was done as it ought to have been done to render it valid, rather than that it was done in some other manner which would defeat the intention proved to exist, and would render what is proved to have been done of no effect". In this case the will was produced at the funeral of the testator and was said to have had three signatures but no attestation clause. In another case the will was read by two people who were able to say that the will bore a proper attestation clause with the signatures of the testator and two witnesses, though they could not remember the names or addresses of the witnesses, nor were able to trace them by advertisement. The will had been lost in the post in transit to a solicitor and the Court pronounced for a reconstruction (In the Estate of Phibbs (deceased) [1917] P. 93). It should be noted that statements made by the testator to a third party touching the execution of his will will not be admitted in proof of due execution (Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1876) 1 P.D. 154, following In the Goods of Ripley (1858) 1 Sw. & Tr. 68); nor could such statements be received as evidence of revocation (Atkinson v. Morris [1897] P. 40). In this case it was said that the testatrix had executed the will in duplicate, both copies being retained by her. At her death only one copy could be found and in that the signature of the testatrix and one of the witnesses were struck through in ink and there was a statement in the handwriting of the testatrix to the effect that the will was null and void. It was argued that it was obvious that the testatrix had destroyed one copy of the will animo revocandi and that this was supported both by the writing on the retained copy and also by a verbal statement made by the testatrix to her companion to the same effect, but it was held that the will must stand.

When the will cannot be found after the death of the testator the question arises, has he destroyed it with the intention of revoking it, or did he still adhere to it at the time of his death? In the case of Re Webb (supra) the presumption of revocation by destruction was overcome by the evidence of a sister who deposed that shortly before the death of the testatrix she found the completed draft of the will amongst her sister's papers. On being told that the will was out of date as several named beneficiaries had died, the testatrix said that the will was not to be destroyed, but that her sister could take it with her to have it re-done and bring another will form next time she came; she died however before this could be done. The completed draft was admitted to probate, the original will, which had been retained by the solicitor who prepared it, having been lost when the solicitor's office was destroyed by enemy action.

In Sugden's case (supra), the testator had made a will and eight codicils, but after his death the will could not be found though the codicils were intact. Evidence was given that the testator was a lawyer and that various papers and statements made by him pointed to his continued adherence to the will. It was said that he would be unlikely to have destroyed the will and retained the codicils without making another will. In the circumstances the Court held that the presumption of rebuttal did not apply.

The best evidence as to the contents of a missing will is the production of a completed draft or copy of the will as executed, which can be set up by the person who completed the draft or made the copy and compared it with the original. Failing this, the Court may pronounce for the will as contained in a reconstruction. This can be made by the person or persons who prepared the will or who read it subsequently and can therefore speak as to the various provisions contained in the will. It has been said that parol evidence of the contents of the lost instrument may be received as much when it is a will as if it were any other document (Brown v. Brown (1858) 27 L.J.Q.B. 173); but such evidence must be admitted with caution. The standard of proof required for the reconstruction of a lost will by such evidence was no different from the standard of proof in other case, namely, the establishment of reasonable probability as to the terms of the document (In the Estate of Wippermann [1953] 1 All E.R. 764). In Phibb's case (supra), an epitome of the lost will drawn up by the two people who had read the original, confirmed by two letters of the testator found with his papers, was accepted by the Court. In Harris v. Knight (supra), the contents of the missing will were established by the recollection of someone who had read it, confirmed by verbal statements which had been made by the testator. The Judge said that the disposition of the estate as set out was reasonable and probable.

In Sugden's case (supra) it was held that verbal statements made by the testator both before and after execution of the will may be admitted in evidence to prove the contents of the will, though not, as has been seen, to prove execution or revocation, since this would tend to evade the requirements of the Wills Act 1837 which governs these matters. Nor would such evidence be accepted to clear up a mistake or ambiguity as regards the designation of a person or property.

The fact that it is not possible to ascertain the complete contents of the lost will is no bar to admitting to probate so much as can be ascertained (Sugden's case (supra)). It was said that the wishes of the testator should not be frustrated on the ground that some may fail to profit by reason that they might have had some benefit under parts of the will which cannot be recollected.

Unless the matter has been raised in a probate action, the application to prove a lost will as contained in a copy, draft or reconstruction thereof, must be made in the first place to a Registrar of the Principal Probate Registry who may refer the matter to a Judge if he considers the circumstances made that necessary or desirable (Non-contentious Probate Rules 1954 r. 53 and r. 60, and see In the Estate of Nuttall (deceased) [1955] 2 All E.R. 921). The application must be supported by affidavits setting out all the relevant details, and the consents of all persons who might be prejudiced by the order sought should be obtained if possible, though in a clear case such consents might be dispensed with (In the Goods of Hannah Apted [1899] P. 272).—F. C. Ottway (L.J.)

VOLENTI

Two important points of law were involved in the recent decision of the House of Lords (Lords Reid, Radcliffe, Hodson, Pearce and Donovan) in Imperial Chemical Industries Limited v. Shatwell (The Times, 7 July), reversing that of the Court of Appeal (Ormerod, Upjohn and Davies L.JJ.), which affirmed Elwes J. Experienced shotfirers who had deliberately ignored the Quarries (Explosives) Regulations 1959 were injured in consequence, and one of them had recovered substantial damages against the employers, who had done everything possible to enforce the safety regulations, publicly punished and degraded a shotfirer who had been guilty of the same offence and faced trouble with the union in consequence. They had arranged a system of work and pay designed to discourage the taking of risks and Lord Pearce observed that a result which would entitle each of the shotfirers to recover damages from the employers on the ground of the other's negligence and breach of statutory duty and rendered the employers vicariously liable offended against common sense.

The first point to which attention should be drawn was dealt with by Lord Reid, who said that the defence volenti non fit injuria, upon which the House based its decision, had had a chequered history. At one time it had been very strictly applied. More recently it appeared to have been thought in some quarters that, at least as between master and servant, it was a dead or dying defence. His lordship thought that this might be due to the fact that in most cases where the defence would now be available it had become usual to base the decision on contributory negligence. When the plaintiff's own disobedient act was the sole cause of his injury it did not matter in the result whether one said 100 per cent contributory negligence or volenti non fit injuria. But it did matter in a case like the present. If the inaccurate habit of using the word "negligence" to denote a deliberate act done with full knowledge of the risk was adopted, it was not surprising that difficulties arose. There was a world of difference between two fellow servants collaborating carelessly so that the acts of both contributed to cause injury to one of them and two fellow servants combining to disobey an order deliberately when they knew the risk involved. It seemed reasonable that the injured man should recover some compensation in the former case but not in the latter. If the law treated both as merely cases of negligence it could not draw a distinction. But, in his lordship's view, the law did, and should, draw a distinction. In the first case only the partial defence of contributory negligence was available; in the second volenti was a complete defence if the employer had not himself been at fault and was only liable vicariously for the acts of the fellow servant. A plaintiff who invited or freely aided and abetted his fellow servant's disobedience was volens in the fullest sense and could not complain of the resulting injury either against the fellow servant or against the master on the ground of his vicarious responsibility.

The second point arose from the argument that there was a general rule that the defence of volenti non fit injuria was not available where there had been a breach of statutory duty. Lord Reid said it would be odd if that were so. He could find no reason at all why the fact that the two shotfirers agreed to commit an offence by contravening a statutory prohibition imposed on them, as well as agreeing to defy their employer's orders, should affect the application of the volenti non fit injuria principle either to an action by one of them against the other or to an action by one against their employer based on his vicarious responsibility for the conduct of the other. The statutory regulation in this case placed the duty on the workmen personally, and Lord Hodson observed that in a situation such as this the pull of public opinion was in a direction opposite from that taken in cases where the statutory duty was imposed directly on the employer.— L.T.

MASTER AND SERVANT

In Imperial Chemical Industries Limited v. Shatwell ((1964) 2 All E.R. 999) the House of Lords (Lords Reid, Radcliffe, Hodson, Pearce and Donovan), reversing the Court of Appeal (Ormerod, Upjohn and Davies L.JJ.), which had affirmed Elwes J., held that employers, who had taken every precaution to see that the Quarries (Explosives) Regulations 1959 were observed, were not liable for injuries sustained by a shotfirer who had deliberately ignored the regulations. The duty imposed by the regulations were laid on the shotfirer personally, and the case was covered by the principle volenti non fit injuria.

In Vickers v. British Transport Docks Board (The Times, 25 March) the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R., Pearson and Salmon L.JJ.), reversing Marshall J., held that the plaintiff, who was injured when employed by the first defendant in loading rails on to a ship for the second defendant exporters, was not entitled to recover against either of the defendants. The operation in which the man was engaged required considerable exertion and involved some risk, the latter being increased by the fact that paint applied to the rails to indicate their destination was wet. Factors leading to the Court of Appeal's decision were that the increase in risk due to the paint being wet was minimal, that delay until the paint had dried would have been extremely inconvenient and involved demurrage of £500 a day, and that the common law, while solicitous for the safety of workmen, did not render an employer negligent merely because the work involved was to some extent dangerous. The principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson (147 L.T. 281; (1932) A.C. 562) did not apply to the exporters, for, if the employers should have waited until the paint was dry, there would have been a break in the link of causation and the proximity between the employers' workmen and the exporters would not have been sufficiently close.

The plaintiff in Doughty v. Turner Manufacturing Company Limited ((1964) 1 All E.R. 98) was injured as the result of a loose cover constructed of special material being inadvertently knocked into a cauldron used for the heat treatment of metal parts. The contents of the cauldron erupted and gave rise to an explosion. It was subsequently discovered by experiment that the compound of which the cover was constructed underwent a chemical change at great heat such as that to which it had been subjected. The Court of Appeal (Lord Pearce, Harman and Diplock L.JJ.) held, reversing Stabile J., applying Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Limited v. Morts Dock and Engineering Company Limited ((1961) 1 All E.R. 404) and distinguishing Hughes v. Lord Advocate ((1963) 1 All E.R. 705), that the employers were not liable, because the explosion was unforeseeable by a reasonable man at the time when it occurred. Although the risk of injury by splashing was foreseeable, the chemical change which caused the explosion was not.—L.T.

REVIEWS.

Legal System and Lawyer's Reasonings. By JULIUS STONE, LL.M. (Leeds), S.J.D. (Harvard), B.A., D.O.L. (Oxford). BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. 1964. Roy. 8vo. Pages 454. Price Rs. 50.

THIS volume is the first one of a series of three works in which this distinguished savant seeks to survey the contemporary problems falling within the field of jurisprudence. In his earlier work The Province and Function of Law he had offered the divisions of jurisprudence under the rubrics "Law and Logic", "Law and Justice," and "Law and Society." The projected three works correspond respectively to the aforesaid divisions and the present work studies "the processes of judicial and juristic thought and the place therein of logic and other kinds of reasoning; and to do this against a background understanding of the elements of unity and disunity within a growing legal order". The book opens with a critical examination of some of the main conceptions of John Austin who was the first exponent of modern analytical jurisprudence. This is followed by a consideration of Hans Kelsen's pure theory of law which confined jurisprudence to a structural analysis of positive law to separate legal science from philosophy of justice and sociology of law. Wesley Newcomb Hohfeld's eight fundamental legal conceptions, namely, rights and duties, privileges and no-rights, powers and liabilities, immunities and disabilities, are next examined. The latter half of the book deals with the actual achievements of modern Courts and inter alia presents the general problem of the relation between logical reasoning and social change and the "categories of illusory reference" frequently present in the legal propositions which serve as premises for judicial reasoning. For readers who find the theoretical portion of the book heavy-going there is ample material here to interest and instruct them, e.g. the discussions on the common law theory of precedent, the principle of stare decisis, ratio decidendi and the scope for judicial creativeness in the interpretation of legislation. The author who is rightly described as the Roscoe Pound of the British legal world and who has devoted nearly four decades to the study of the problems discussed in the present work has in the text referred to nearly seven hundred English and American decisions and about a thousand items of legal literature are included in the bibliography. This closely reasoned and thought provoking thesis on an aspect of the present state of juristic knowledge set against the background of its historical setting will be invaluable to lawyers and particularly to judges who are aware of their creative role in legal growth and change.

The Republic of India. By ALAN GLEDHILL, M.A. (Cantab.), LL.D. (Lond.), I.C.S. (Retd.), of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-law. LONDON: Stevens & Sons Limited, 11 New Fetter Lane. Second edition. 1964. Roy. 8vo. Pages 399. Price £ 3 10s. net.

THIS is the second edition of a book which explains the Constitution of India and the body of law in force in India by an experienced teacher who had also extensive practical experience as an administrator in India. Since the first edition was published there have been a large number of constitutional amendments and some 500 Acts have been passed by Parliament between 1950 and 1956. All this has necessitated much revision and re-writing of a large part of the original work. The author after tracing the evolution of the Constitution from the time of the East India Company, explains the present constitutional position in the light of judicial pronouncements. In the latter half of the book the author has dealt with the Indian legal system and after considering its historical background has described the various aspects of it such as the criminal and civil law, property and industrial law and the personal laws of Hindus and Moslems. There is a very useful table of statutes and cases at the end of the book. One small point which needs correction in a future edition of the book is the rather disconcerting reference—at least to an Indian reader—to “Mr. J. H. Nehru” in three places. This book which is one of a series of books designed to give a succinct, accurate and up to date account of the development of the laws and constitutions of the British Commonwealth will be invaluable to students of constitutional law and the general reader.

Commentary on the Constitution of India. Volume V. By DURGA DAS BASU. Fourth Edition. CALCUTTA 12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. 1964. Roy. 8vo. Pages cxlix+665. Price Rs. 40.

THE final volume of this monumental commentary on the Constitution of India completes the topic of Services begun in the previous volume and brings the commentary on the text of the Constitution to an end. The legislative powers vis-a-vis those obtaining in other countries are discussed at length and this will prove useful to the lawyers as well as the legislators. The Emergency Provisions of the Constitution included in this volume acquire a special significance in the light of the Proclamation of Emergency in 1962 because of threatened external aggression and the various aspects of these provisions are dealt with. This volume also contains a cumulative table of cases and a cumulative index covering the five published volumes. It is now late in the day to touch on the merits of a work which has held the field for over a decade as an authoritative and exhaustive exposition of the Constitution of India. The author has adopted the comparative method of treatment to expound the various provisions by discussing the parallel provisions of the leading Constitutions of the world. Although he has primarily presented a juridical interpretation of the Constitution its political and constitutional aspects are not overlooked. This publication is not only indispensable to every constitutional lawyer but like its previous editions will be of inestimable help to parliamentarians and students of political science and comparative politics.

The Machinery of Justice in England. By R. M. JACKSON, LL.D. Fourth Edition. 1964. Cambridge University Press. BOMBAY 1: Macmillan & Co., Ltd., 276, Dr. Dadabhai Naoroji Road. Demi 8vo. Pages 456. Price Rs. 36; 45 s. net.

THIS is an extremely interesting and highly readable account of the system of law Courts and allied matters relating to the administration of justice in England. It deals refreshingly and critically with such topics as the civil and criminal jurisdiction, the various Courts and tribunals and their personnel. In this fourth edition the author has entirely revised the text in the light of recent changes in law and practice. A new section has been added on contempt of Court and habeas corpus proceedings which matters have been altered by legislation. The Administration of Justice Act, 1960, has necessitated a thorough revision of the section dealing with Courts with appellate criminal jurisdiction. The trial at common law is examined vis-a-vis the principle of open Court and the position of the press and the changes in legal aid are indicated. The Ingleby Committee Report on children and young persons and the Streetfield Committee's Report on the business of the criminal Courts which latter led to the passing of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1962, are fully discussed. The author has put in a strong plea for the modernisation of the machinery of justice to bring it in conformity with the conditions of a changing society and has some hard words to say about a legal system which “has been more successful in allowing Rachmanism to flourish than in furthering the policies of decent national development”. This concise account of the present workings of the English legal system is a minor classic which can be read with much profit not only by the members of the legal profession in this country but also by those interested in public affairs who are alive to the problem of bringing the administration of law nearer to the needs of the present day.

Proceedings of the Seminar on Current Problems of Corporate Law, Management and Practice. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd. Royal 8vo. Pages 434. Price Rs. 25.

THIS recent addition to a series of useful monographs published by the Indian Law Institute contains the proceedings of the Seminar held at New Delhi in 1962, which was attended by law teachers of several Indian and foreign universities, judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts and distinguished lawyers and administrators of company law. The Seminar deliberated particularly on the law and regulations relating to the organisation and working of joint stock enterprises including contemporary business methods and practices. A portion of the book is devoted to the proceedings of the Seminar held under the chairmanship of some eminent jurists where various problems connected with the working of the corporate sector were discussed, such as the concept of corporate personality and international law, corporate management and its nature and obligations, supervision and control of corporate administration and company law and accounts. The latter half of the book contains extracts from papers read at the Seminar which had formed the basis of the discussions. These proceedings of the Seminar which stressed the significance and importance of the law of corporate enterprise in India and which sought to identify specific topics for research in company law will be welcomed by students of company law as a source-book for further research and study.

The Sale of Goods Act. By P. RAMANATHA AIYAR, Senior Advocate. Second Edition, 1964, by K. VENKOBABAO, M.L. ALLAHABAD: The University Book Agency, Elgin Road. Roy. 8vo. Pages 320. Price Rs. 15.

IN the three decades that have passed since the first publication of this book, a large amount of Indian and English case law on the subject has been reported. The present editor has incorporated all this case law in the text and in the process has removed obsolete matter and added new matter at the appropriate places. He has however kept to the original presentation of the subject except where later case law has necessitated re-writing of the text. The Sale of Goods Act, 1930, is based on the English Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and the author in his commentary has not only cited important English decisions but in respect of each section of the Indian Act he has indicated the corresponding provisions of the English Act with the differences, if any, between the two enactments. The basic principles underlying some of the important provisions of the Act are explained in the light of judicial pronouncements. The appendices contain some useful matter including the English Sale of Goods Act, the Indian Bills of Lading Act, 1856, and the Forward Contracts (Regulation) Act, 1952. This lucid and well-nigh exhaustive exposition of an important branch of contractual law will prove useful to lawyers, businessmen and students of law.

Taxation of Indian and Foreign Companies in India. By A. G. VENKATARAMAN, Chartered Accountant. BOMBAY 2: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. Demi 8vo. Pages 148. Price Rs. 15.

THE rapid industrial development in India since Independence and the growth of the corporate sector has brought in its wake foreign technical and financial participation and the appointment of foreign technicians. This in turn has attracted the incidence of corporate taxes on various kinds of income of Indian and foreign companies as well as tax on foreign technicians. The present brochure meets a long felt want for a concise yet accurate statement of the Indian corporate law for the guidance of foreign corporations and their tax consultants. The author after explaining the basic principles of taxation in India and the taxation of Indian companies has dealt with the essential provisions of taxation of foreign companies and foreign technicians. There are a number of appendices which contain information useful to Indian and foreign companies which cover particulars that are required to be furnished to the Government by companies contemplating foreign collaboration and which show the illustrative types of income that may be received by foreign corporate bodies from Indian companies and the likely incidence of tax under specific circumstances. This book will commend itself to foreigners who operate in this country through the medium of a company or are interested as collaborators in Indian companies.

Introduction to the Constitution of India. By DURGA DAS BASU. Third Edition. 1964. CALCUTTA 12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. Roy. 8vo. Pages 251. Price Rs. 14 (Board bound); Rs. 12 (Paper bound).

IT speaks for the popularity of this publication that within a short period of four years it has gone into three editions. Since its last edition was published the Constitution was amended on six occasions and the author has incorporated all these changes as well as recent decisions. A brief chapter has been added on the working of the Constitution. The author has covered the entire subject in seven short parts each part sub-divided into chapters dealing with the various topics of the Constitution such as the Union Executive, Government of States, the Judicature and the Federal System. The running commentary is lucid and to the point and at the end of each chapter references are given to sources and authorities on which the comments are based. The appendix contains a number of tables which at a glance supplies much useful information like Statewise membership of the Constituent Assembly of India, Representation of States and Union Territories in the Council of States and in the House of the People, membership of Legislative Assemblies and Legislative Councils of States and Distribution of legislative power. This book by the author of a standard work on the Constitution of India which is primarily prepared for the use of students going up for law and other examinations will also prove useful to the general reader as a brief and accurate survey of the provisions of the Constitution.

Diamond Jubilee. Aurangabad Bar Association. Souvenir.

THIS well produced souvenir contains the proceedings of the Diamond Jubilee Celebrations of the Aurangabad Bar Association which was founded in 1888. Some of the speeches delivered on this occasion and which are reproduced here throw an interesting sidelight on the administration of justice in this part of the State and the growth of the local Bar.

The Bombay Law Reporter.

PHILOSOPHY OF LAW.*

THE Chief Justice of India began his speech by observing that in the midst of the members of the Satara Bar he was feeling quite at home, and so, he desired to express his views on the basic concept of the administration of justice in this country freely and without mental reservation. Since he was talking to the members of the Bar whom he knew very well and who knew him very well, he was confident that he would not be misunderstood. "I am anxious", he said, "to share with you my hopes and my fears, my aspirations and my apprehensions in regard to the administration of justice in this country." It is likely that my statements may sound platitudinous and in that sense, may not appeal to the responsive chord in your minds. Unfortunately, in the market place of ideas, truth is a poor competitor because truth sounds platitudinous and people naturally shrug their shoulders on hearing platitudes. I would, however, appeal to you not to shrug your shoulders on hearing my speech, but give it serious thought.

I have a feeling that our Bar rooms do not respond to the revolutionary movements that the history of India has witnessed during the last fifteen years. There is an atmosphere of cynicism and frustration pervading in our Bar rooms and one feels the touch of the cold frost of indifference when one enters into a dialogue with members of the Bar in their respective Bar rooms. The cynical indifference to the mighty events that are happening in our country which seems to inspire the approach of our intellectuals is a source of very great weakness for the future of a democratic way of life in our country. I would, therefore, appeal to you to look beyond through the windows of your chambers and your bar rooms and try to understand the full significance of the question-mark which is challengingly present in the eyes of the common man. That question-mark poses before you and me the problem as to the purpose which law serves in India today.

We, lawyers and Judges, are often inclined to concentrate all our attention on the work with which we are busy from day-to-day and are apt to forget the purpose which our work is intended to serve and the motive force of the legal process on which administration of justice in a democratic country is founded. I often feel that lawyers and Judges who take delight and pride in using their tools in the discharge of their professional duties, are like the workmen who helped to build the Taj without ever having appreciated the synthetic beauty of the magnificent structure they were building. The beauty of law and its mighty role in the democratic process are not present in our minds as we do our duties in Courts from day-to-day.

Law in a democracy works as a mighty weapon in the achievement of democratic ideal of socio-economic justice. Democracy is no longer content to play the night watchman's role of keeping law and order within its boundaries. Democracy is now set on its dynamic ideal of establishing an Egalitarian State, and in the achievement of this ideal, law is its great ally and indeed its major weapon.

*Short summary of the Address delivered by the Hon'ble Mr. P. B. Gajendragadkar, Chief Justice of India, to the members of the Bar Associations of the Satara District, on December 30, 1964.

In achieving the ideal of socio-economic justice, democracy and law have both to face the problem of reconciling the competing claims of individual liberty and freedom with social and public good. The way to resolve this conflict has to be discovered by legal process, and so, legal process assumes great significance in the progress of democracy. The Legislatures are seeking to meet the challenge of the times in which we all live and law which is forged in legislative chambers offers a response to the clamouring demand of unsatisfied but legitimate human desires and ambitions. That is how the doctrine of socio-economic justice is the foundation of all law, and in so far as law helps the process of socio-economic justice, it helps democracy itself.

In the context of today, lawyers and Judges should not be content to function merely as technicians. They must play the role of jurists who understand and explain the philosophy of law, the way of it, its basis, its motive power and its ultimate objective.

Today, democracy is passing through a difficult period in our country. It is passing through a stage of adolescence and adolescence has some unusual problems to face. The promise that the Constitution made to the hundreds of citizens staying in villages of this country that political freedom will bring them socio-economic justice, still remains to be fulfilled; and these hungry millions who have yet to receive the minimum amenities of life, such as clothes to wear, houses to live, food to eat and good water to drink, have been waiting to receive the fulfilment of that promise. Law is helping to bring that dream nearer to the citizens in this country. That is the philosophic basis of law today.

It is often said that lawyers have no place in the public life of this country. I do not think that the intellectuals should take this narrow view based on a sense of frustration, indifference or anger. Political power will need the co-operation of intellectuals in order to solve the many problems of Government. In fact, democracy can succeed only if there is an unceasing dialogue between the intellectuals and political power; and if the lawyers do not play the role as leaders of thought in this country, who else can discharge that duty? We call ourselves members of the mighty brotherhood of law and we remind ourselves every morning as we begin our work in Courts that we are worshippers in the Temple of Justice. I would, therefore, appeal to you not to treat the legal profession as a business or merely as a source of making money; we ought to treat our profession as a branch of social service and must develop and subscribe to the best ethical standards to govern our conduct. In this brotherhood, there is no superior or inferior; all are equal and between the members of the Bar and the Bench there is genuine partnership; both the members of the Bar and the Judges have to put their shoulders to the wheels over which the chariot of justice proceeds in its majestic march to bring to the country socio-economic justice based on the rule of law. Law is the foundation of social structure. That is our ancient concept of law. Law is the king of kings—that is the Upanishadic notion about law. The rule of law which is universally recognised as the most distinguishing feature of democracy looks to us, lawyers and Judges, as its servants and its advocates, and it is as such servants of law that we ought to discharge our duties not only to the litigants, but to the public at large.

Law, like democracy, seeks to synthesize in a harmonious way the conflicting and competing claims of individual liberty and social good. In the process of this harmonious synthesis, there is no room for absolutes. Reason and experience guide law and democracy, and it is on reason and experience that the changing pattern of law is based. I would, therefore, appeal to the members of the Bar to take a philosophic view of law and help the progress of the rule of law. If we fail to achieve this object, the rule of law itself would be in danger and democracy may not succeed. That briefly is the nature of my hopes and fears, my aspirations and my apprehensions in regard to the administration of justice in this country today.

THE HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS TO PROPERTY ACT, 1937: A STING IN THE TAIL.*

THIS statute, which has given endless trouble, was intended to give better rights to women. But in some quarters there has been a reluctance to give them any more rights than could be avoided. The Madras High Court has recently handed down a Full Bench answer which causes us to reconsider the whole question of the rights which women might take under s. 3(2) of the Act. If Madras is right Madhya Pradesh, and, the present writer is willing to assume, the rest of India except perhaps Orissa and Patna is wrong. The present writer expressed his opinion on the question in his Introduction to Modern Hindu Law (which appeared in India in December, 1963) and in an earlier article entitled "Five Doubtful Cases in Hindu Law from Madras" which appeared at [1963] 1 Madras Law Journal (Journ. Sec.), pp. 1 and following, at pp. 20-24. In the two places he expressed concern about the judgment of Jagadisan J., in *Manicka v. Arunachala*¹. In that case the single Judge had declined to follow a bench of his own High Court, namely in *Manorama Bai v. Rama Bai*², had followed rather the unreported decision of a single Judge which was not followed in the said *Manorama Bai*³, and had relied upon the Orissa case of *Keluni Dei v. Jagabandhu Naik*⁴ which, along with many Orissa cases, this writer had thought to be eccentric and unreliable outside Orissa.

Jagadisan J's judgement has now been reviewed by a Full Bench in *Manicka v. Arunachala*⁵ which has come to hand only now, though the decision was given on January 24, 1964. The result is excruciating in the best traditions of Hindu Law. The precious subtlety which arises out of the apparently head-on conflict between this Madras Full Bench decision and the Full Bench decision of the Madhya Pradesh High Court in *Bhonda v. Ramdayal*⁶ is one which the traditional legal scholar of India should find delicious. This writer finds it doubly displeasing, firstly because he himself has not all the necessary mental flexibility to throw overboard at one step all he had understood about this dreadful statute, and secondly that, doing his level best, he finds it difficult to persuade others that the "new" point of view is after all correct. In sum, this writer believes that Madras is right, and the question arises how can this be justified, since the judgment will leave many unconvinced; and since the Madhya Pradesh case, correctly drawn to their Lordships' attention (see p. 529 of the judgment), was handled very briefly, and, to some readers, somewhat cryptically. No doubt Madhya Pradesh did consider the widow's interest a coparcener's indefinite and fluctuating interest while the Madras High Court says that fluctuation is "merely incidental to the estate she took": but what sort of difference this is will not be evident to everybody. We must take a deep breath and do what we can.

The "old" view and its justification.

The point of view upon which many were proceeding and which this writer preferred to follow in the above-cited book and article was this: a widow who took under s. 3(2) took "the same interest that he himself (her deceased husband) had" in the joint family property. That interest was a coparcenary

3 The case, which has played a considerable role (and ought to have been reported) was A. S. No. 299 of 1950. The fact is that this ought to have been taken more seriously in Manorama Bai's case. It was dismissed there at p. 288, col. i., in the following words: "The latest decision is the judgment in Seshi Ammal v. Lakshi Ammal, A. S. No. 299 of 1950, D./ 15-7-1955 (Mad.), wherein it was held that there is no survivorship to the widow of the rights of a deceased coparcener." It was not stated in what precise way this proposition was in conflict with their Lordships' own view, but this appears from the judgment. In fact, a decision to the fact that a widow never takes by survivorship from any coparcener would probably be wrong.

interest⁷ and, therefore, fluctuated with births and deaths, just as it would have done in the hands of her husband. This proposition is widely accepted, and indeed is not denied now by anyone.⁸ Let us illustrate what is meant by this fluctuation. If there are three brothers in the family, B1, B2 and B3, and only B3 is married, and we assume that the Act of 1937 is applicable (i.e. we are in imagination in the pre-1956 period), the position of the widow of B3 would shift with the deaths of B1 and B2. On the death of B2 her presumptive third would increase to a half, and, one assumed, on the death of B1 she would be left with the whole property. The increase in benefit upon the death of B1 seems to be of exactly the same kind as that which occurs on the death of B2. The reason is that we assume that the analogy of the interest in the hands of the widow with the same interest in the hands of the deceased husband is complete and unbroken. All her rights follow in some measure the rights of her deceased coparcener husband and where he could have taken more by survivorship so she also might be expected to take more. She has a coparcenary interest (whether or not she can herself be likened to a coparcener, which people generally doubted), and therefore she should be able to survive to the whole property on the death of the sole surviving coparcener, here B1. The same would be the position when all the brothers are married. Let us assume B1 married to W1, B2 married to W2, and B3 married to W3. B3 dies first leaving W3 the owner of his undivided Mitakshara coparcenary interest under s. 3(2) of our Act. She does not ask for partition. B2 dies leaving W2 similarly entitled. W3 does not take by survivorship from B2 because survivorship has been interrupted by the statute⁹ for so long as W2's statutory interest endures. Thus we have two widows, each with a coparcenary interest, along with the sole surviving coparcener, namely B1. When B1 dies leaving W1 the same thing happens as on the death of B2, and W1 takes the interest formerly belonging to B1. What happens when W1 dies? In the simple and straight forward view her interest passes by survivorship to W2 and W3, so that if they partitioned the estate between them each would have a half. This is the view which is not accepted in Orissa and Patna, as we shall see. The view depends upon the conception of the interest owned by the widow being essentially a coparcenary interest, so that the right to take by survivorship is attached to it, or in other words it is capable of being enlarged by deaths, whether of coparceners (including the sole surviving coparcener) or of widows who likewise had taken under the Act. It is interesting to note, in passing, that s. 6 of the Hindu Succession Act does not contemplate a female owner of a coparcenary interest taking by survivorship—but we thought that this was an oversight.

The point of view stated here was adopted in *Manorama Bai v. Rama Bai*¹⁰ and in *Bhondu v. Ramdayal*¹¹, both referred to above. The facts in Manorama Bai's case are difficult to disentangle in the lengthy and learned judgment, but they amount to this: two brothers, B1 and B2, were joint (in fact reunited); B1 had two sons, S1 and S2, and five daughters; B1 gave S2 in adoption to B2, so that after the sons' marriages the picture was that the two brothers each had a son, whom we can rename B1S and B2S. After their marriages the family was joined by B1SW and B2SW. In an accident B1, B1S, B2S, and B1SW were killed, and it was held as a fact that the last to die was B2S. The sisters of B1S objected to claims by B2SW, who was not involved in the accident, to take the family property subject to the claims of the widow of B2 who had died earlier. The question was whether, as the widow of the last coparcener to die, B2SW, the plaintiff (Manorama Bai), was entitled to the entire properties of the family. The relative times of the deaths of B1S and B1SW were not inquired into and were not established and it was assumed in passing that if momentarily B1SW acquired any rights under the Act of 1937 these passed on her death to the sole survivor of the coparcenary, B2S, who himself died last in the tragedy. The Court went into a lengthy investigation of what is meant by "coparcener", held that B2SW was as good as if she were a coparcener, and was therefore capable of taking by survivorship all the interests in coparcenary, subject to the rights of the widow of B2. It is correct to say that if the learned Judges (Govinda Menon and Ramaswami, JJ.) had been asked whether Manorama Bai had taken the whole family property by survivorship, subject to the rights of the elder widow, they would have answered in the affirmative: but it is not correct to say, as has been said in Madras, that Manorama Bai took by survivorship from the sole surviving coparcener. As this writer sees the facts, Manorama Bai was the widow of Hayavadana, the youngest of the coparceners, who was held to have died last (p. 280, para. 32). She took the property of a sole surviving coparcener under s. 3(2), under which undoubtedly comes such joint family property. She took as widow under the Act, and not by survivorship arising out of a pre-existing tenure. There was no question of her taking by survivorship from B1 or from B1S, because the Court held that they died before her own husband, upon whose death alone she obtained a right under the Act. But there is not the slightest doubt but that throughout the judgment, especially in the lengthy and involved considerations of the nature of a coparcenary right and of survivorship outside the pure Mitakshara birthright, the learned Judges believed that Manorma Bai could not have taken the joint family property of B1's branch had she not been a coparcener, and it is this catena of dicta—all of them unnecessary for the decision of the case—which comes under fire. This is what was disliked in Manorama Bai's case and this may have contributed to editors' refusing to report it (except in the A.I.R.). Thus if we were to ask the learned Judges what they would decide in a hypothetical case, where two brothers died in succession leaving two widows, each able to take under the Act of 1937, and the first widow herself died, there can be no doubt but that they would decide that the second could take by survivorship from the first. Similarly, if we asked them what they would decide if there were a sole surviving coparcener and a widow, and the coparcener died, there can be no doubt but that they would say that the widow could take by survivorship from the sole surviving coparcener. But despite what is said to the contrary in Madras the case of Manorama Bai did not actually decide either of these points. It was the potentialities of the case which disturbed people.

We may now turn to the more definite case of Bhondur v. Ramdayal.¹² We must neglect certain issues. Having neglected them we see that a family consisted of two coparceners, father (F) and son (S) and the father's wife (W). F died leaving the other two. W took a half of the property under the Act. Then S died unmarried. It was argued that the coparcenary having ceased the rights of W came to an end (a possible argument, as we shall see, and not so stupid as it appears at first sight). The learned Judges of the Full Bench, after considering a vast number of cases (not including Manorama Bai's case), came to a conclusion as follows (p. 54):

"It may be that a Hindu widow taking interest under sub-s. (2) of S. 3 of the Act is not a coparcener. But the Act vests in her the fluctuating interest which her husband had in his joint family property at the time of his death 'notwithstanding any rule of Hindu Law to the contrary'. The essence of this interest is unity of ownership. As observed by the Privy Council in 9 Moo. Ind. App. 539 (P.C.), at p. 611:

“There is community of interest and unity of possession between all the members of the family, and upon the death of any one of them the others may well take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's lifetime a common interest and a common possession.”

The deceased simply disappears and the survivors take, as a kind of accretion to the interest which they already had in the whole property, a larger interest. That being so, it is inherent in the very nature of the fluctuating interest which a widow derives from her husband that it is capable of being enlarged by deaths, and liable to be diminished by births, in the family. There is no basis in law for the supposition that she loses this interest altogether when the only other member of her joint family dies and she is in a position to obtain the whole estate as his heir.

Actually, there is no substantial difference between the nature of the estate which such a widow takes by survivorship and the one which she may take as her son's heir. In either case, it would be a Hindu Woman's estate. There is, therefore, no reason for not allowing her to take the whole estate by survivorship or for supposing that the interest which enables her to do so ‘vanishes’. In our view, the widow in such a case gets the whole estate by survivorship.”

True the result was masked by the fact that even if survivorship has been denied the lady would have taken the half as heiress: but the fact remains that the learned Judges accepted without hesitation that the widow, though perhaps not a coparcener, could take by survivorship.

It is time now to pass to the “new” and correct view.

The “new” view and its justification

THE importance of a change in the judicial interpretation of s. 3(2) cannot be overemphasised. Families in which the widow, whose rights have now been turned by s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act into absolute rights, will seek to enlarge her right by surviving to the sole coparcener cannot be few. It is precisely because those rights have been turned into absolute rights by the statute that Madras has groaned under the otherwise rational and mild dicta in Manorama Bai's case. Had the limited estate remained all would have been well, because the former law was perfectly well acquainted with the situation where one widow won the championship-stakes, by being the widow of the last coparcener to die, and thus took as his heir all the family property subject to the rights of maintenance of the less lucky widows. The rule of the limited estate made that situation bearable, because the corpus of the estate would come to the family in the end. Now that position has suddenly vanished. The widow, with her absolute rights in an undivided coparcenary interest under the two statutes, cannot only spirit the capital away into enterprises of which the family does not approve, she can remarry and fall under the thumb of mercantile competitors, and so forth. It will be even less tolerable if, when the sole surviving coparcener dies, she comes in and takes what remains of the capital by pressing her claims as survivor under the old system. Hence the head-scratching in Madras and the intolerably subtle reasoning which we are now about to attempt to explain.

The explanation requires as a first step the recognition of two principles, which it is hoped readers of this article will accept as preliminary assumptions:—

(1) An investigation of the rights of a person who claims under a statute must look first to the statute, and not add to the statute any qualifications or conditions which might be suggested by any individual interpretation or application of that statute, whether by the Courts or by jurists.

(2) An explanation of the statutory right of someone who seeks to take under a statute and not otherwise must be an explanation and not a restatement of the question in other terms.

To illustrate the first point, it is unsatisfactory to say that the widow must be made a coparcener by the statute because (a) the statute gives her the interest her husband had, which happens to be a coparcenary interest, or (b) because the Hindu law knows many tenures similar to a coparcenary tenure which do not differ in effect from what the statute seems to have given the widow. To illustrate the second point it is better to take a homely example. One hears it said in the "new" cases that the widow cannot take by survivorship because she is not a coparcener. This is like saying that a woman is not a man because she does not wear a hat or does not wear trousers. The definition of woman depends on many factors and the right to wear a hat or wear trousers may itself depend on the right to be defined as a man and not a woman. This problem has been bedevilled by explanations which do not explain, but only restate the problem.

To commence with the exposition, we note that the chief argument for the widow's being able to take the family property from another widow who dies, or from a sole surviving coparcener, lies in the claim that her interest fluctuates. It does indeed fluctuate, but how do we know this, and how far does this incident of fluctuation go? The statute says nothing about fluctuation. Fluctuation has been recognised by the Courts in cases where the size of the share obtained at partition differed from what would have obtained had the suit been instituted earlier. What has really happened is that the interest given to the woman by the statute is by the same statute declared capable of being realised by partition. Not merely by partition, but by partition as if she were a male owner. This tells us that where a male owner in her situation could demand partition she can demand it, and where the right to institute a partition at Mitakshara law has ceased for any reason the incidents of partition formerly open to her have ceased. This may not make partition impossible (as suggested in Madhya Pradesh unsuccessfully), but will turn the co-ownership into a different kind of co-ownership (as we shall see) with a right of partition distinct from the right of partition at Mitakshara law. The point must be illustrated.

Here is a rather large joint family which can illustrate all our points:

B2 dies first. W2 becomes entitled to the same interest that B2 himself had. If she separated at once she would obtain a quarter share. But she remains joint. B3 dies next. The situation of W2 is not changed. B4 dies next, and still W2's position is not changed. The reason is that if she asks for partition the other widows have their deceased husband's interests under the same Act. If W4 now dies what happens to her interest? As she dies undivided it returns to the coparcenary, which still exists as a Mitakshara entity, because there are the two coparceners, B1 and S. As a result S is entitled to a presumptive quarter, just as is B1 and the two surviving widows, W2 and W3. S now dies leaving W5. W5 takes his interest, still one quarter. When W5 dies what happens to the interest, still undivided? There is no coparcenary in existence, but there is a sole surviving coparcener, B1, who has the right of being the sole surviving master (we shall avoid the word "vestee") of the family estate, subject to the rights of W2 and W3. Therefore the branch of B4 disappears from consideration, and we are left with three branches. Should W2 now ask for partition fluctuation is seen to have taken place. The interest, which is still a coparcenary interest, is still capable of being realised by partition at Mitakshara law. Therefore W2 would obtain a separate share amounting to one-third of the estate. Let us suppose she does so and disappears from view. This leaves W3 with her interest in competition with the sole surviving coparcener, B1. What is to prevent her from separating and taking a half? Nothing. Let us suppose that she does not do this, but remains joint with B1 until the time of B1's death.

Here we come to the crux of the problem. At B1's death the Mitakshara joint family comes to an end. The possibility of a Mitakshara partition is over. Can the situation of W3 be distinguished from that of B3 if he were alive? Yes indeed it can, and for the most important, but elusive, reason, not that B3 was a male and W3 is not, but that B3 had a birthright and W3 has not. What this means is this: W3's right being statutory and not a birthright, W3 is confined to the interest which her husband had. She is not fictionally her husband throughout the story from start to finish, though she may appear to be so for part of the story. Now the interest which B3 had is capable of being realised by partition so long as a Mitakshara partition is available. This ceases when the sole surviving coparcener dies. All coparcenary rights have been absorbed by this last male member, who is not strictly a coparcener at all, because he has no coparcener alive with him, but only females having shadows of coparcenary rights attached to them by virtue of the statute. Had the deceased husband actually been alive the situation of a sole surviving coparcener would not have arisen. But as this, a perfectly well-known, if disputed, tenure has actually come into existence, nothing in the statute compels us to ignore it. Thus the statutory right and the situation of the sole surviving male member must be harmonised, and neither must detract from the other. The male member was manager vis-a-vis the widow, whatever her rights to partition had been, and there is no statutory gift to her of survivorship as such. Her right to a share is always subject to this limitation, that when a Mitakshara partition cannot take place her right cannot be ascertained to have increased. And thus we have the somewhat comical and unexpected position that when B1 dies W3, whose hypothetical right stood as a presumptive half while B1 lived, cannot claim to take by survivorship from B1, and is fixed by the nature of things to a half vis-a-vis B1's intestate heir or legatee.

This is exactly what has been decided in the Madras Full Bench decision which we are discussing. Fluctuation may be a characteristic of the coparcenary interest in which she has a statutory right, but there is no ground for supposing that the interest has all and every characteristic which a true coparcenary interest has. This is not because she is not a coparcener, which is itself a conclusion from examining the working of the statute, but because the right to partition, carrying with it the right to ascertain the size of the share by reference to the number of owners entitled to participate, undergoes a subtle change when the penultimate coparcener to die actually dies. When S died in our illustration W3 knew that she could not obtain an increase in her hypothetical share when B1 died. She could always obtain her share in litigation with B1 but she could not pass from a right to, at most, a half, to a right to the whole, for the Mitakshara partition-situation ends with the death of the sole surviving male member.

Now let us suppose that B1 died before W2 separated. The family then consists of B1, W2 and W3; and B1, the last surviving male member, is taken away from it. According to the "old" view W2 and W3 could split the property between them, taking a half each. But this is incorrect. In reality the property of B1, namely the former coparcenary property, subject to the two widow's thirds goes to B1's heir or legatee. The widows' not being able to institute a partition suit at Mitakshara law prevents the ascertaining that their respective shares have increased in value from a presumptive third to a half. Since they cannot do this they are stuck with their thirds.

Let us suppose that B1 died, and his legatee has arranged a partition (as he must) with the two widows. W2 and W3 are now in possession of a divided two-thirds of the estate. What happens when W2 dies? Let us assume that W2 died unseparated. Does W3 now become owner of the two-thirds, in fact all the remaining property, by survivorship from W2? No. The reason is that there being no coparcenary and no Mitakshara survivorship since the tenure of the widows was purely statutory, the two widows were tenants-in-common vis-a-vis each other, just like any other co-owners not Mitakshara coparceners. This is exactly what was decided in *Keluni v. Jagabandhu*¹³ which this writer so heartily deplored. The case is, after all, correctly decided. One must admit one's own error.

What happens when various widows of various coparceners live together and one dies? Her interest passes to the surviving coparceners, if any, and if there are none then not to the other widows, but to the reversioners of the deceased husband, which only in Maharashtra under the Bombay school are capable of including the widow of a deceased brother of the last male owner. This is exactly what was decided in Khatrani v. Tapeshwari,¹⁴ and this is also correct. The decisions one previously deplored are now almost certainly correct.

It follows, therefore, that the following propositions can be laid down:—

(1) The widow who took under s. 3(2) of the Act of 1937 was not thereby constituted a coparcener, nor had she any characteristic similar to those of a coparcener except those necessarily flowing from the nature of her interest and her right to protect and, if necessary, realise it by partition.

(2) The right to partition persisted so long as her interest endured and persists even after it has been converted into an absolute interest by the Act of 1956.

(3) But the right to partition carries with it the right to ascertainment of the size of the share, and this will be subject to a peculiarity. So long as a Mitakshara partition can occur the possibility of a fluctuation in the size of the fraction since the death of the husband can be contemplated. But when Mitakshara partition is no longer in view the signs of fluctuation cannot be perceived.

(4) For this reason the appearance of a right of survivorship continues so long as there is a male member alive. But when the last male member of the original coparcenary dies the possibility of survivorship comes to an end.

(5) Therefore there can be no survivorship, whether from a sole surviving coparcener or from a co-widow, or from a widow of another deceased coparcener.

This drastic reorientation of the law must be noticed in Maharashtra and Gujarat. The reactions of those High Courts to the new Madras decision, along with the Orissa and Patna decisions is awaited with the greatest interest.

THE MAHARASHTRA OWNERSHIP FLATS ACT, 1963—A CRITICISM.*

THE Maharashtra Ownership Flats Act, 1963, which came into operation on February 10, 1964, within the area of Greater Bombay has been in existence for the last one year. It is appropriate that a study be made of its working, inadequacies, limitations and shortcomings in a critical analysis.

The object of the new enactment was to regulate the promotion of construction, sale, management and the transfer of flats on ownership basis in the State of Maharashtra as it was found that the builders and the sponsors of ownership buildings indulged in several malpractices and abuses. To check the unhealthy activities of this class of persons, the Government imposed several curbs on the trade on the recommendations of the Paymaster Commission which it had appointed earlier to investigate into the system of sale of flats on ownership basis in Bombay.

The curbs imposed upon the builder are several. Section 3 sets out the general liabilities of a promotor and provides that notwithstanding anything in any other law, a promotor (i.e. a builder) who constructs a building of flats, all or some of which are for sale on ownership basis

"shall in all transactions with persons intending to take or taking one or more of such flats, be liable to give or produce; or cause to be given or produced, the information and the documents set out in sub-section (2)."

Section 4 requires an agreement between a builder and a flat purchaser to be registered with the Sub-Registrar of Assurances. Section 5 requires the builder to maintain separate account of sums taken as advance or deposit from prospective flat-owners. The responsibility for payment of outgoings by the builder until he effects the transfer of the property to a co-operative society or a company, as the case may be, is provided by s. 6. The builder is prohibited from making any additions or alterations to the plans which have been sanctioned, without the previous consent of all the persons who have agreed to take the flats by virtue of s. 7. The said section also provides for machinery for settling disputes between the builder and the flat-owners as respects any defect in the building or material used or any unauthorised change made in the construction of the building. Section 8 specifies the period within which the builder is obliged to deliver possession of the flat to the flat-owner. Section 9 prohibits the creation of mortgage by the builder after execution of agreement of sale without consent of parties. The builder is required to take steps for formation of co-operative society or a company, as the case may be, in certain circumstances, under s. 10. The builder is further required to convey his title in the property to the organisation of flat-owners, to execute all relevant documents in respect thereof and to deliver all documents of title relating to the property which may be in his possession or power to the co-operative society or a company, as the case may be, under s. 11. Breaches or omissions committed by the builder of any of the provisions of the aforesaid sections or rules made thereunder are made punishable with fine or imprisonment or both by virtue of the provisions of ss. 13 and 14. Retrospective operation has been given to ss. 2, 6, 8 to 16 to a limited extent, so that the Act will be applicable to a limited extent to builders who had sold flats prior to the enactment of this legislation.

Let us turn to the definition of a "promotor". Section 2(c) defines a promotor thus:

"'promotor' means a person who constructs or causes to be constructed a block or building of flats for the purpose of selling some or all of them to other persons, or to a company, co-operative-society or other association of persons, and includes his assignees; and where the person who builds and the person who sells are different persons, the term includes both."

The essential ingredients of the definition are that a person (i) who constructs or causes to be constructed a building of flats and (ii) for the purpose of selling them to other persons would fall within the definition of a "promotor". A person who is a "promotor" as defined by s. 2(c) only will attract the provisions of the Maharashtra Ownership Flats Act, 1963, and he will be liable to comply with all the relevant provisions of the Act. For it is not all building constructions carried on by a person that would make him a promotor. For example, a person who constructs a building on behalf of a co-operative society by entering into a contract with it will not come within the definition of a promotor.

The definition of "promotor" excludes the formation of a co-operative housing society by the voluntary act of coming together of the promotor members. The result will be that the benefits provided by ss. 3 to 11 to ownership buildings will not be available to such co-operative societies. If a builder constructs a building for a co-operative society, his responsibility will end with the completion of the building and as regards disputes as to defects and malpractices, the remedy available to the society will be under the terms of its contract. The builder cannot be required to comply with the details, specifications and information set out in s. 3, nor to rectify the defects or be liable to pay compensation as provided by s. 7. Thus, a builder can well escape from the provisions of the Act, by getting members to form a co-operative housing society and to construct buildings for them. In short, to form a co-operative housing society first and to construct buildings afterwards. This technique could well obviate the builder the necessity of complying with the requirements of the provisions of the Act. It appears that such a trend is probably occurring if one observes the number of advertisements in newspapers inviting membership from the public. This invidious classification should be put an end to at once if the new Act is not to become a dead letter on the statute book.

The term 'promotor' used in s. 2(c) is inappropriate and confusing and should be dispensed with. The terms 'builder' and 'contractor' ought to be used instead. A promotor under s. 10 is required "to submit an application to the Registrar for registration of the organization of persons who take the flats as a co-operative society or a company, as the case may be; and the promotor is further required to join, in respect of the flats which have not been taken, in such application for membership of a co-operative society or, as the case may be, of a company and nothing in this section shall affect the right of the promotor to dispose of the remaining flats in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

The term 'promotor' used in the new Act is different in meaning from the term 'promotor' referred to for registration of a co-operative society under the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960. Incidentally, it is worthy of note that the Registrar, Co-operative Societies will not accept a builder (who is interested only in the sale of his flats) as a promotor of a society (as defined by s. 2(c) of the new Act) unless he is going to occupy and reside in the flat. Thus, there is a direct conflict between the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, and the Ownership Flats Act, 1963. It is, therefore, suggested that of the term 'promotor', the definition which will be more appropriate in its stead will be a "builder" as one constructs and sells flats to others. However, where the person who constructs and the person who sells are different persons, the term "contractor" as the person who constructs or causes to be constructed a building, and 'the owner' as the person who sells the flats to others, ought to be used. Moreover, both the terms 'contractor' and 'owner' will be included in the term 'builder' in terms of s. 2(c).

Another incongruity is the conflict between the provisions of the new Act and the Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, in the case of registration of a co-operative society by the Registrar. Under the Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, at least ten persons are required for registration of a society: the Registrar in practice does not register a housing society unless the application for registration is signed by all the tenant members of the proposed society. However, s. 10 of the new Act provides that as soon as a minimum number of persons required to form a co-operative society or a company, as the case may be, have taken flats, the promotor (i.e. the builder) shall within the prescribed period submit an application to the Registrar for the formation of a co-operative society or a company. Contravention of the section is made punishable under ss. 13 and 14 of the Act. There are a number of cases where the Registrar has refused to register a society because flats have been given by members on leave and license basis prior to the application of registration of the society. In the result, whereas the new Act requires registration of a co-operative society as soon as a minimum number of flats are disposed of to members, registration has not been possible because of inherent obstacles to the registration of a co-operative society. Nor is it possible to convey the title of the builder in the property to the organizations of persons, who take the flats, which is to be registered as a co-operative society, as provided for by s. 11. The situation has more or less remained the same as before. It will thus be seen that both ss. 10 and 11 of the new Act are practically rendered infructuous.

Another weak feature of the new Act is the absence of appointment of any superintending authority to implement the provisions of the Act. While the Government has conferred substantial rights upon the flat-owners to protect and secure their rights as stated aforesaid, the Government has failed to delegate authority to appointed officers to see to the implementation of the provisions of the Act. It has been experienced in the past that benevolent legislation has not been availed of because one of the parties to the contract on account of compelling circumstances did not desire to embark upon a costly and lengthy litigation in a Court of law to vindicate its rights. Though the new Act has been in operation for a year, it can hardly be claimed that it has achieved even a small measure of success. Transactions are effected as was previously done and the loopholes are being resorted to escape whatever provisions may be applicable to the builders. An amendment to the Maharashtra Ownership Flats Act, 1963, should be made whereby authorities appointed under the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, are conferred with powers to implement the provisions of the new Act. Such a provision will save much of the contradictions and conflicts between the provisions of the two Acts and ensure greater success to the achievement of the objects of the Maharashtra Ownership Flats Act.

Though s. 1(2) makes the Act applicable to the whole of the State of Maharashtra, s. 1(3) restricts the operation of the Act to such areas, and on such dates as the State Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette appoint and different dates may be appointed for different areas. The Government initially has brought the Act into operation within the area of Greater Bombay from February 10, 1964. The construction of buildings on ownership basis is progressing rapidly in Thana. It has also spread to Poona. There is no logic in making the provisions of the Act applicable after considerable time has elapsed when the malpractices and abuses have flourished and taken root. It is advisable to make the provisions of the Act applicable to areas as soon as the activity of construction of buildings on ownership basis have commenced there.

It is to be hoped that the above defects in the implementation of the Act will be remedied if even a small modicum of success is to be achieved by this unique piece of legislation.

GLEANINGS.

PROFESSIONAL PRIVILEGE

"UNRESTRICTED communication between parties and their professional advisors has been considered of such importance as to make it advisable to protect it even by the concealment of matter without the discovery of which the truth of the case cannot be ascertained."

It was in these words that Lord Langdale, in Reece v. Trye (1846, 9 Beav. 316, 319), justified the rule concerning legal professional privilege, and today, in the practical business of litigation, the first concern of a party against whom an order for discovery or inspection has been made is to protect himself, as far as possible, from a too comprehensive disclosure of his case. Yet, since litigation can only properly be conducted by professional lawyers, it is necessary that a litigant should be able to have recourse to them in circumstances which enable and encourage him to place the fullest confidence in them. It is only if a client feels that what he divulges to his lawyer will never be unexpectedly disclosed to anybody else that litigation and the law can be carried on successfully.

The general rules as to legal privilege are well established and can be easily summarised. Communications to and from a legal adviser for the purpose of getting legal advice and assistance are privileged whether or not any subsequent litigation is threatened or contemplated; communications to and from a non-professional agent or third party are privileged only if litigation is threatened or in contemplation.

The later part of this rule appears to have been stated rather loosely by Sir John Stuart V.-C. in Ross v. Gibbs (1869, L.R. 8 Eq. 522), when he declared that communications with a professional "or even a non-professional agent," in anticipation of the litigation, "being confidential, are privileged." Information procured through an agent relative to litigation and with a view to it, declared the learned judge, "is as much privileged on principle as if it were procured through a solicitor."

Naturally, this authority was forcefully cited in Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia (1876, 35 L.T. 76; 2 Ch. D. 644). This was a claim against a bank to compel them to replace moneys alleged to have been wrongly transferred from one account to another at a certain branch. Before the bill was filed, but after litigation had become highly probable, the London branch telephoned the branch manager to send them full details of the whole transaction and the question arose whether the letter sent in reply, being a communication with an unprofessional agent, was privileged from production.

James L.J. declared that it would be "puerile nonsense if the law had been, as it is supposed to have been laid down by the Vice-Chancellor, that any communication made by a person with a view to litigation, whoever the person may be, was to be privileged." The true rule, he felt, was based upon the principle "that you have no right to see your adversary's brief: and, as you have no right to see your adversary's brief, you have no right to see that which comes into existence simply as the materials for your adversary's brief. But that seems to me to have no application whatever to a communication between a principal and his agent, in the matter of the agency, and giving information concerning the facts and circumstances of the very transaction which is the subject matter of the litigation. If there is anything which ought to be produced it seems to me it is that. And that is exactly this case."

Mellish L.J. agreed and drew a distinction between the privilege attaching, say, to a statement obtained from a witness to a road accident, when litigation is threatened or probable, and the position if privilege is claimed for information which a principal asks his own agent to give regarding things which the latter has done as agent. In law these are, after all, the acts of the principal himself and if, by law, one is entitled, by interrogation, to question the principal on facts he himself knows, one must also be entitled to question him as to information which his agent has sent him.

This decision did not, of course, mean that a man cannot safely use an agent for communication with the legal adviser. Communications via a clerk or agent employed by a solicitor or client are as much protected as if made directly between client and solicitor and it is by reason of this commonsense and necessary extension of the general rule that privilege extends, e.g., to town agents or counsel.

The agent may convey communications to the legal adviser, but, if communications are made to a non-professional person as a person who has himself to consider and act upon them, the privilege is gone. In the tactics of litigation this distinction is sometimes overlooked, but was well illustrated in Jones v. Great Central Railway Company (100 L.T. 710; (1910) A.C. 4), in which a member of a trade union who had been dismissed by his employer provided his union authorities, as required by their rules, with a report to enable them to decide whether he should proceed to law at their expense. The report contained the evidence in support of his proposed action and the names of witnesses. The action was sanctioned by the union and the Court of Appeal subsequently held that the report was not privileged. Lord Loreburn declared that the report was made to a party (the union) which had itself to consider it and act on it and which was "not a solicitor, nor the mere alter ego of a solicitor." "Every large concern" he concluded, "whether a railway company or a trade union or whatever it is, that must needs control its business by correspondence, is amenable to the same rule—a rule in itself wholesome, for it favours the placing before a court of justice of all material circumstances that may lead to a just decision."

Privilege may also be validly claimed for a document which has not actually been laid before a solicitor. In Southwark Water Company v. Quick (1878, 3 Q.B.D. 315) Lord Cockburn C.J. declared that privilege would attach to information obtained on the suggestion of a solicitor with a view to his advising upon it and to information procured spontaneously by the client for this purpose and, in each case, it mattered not whether the information had yet been so submitted. It would be privileged if the court was satisfied it was bona fide procured for that purpose.

Where it is claimed that documents are privileged on the ground that they are required for the purpose of furnishing information to the party's solicitor, it is not necessary that they should be intended solely or primarily for that purpose. It is enough if one of the purposes is submission to the solicitor.

Thus, in Seabrook v. British Transport Commission ((1959) 2 All E.R. 15) a widow, claiming in respect of her husband's death while a railway worker, sought production of accident reports. It was submitted that, though these reports served other purposes as well as that of assisting the defendant's solicitors, they were yet privileged. The claim was upheld and this view approved in Patch v. United Bristol Hospitals Board ((1959) 3 All E.R. 876).

On the other side of a rather thin line fell the decision, three months after Seabrook's case, in Langthorn v. British Transport Commission ((1959) 2 All E.R. 32), where the plaintiff successfully disputed a claim of privilege for copies of post-accident reports prepared, according to the defendants' affidavit, "wholly or mainly to furnish to [their] solicitor evidence . . . for the use of the said solicitor." It was held that, as the affidavit did not state that such was the main purpose of making such reports, the claim for privilege must fail. In fact the main purpose of these reports was more to ascertain the cause of the accident to prevent recurrences than to establish any guilt or attach any blame to anyone.

A case indicating that the Director of Public Prosecutions is entitled to claim a professional privilege analogous to the privilege a solicitor may claim for the document that he holds is Auten v. Rayner ((1960) 1 All E.R. 692), where a police officer was charged with malicious prosecution, false imprisonment etc., and an issue arose whether an official in the director's office should produce notes of conferences, briefs and instructions to prosecuting counsel, opinions from them, and proofs of witnesses at the criminal proceedings. Glyn-Jones J. declared that, though he had to make his ruling on the spur of the moment, as it were, and without the benefit of a full argument, he considered that "those rules of public policy which have resulted in there being established a right of a client and solicitor to claim privilege as to documents and statements in the possession of the solicitor appear to me to apply with equal, if not greater, force to the position of the Director of Public Prosecutions."

The court has, of course, power to inspect any documents as to which a question is raised (R.S.C. Order 31, r. 19A (2)), but there is no compulsion on it to do so. "The question whether the court should inspect the documents is one which is matter for the discretion of the court, and, presumably, for the judge of first instance," declared Jenkins J. (as he then was) in Westminster Airways Limited v. Kuwait Oil Company Limited ((1950) 2 All E.R. 596).

How long can privilege be preserved? Does it indefinitely survive the termination of the proceedings? In Bullock v. Corry (1878, 38 L.T. 102, 3 Q.B.D. 356) the plaintiffs, having entered into a charterparty, were successfully sued by the shipowner because the ship was not discharged according to its terms. The plaintiffs subsequently resorted to their remedy over against the merchants and sued the defendants, purchasers of a cargo of rice, for not unloading it in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale thus causing the delay in the ship's discharge. The defendants sought inspection of the papers—instructions to counsel, etc.—in the action between the plaintiffs and the shipowner, maintaining that they were highly relevant. But inspection was refused.

The question was again raised in Pearce v. Foster (1885, 52 L.T. 886; 15 Q.B.D. 114), where the plaintiff, a clerk, sued for wrongful dismissal. The defence was that dismissal was justified, as he was, while employed, secretly engaged as a speculator on the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff had previously started proceedings for an account against a stockbroker, and the defendants sought production of the papers—instructions to counsel and solicitors etc.—prepared for those proceedings on the grounds that, at that time, the present proceedings were never in contemplation and on the ground that a document is not privileged merely by being handed to a solicitor. The court rejected this claim and cited Bullock v. Corry (sup.) as an authority for holding that, if the documents were privileged in the first action, they remained privileged in the second although the latter might even involve different parties.

Common sense approves of this decision. If the reason for privilege is that there may be free and confidential communication between solicitor and client, then, if at any time such communications were subject to disclosure, this freedom would be impaired. Liability to disclose in a subsequent action would, in this regard, have the same unhappy effect as liability to disclose in the original action.

Hobbs v. Hobbs and Cousens ((1959) 3 All E.R. 827) is a modern illustration of how privilege remains even though litigation be concluded. There, the respondent to a party and party taxation (co-respondent in a divorce suit) applied on taxation to inspect the brief delivered to the petitioner's counsel. Stevenson J., the question of privilege having been referred to him, declared that "there is no doubt that a legal professional privilege, which has a sure and unshakable foundation in our law, protects from disclosures not only documents which embody communications between a client and his legal adviser which come into existence in the course of litigation, in anticipation of litigation, but even document which, without contemplation of any litigation at all, come into existence in order to enable the client to obtain the legal advice which he requires." The co-respondent was therefore held not to be entitled to inspect the brief or its contents.

So, with the exception of cases where privilege is waived by a client or cases where something of a criminal nature is involved, professional privilege is jealously guarded by the courts.

There is, however, also the rule of public policy that if two persons make an agreement, personally or by agents, they ought to be bound by it. If the agents are solicitors who negotiate a compromise which later breaks down, the two rules may be in conflict if a subsequent disclosure of the communication is sought.

In Conlon v. Conlons Limited ((1952) 2 All E.R. 462) the interrogatory which the plaintiff submitted to the Court of Appeal, he should not be obliged to answer, was, in effect, whether he had authorised his solicitors to accept £1,000 and costs. The court held that privilege did not apply, for this was not an inquiry as to a communication passing between a solicitor and his client confidentially. Indeed, the very object of the client in so instructing his solicitor would be that he should make the communication to the other side.

Professional privilege may be far-reaching, but in litigation a tactical advantage often goes to him who knows that it has limits which have been fixed with some degree of precision.—L.T.

A REASONABLE GUARD?

The "tragic injury," to use the words of Danckwerts L.J., giving rise to the claim in Haley v. London Electricity Board (The Times, 30 November) was sustained by a blind person coming into contact on the highway with a punner-hammer which had been placed across the pavement by the defendants' servants to guard an excavation lawfully made in pursuance of a statutory duty.

The hammer was set at an angle and the plaintiff's white stick passed over it and he had no warning of the danger. As the result of his injury, the plaintiff had become virtually deaf. The Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R., Donovan and Danckwerts L.JJ.), affirming Marshall J., held that the defendants were not liable. The Master of the Rolls indicated that the defendants must have regard to all the many sorts and conditions of people who used the pavement and must realise that it was used by men and women hurrying to work, by boys and girls running to school and by old people tottering on their morning walk. All these were commonplace users of the way, and proper provision had to be made for their safety.

But they did not have to cater for the man who walked with his head in the air and did not look where he was going. He was such an exceptional person that they need not provide for him. Nor did the defendants have to provide for the blind, at any rate in places where they had no particular reason to expect blind persons to be. It would be too great a tax on the ordinary business of life if special precautions had to be taken to protect the blind. In the words of Lord Salveson in M'Kibbin v. Glasgow Corporation ((1920) S.C. 590): "They do not need to pad the lamp-posts... because blind people use the streets." A blind person walking along a pavement—without a guide—must put up with all the ordinary hazards of life, lamp-posts or parking metres, traffic signs or warning notices. He had to realise that, from time to time, excavations must be made and that guards might be put up to prevent people from falling into them, and he could not complain when he fell over a guard if that was a reasonable guard put up to protect the public. That was clear from Pritchard v. The Post Office (1950, 114 J. P. 320).

Applying that test, the question was whether this guard was a reasonable guard put up to protect the public. The Master of the Rolls with some hesitation came to the conclusion that it was. The guard was quite sufficient to prevent anyone falling into the trench. It was not itself a danger to any ordinary person who was walking along the pavement. It was a hazard for a blind man, but no more of a hazard than a more conventional type of guard. Donovan L.J. said that the question was whether the defendants ought in the circumstances of the case to have taken some added appropriate precautions. He emphasised "in the circumstances of the case" because certain circumstances might arise requiring some additional precautions as, for example, if the board had been digging its trench outside St. Dunstan's. The trench here was in a quiet suburban road, and there was nothing to fix the defendants with direct notice that a blind man would be coming along the pavement during the course of their work. One's natural sympathy gave impetus to the view that some special precautions had to be taken for the blind; but a rule to that effect would place a duty upon the citizen which it would often be impossible to discharge. The extent of the duty must be measured by the standard of the normal person.

THE SUPREME COURT RESTORES THE CY PRES DOCTRINE.*

THE judgment of the Supreme Court in *Shah Chotalal Lalubhai v. The Charity Commissioner, Bombay*¹ is of great importance as it restores the Cy pres doctrine, embodied in ss. 55 and 56 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950,² hereinafter called the Act, to its rightful place in the law of charitable trusts. The obiter observations of Mukherjea J. in *Ratilal Panachand Gandhi v. The State of Bombay*³ had created the erroneous impression that the Cy pres doctrine had been widened out of existence by ss. 55 and 56 of the Act. In Ratilal Panachand's case it was unfortunate that the attention of the Supreme Court was not pointedly called to the effect of the expression Cy pres used in the marginal note to s. 55 and in the body of s. 56(1) to qualify the power of the Court to give directions. No argument appears to have been addressed to the Court that the expression Cy pres was a term of art and that if the legislature used it in an Act it was meant to carry its ordinary legal meaning. It was equally unfortunate that the decisions of the Bombay High Court on the Cy pres doctrine were not cited on the construction of a Bombay Act, because they would have shown that the sections merely embodied the view which was taken in Bombay, and by the Bombay High Court, of the content in England and India of the Cy pres doctrine. Thus in Hornasji Framji Warden, In the matter of,⁴ Davar J. carefully reviewed English and Indian authorities on Cy pres. The judgment showed that the strict literal construction put in the early cases on the word "impossible" in the context of an object of a trust having become impossible of performance, had been relaxed in favour of a more liberal construction; that "impossible" was taken to mean "impracticable" or "inexpedient"⁵ or "impolitic"⁶. Again, directions had been sought for the Cy pres application of trust funds from the Bombay High Court by the Court being asked to say whether it was necessary, desirable or proper that

*By H. M. Seervai, Advocate-General, Bombay.

1 (1965) Civil Appeal No. 634 of 1964, decided on January 22, 1965, (Supreme Court).

2 The material provisions of ss. 55 and 56 are:

"S. 55. (1) If upon an application made to him or otherwise the Charity Commissioner is of opinion that (a) the original object for which the public trust was created has failed, (b) the income or any surplus balance of any public trust has not been utilized or is not likely to be utilized, (c) in the case of a public trust other than a trust for a religious purpose, it is not in public interest expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper to carry out wholly or partially the original intention of the author of the public trust or the object for which the public trust was created and that the property or the income of the public trust or any portion thereof should be applied to any other charitable or religious object.

S. 56. (1) On such application being made, the court after hearing the parties and making an inquiry shall decide the matter and shall give directions. In giving the directions, the court shall, so far as may be expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper in public interest, give effect to the original intention of the author of the public trust or the object for which the public trust was created. If the court is of opinion that the carrying out of such intention or object is not desirable, necessary or proper in public interest the court may direct the property or income of the public trust or any portion thereof to be applied cy pres to any other charitable or religious object. In doing so, it shall be lawful for the court to alter any scheme already settled or to vary the terms of any decree or order already passed in respect of the public trust or the conditions contained in the instrument of the public trust."

the directions of the settlor should be strictly carried out and whether the literal execution of the trust had become inexpedient, and the Court had answered the questions by declaring that it was impossible and inexpedient to carry out the settlor's directions.⁷

But though a liberal meaning was given to the word "impossible", Davar J. was at pains to point out that the object of the settlor had become impracticable, first because due to shortage of funds the trustees had been unable to carry out his wishes for 22 years and it was doubtful whether they would be able to do so at the end of 8 or even 20 years. Secondly, because, on the evidence, a Hall of the kind directed to be built was not wanted by the community for whose benefit the trust was created and would be rarely, if at all, used. Having held that it had become impracticable to carry out the original object, Davar J. asked the correct question, whether the proposal placed before him was "one that is near enough to the original object of the testator" and he answered it in the affirmative.⁸ That giving a liberal interpretation to the word "impossible" according to the trend of English and Indian authorities did not involve the Court substituting its own ideas of public utility in place of the settlor's was shown by the decision of the same judge in *Advocate General v. Fardoonji*⁹ where he held that in cases of charitable bequests the Court had no right to set aside the wishes of the testator and substitute another charity in the place of one directed to be established by him, simply because, the one might not be so useful as some other that the Court might substitute. He said that after his decision in the case of Hormasji Framji Warden.¹⁰

"the Appeal Court in England has discussed the same subject very elaborately in In re Weir Hospital,"^{11a} and I find that the principles on which the Courts should act have been re-affirmed and stated again with great clearness."

In the light of these considerations it ought to have been submitted to the Supreme Court in Ratilal Panachand's case that ss. 55 and 56 of the Act used words which in Bombay had been used to describe the content of the Cy pres doctrine and that no change in the law was intended, or effected, by those sections. Be that as it may, the present judgment of the Supreme Court gives no countenance to the observations made by J. C. Shah J. in the judgment under appeal that "It is evident that the Legislature has conferred jurisdiction of wide amplitude upon the Courts to apply funds cy pres. The Court is entitled on application under s. 55 to deviate from the directions of the settlor even if the trust has not failed... Again, the Court is not obliged to apply the fund to a purpose even similar to the purpose of the settlor which has failed. The Court may apply the fund to any other charitable or religious objects."¹¹

It is clear that Shah J. overlooked the fact that s. 56(1) of the Act gave the Court power to apply the funds "Cy pres", which expression means "as near as possible to" the testator's or the settlor's intention. It is not surprising therefore that in reversing the judgment, the Supreme Court held that the directions of the High Court were objectionable because they did not provide for objects as near as possible to those of the settlor. The facts leading to the Supreme Court case may be stated thus:

The trustees of a trust were under an obligation to apply the income of the trust to several objects one of the most important of which was the giving of a feast in connection with the sacred festival of Pajusan to the members of the settlor's caste in certain specified villages. The feast was given till 1941-43, when due to rationing laws, it could not be given. Although rationing was removed, the trustees did not give a feast in 1954-5 alleging that the income of the trust was not sufficient to meet the expenses. The Charity Commissioner applied to the Court for directions to apply Cy pres to some educational purpose the accumulations of the unexpended income of the trust. The trustees were impleaded and, pursuant to a public notice, the appellants intervened. The District Judge held that the Swamivatsal feast confers religious benefits and that certain objects of the trust were of a religious character while others were charitable so that the entire trust was not of a religious character. But assuming that the trust was wholly religious, the accumulation was not held for religious purposes. He accordingly directed that the accumulation of about Rs. 45,000 should be distributed as to a half to provide from the income free-ships for deserving students, preferably Jains, and failing such, to other Hindu students; and as to the other half, to a named Hospital to apply the income in providing maintenance, food and medicine to poor and deserving patients. On appeal, the High Court held that except for one object of the trust, namely, offering flowers for worship in a Temple, the other objects were not religious; that the giving of a feast in connection with a sacred festival was charitable and not religious and the Court was competent to entertain the application under s. 55. Accordingly, the appeal was dismissed. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court having been refused, special leave to appeal was granted by the Supreme Court and the judgment of the High Court reversed.

For lack of evidence the Supreme Court declined to express any opinion on the question whether the objects of the trust were religious and addressed itself only to the question whether any case had been made out by the Charity Commissioner for applying the accumulations of the trust Cy pres to different objects. The Supreme Court analysed the material provisions of ss. 55 and 56 and held that the conjunction "or" in s. 56(1) had the effect of introducing several alternatives. The Court must give effect to the original intention if and in so far as it may be either expedient or practicable or desirable or proper or necessary to do so. On the facts the Court said that one of the objects for which the trust was created was the giving of the Swamivatsal feast to the members of Ladva Shrimali Shravak Bania Community on the occasion of the holy festival of Pajusan. The Jains of that community were the chief beneficiaries of the trust and looking at their interest, it would certainly be expedient, practicable, desirable and proper to give the feast, the giving of which, if not a religious, was a meritorious, act prescribed by the scriptures of Swetambar Murti Pujak Jains. The Supreme Court rightly pointed out that:

"The wider public interest does not require that this special charity for a section of the Jain public should be subverted and overthrown. In the wider public interest also, it is expedient, practicable, desirable and proper to respect the sentiments and interests of this section of the Jain public and to give effect to this charity, and we find no reason for giving directions under the latter part of s. 56(1). We, therefore, propose to give directions under the first part of s. 56(1)."¹²

Accordingly, the Supreme Court allowed the appeal. In giving directions, the Supreme Court laid down the correct doctrine of Cy pres. It directed that the accumulation of the unexpended income should be applied as nearly as possible to the original uses and purposes of the trust and any surplus should be applied to increase the amounts expendable for the objects of the trust. The surplus arising from the stoppage of the Swamivatsal feast due to rationing should be applied for carrying out the same object. "The trustees cannot be allowed to defeat the objects of the trust by refusing to carry them out." If the feast could not be given to a very large number of people it should be given to a smaller number; and the great rise in prices of food was an additional ground for investing the surplus and applying the income to the objects of the trust instead of spending the surplus outright. The Supreme Court found that the scheme framed by the lower Courts was objectionable in several ways:

"(it) disregards the basic principle that the trust funds should be applied for effectuating the intention of the founder of the trust as far as possible."

The direction for freeships to students on the ground that it was an analogous to a Gyan Fund, overlooked the fact that the freeships were not restricted to Jains, and also the fact that a Gyan Fund meant a fund for imparting knowledge of Jain religion and Jain Sastras, and not knowledge in general. The direction to give monies to a Hospital was objectionable, because giving medical treatment to poor and deserving patients was not one of the objects of the trust. The Supreme Court has thus restored Cy pres to its rightful place and has made it clear that in a valid charitable trust it is the intention of the settlor, and the objects prescribed by him, which are paramount, and it is not the law that the settlor proposes and the Court disposes.

A DILEMMA IN LEGAL THINKING.*

SOME propositions of legal philosophy may appear extremely difficult to reconcile, though, if taken separately, seem to be self-evident. A good illustration of such a problem in legal philosophy would be that of a distinction between law and morals. It is true that law should not be identified with morality; but to what extent should there be a distinction or a separation between law and morals, how sharp a line of demarcation can be drawn between them, are the problems with which we are faced.

It was Christian Thomasius who differentiated law from morality, while admitting the necessary relationship between the two. Immanuel Kant distinguished between law and morality by showing that law deals with or regulates external conduct, while morality is concerned with the internal nature of man.¹ Morality is an appeal to conscience of the individual who has the free will to choose between the right and the wrong. If he chooses the right he does so because he likes to do what is right and not because of any fear of punishment or evil consequence which may follow a breach of the moral order by reason of society's condemnation. The theory of Kant has been correctly and widely followed, though to some extent morality may be a set of external rules also which man should follow, whether he likes to do it of his own free will or not, and, to keep up this basic requirement of morality, law is necessary. In the latter case, law helps morality to maintain and assert herself. Law, therefore, cannot be identified with morality but may be regarded as a powerful instrument for maintaining morality at the level at which society at a given time and place may desire it to be maintained.² Similarly, it may be said that there should be a great dependence of law on morality. Moral principles should be able to show themselves in law. Law may be based on morality, if morality and public opinion are identical.³

According to positivism, the civil law, as also the law of nature, can exist without any moral basis. Man-made law may even be in conflict with the natural law or the higher moral law. According to the positivists, law is concerned with the actual or positive morality of the people at a given time and in a particular place. Public policy, which is one of the fountains of law, has a variable content and may differ from what the moral order may dictate. Yet Friedmann, W.: Legal Theory, 1960, p. 109. See also p. 117, Id., where Dr. Friedmann says that to Hegel morality is a rational factor, a stage of the reflection of the individual. 3 "The moral and philosophical tenets of the time not only affect old precepts; they shape or help to shape new ones. But they are active direct sources chiefly in the stage of equity and natural law, when the identification of morals and law leads to the notion of a superior sanctity of a body of ideal precepts putting in ideal form the morality of the time." (Pound, R.: Jurisprudence, Vol. III, p. 385).

such a deviating law may be a good law in the constitutional and legal sense, though not in the sociological or moral sense.⁴

As to the necessity of following a bad law (bad from a social point of view, but valid constitutionally), it may be said that to preserve the law and to prevent people from flouting the law it should be regarded as law. If a law, for reason of its desirability, were to be flouted by people, then that would tend to make people lose all respect for the law, and gradually they would tend to ignore the law which, though agreeable as a whole, is rather disagreeable to follow in individual cases. In such a situation a conscientious Judge finds himself in a dilemma because of the positivist concept binding him down to the fetters of statute or precedents, however much he may think apart and wish to decide otherwise. It should be worthwhile mentioning here that the doctrine of stare decisis should be modified. Grave hardship would occur if Judges were not at liberty to correct decisions already given, even though such decisions are too unreasonable to be tolerated or allowed. It is true to say "communis error facit jus", but this should be read with the saying: "cessante ratione legis cessat lex ipsa". When the reason of the law ceases, the law itself ceases. Very serious errors cannot be allowed to be perpetrated, simply on the ground of judicial decorum or certainty of the law. In Smith v. Glen Alden Coal Co.,⁵ the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania for compelling reasons of public policy or the imperative demands of justice, accepted the judicial setting aside of a rule of property long acquiesced in.

The positivist doctrine that a law which is valid constitutionally, irrespective of whether it is a good law or a bad law, should be regarded as a law, is subject to a further limitation. Our social environment is subject to constant change. Hence, latitude should be allowed to Judges even to change the law which was previously valid but has, in the light of changed circumstances, become too unreasonable.

Austin and other positivists considered law as the formal command of the sovereign one or sovereign body or some delegate of that sovereign one or body.⁶ Austin regarded law as so much divorced from morality that he said that even the 'most pernicious laws' which may be opposed even to the will of God have been upheld by the Courts of law. He again gives a converse illustration. If a man were to do an act which would definitely be a beneficial one and if that were prohibited by the Sovereign under the death penalty, the person would be tried and sentenced to death, irrespective of the moral quality of the act. He adds: "...an exception, demurrer or plea, founded on the law of God, was never heard in a Court of justice, from the creation of the earth down to the present moment."⁷

Professor Fuller considers the definition of 'law', as given by Bentham and Austin, and the proposition that, according to Austin, there can be no limitation whatsoever to sovereign authority. Professor Fuller rightly opines that if all that positivism offers is that law is always different from morals, the teachings of positivism are not of much use to us.⁸

Our conclusion, on this point, should be that in case of a statute which is merely undesirable it has to be followed even by the Judges. But if the statute is inhuman or atrocious, the Judge should consider it his duty not to apply it and to ignore it and to hold that it is no law at all. If the law is a common law

4 Professor Hart has appropriately pointed out that even immoral laws are laws though it would be easier to impugn them. Hart, H.L.A.: Positivism and the Separation of Law and Morals, 71 Harv. L. rule which has been established by precedents, then, as already shown above, the Judges ought to be given a latitude to change such a law which has ceased to be reasonable, so as not to perpetuate gross errors in the law leading to grave injustice.

Nature of Morality

Morality is that internal force which appeals to the conscience, while law acts externally through sanctions. Justice seeks to secure an ideal relation between men; morality aims at the ideal development of human character. Law procures security. These three have to be kept in a harmonious balance, so that all the social services within the power of men may lead to the good of humanity. Through morals we get healthy ideals; through morality, justice and ideals are reflected in time and place.⁹

The so-called 'moral sanctions' of Bentham are really 'social sanctions', for in morality there can be no such thing as 'sanction'. If there are sanctions in morality, then morality becomes an externally working power. But morality does not work by external compulsions or sanctions; morality appeals to the conscience.¹⁰

Relation between Law and Morality

Though law and morality are not identical, yet there is an intimate relationship between these two.¹¹ If law is based on public policy, public policy itself is based on some healthy principles valued by the community at a given time and at a particular place. Undoubtedly some laws may be the result of totalitarian enforcements on the down-trodden subjects, in a totalitarian State; but living in democracies, as we do today, our laws, on the whole, are (or should be) the outcome of public opinion. Public opinion is, on the whole, based on healthy moral principles in all civilized societies.¹²

The formulation of a legal system is not coercive power, but certain fundamental accepted rules specifying the essential law-making procedure. These rules do not appear to be rules of law but rules of morality, because they must necessarily be rules of what is accepted by society as just, fair and reasonable.¹³ Though formally law is a command, yet, in substance, that is to say, so far as the material or substantial fountain is concerned, law is meant to maintain the healthy principles of morality or the positive morals of the people concerned.¹⁴ At the root of most law we have some fundamental moral principle, e.g. "Thou shalt not kill" or "Thou shalt not steal." At the structure and superstructure there is the working of positivism making and shaping law. As Professor Lon Fuller very aptly puts it, law must have general acceptance of the people. He very vividly gives an example to show how law cannot come into existence without a general acceptance by the people for whom it is meant. He says that when a country has just revived out of troubled times and a constitution is to be

10 Enforced conformity to a moral code, merely for the sake of such conformity, would not generally be thought in these days to be in itself of any value. To force a person by fear and threat of punishment to act according to certain moral standards is not to make him act morally. (Fitzgerald, P. J.: Criminal Law and Punishment, Oxford, 1962, p. 80.) Professor Hart admits that morality has its private aspect shown in the individual's recognition of ideals which he need either share with others or regard as a source of criticism of others, still less of society as a whole. (Hart, H. L. A.: Concept of Law, 1961, p. 179.)

14 "Law is a great civilizing agency, it is so not because it throws conduct into artificial uniformity and order, but because it is a working partner with the advancing ethical sense of the community." (Hookin, W.E.: Ways of Thinking About Rights: A New theory of the Relation between Law and Morals. A Century of Progress, N. Y. 1937.) And as shown by Professor Hart, "... the law of every modern State shows at a thousand points the influence of both the accepted social morality and wider moral ideals." (Hart, H.L.A.: The Concept of Law, 1961, p. 190.)

framed it is necessary to show that the constitution itself is necessarily good and right and in accordance with morality.¹⁵

Professor Fuller discusses the question of the morality of law itself. He points out that the distinction between 'order' (i.e. any law as it may be) and 'good order' (i.e. law as it ought to be) would involve several complexities arising from the difficulty in the concept of 'ought' and that of 'right'. Even just mere 'order' (leaving apart 'good order') involves some element of morality in it.¹⁶ Professor Fuller then shows, by an example of a selfish and absolute ruler whose word is law, that even his commands bear self-restraint; and his selfish aims would not be achieved until he is ready to accept "that minimum self-restraint that will create a meaningful connection between his words and his actions."¹⁷ Law, as pointed out by Professor Fuller, has its own intrinsic morality. Even an arbitrary despot has got to face the responsibility of his position; otherwise he will have to pass a meaningless command to punish himself.¹⁸

Though there may be a considerable volume of enactments that are not based on, and are not meant for the upkeep of, any moral principles, and stand only by the force of positivism, yet there are many laws, legal principles and decisions and rules based on definite and well-recognized moral principles and are meant to serve, protect and upkeep morality and to promote justice in the real (and not merely the positivistic) sense.¹⁹ Positivism is the outer garb or the formal instrumentality mainly for sanctions. In this connection what Professor Ralph Newman has so appropriately stated may well be noted. He says:

"In spite of the wide difference of opinion as to what is right or wrong in many situations, in spite of the impossibility of enforcing some moral duties by specific coercion, and in spite of the need of the law for uniformity, there remains a wide area in which the enforcement of moral standards which are generally accepted is perfectly practicable.... Among the moral standards setting forth certain minimum decencies of life, on which most men are in accord and which are particularly related to problems which are within the scope of effective legal control, are the substantive legal principles by which equity corrected the law in the early stages of its development and which later developed into a separate system. These principles can be correctly stated. They are that right should be based on substantial factors rather than on form; that the law should not aid the unscrupulous in carrying out their plans; that fully intended agreements should be carried out; that advantages gained through accident or mistake should be relinquished, and that hardship arising from accident or mistake should be fairly distributed even at the sacrifice of strict legal rights."²⁰

As Dean Roscoe Pound has so aptly expressed: "Equity and natural law insist on good morals. The strict law insists on form; equity and natural law on duty; the strict law insists on rule, equity and natural law on reason."²¹ Though law and morality are closely inter-related, and the one cannot be divorced from the other without baneful consequences, yet it should be borne in mind that law and morality cannot be regarded as identical.²²

22 "Law, positive morality and ethics are overlapping circles which can never entirely coincide, but the hand of man can move them and determine the content that is common to all or to two or confined to one.... We do find a close relationship between the rules of law and those of positive morality, for the latter determine the upper and lower limits of the effective operation of law. If the law lags behind popular standards it falls into disrepute; if the legal standards are too high there are great difficulties of enforcement." Paton, Jurisprudence, 2nd edn., p. 54. See also Bodenheimer, E. : Jurisprudence, 1962, p. 248, where he says "Law and morals do not represent entirely separate or mutually exclusive vehicles of social control. They converge and overlap on various occasions in the actual operation of a legal system." See also Del Vecchio : Philosophy of Law, p. 276. He says : "Between law and morals there is a distinction but not a separation."

Law is, and should always be regarded as, a means to an end; the end is the preservation of the social and moral order. There is always a purposive element in law; though the Legislature makes some laws for the purpose of expediency, still these laws do not lose their purposiveness, the underlying purpose being that of expediency.

Law seeks to promote the good of the people in the society in which it has been enacted, by promoting the proper integration of society, preventing strife and by protecting and harmonizing the various interests in the life of men in civilized society. It is concerned with recognizing and protecting the rights and liberties of the citizens in the State in relation to the State and also in relation to the citizens inter se. Administrative relations are dealt with under the administrative law of the country concerned. The law of property deals with regulating the proprietary status of the citizen and his rights and obligations arising from the ownership, possession and alienation of property. The legal order thus is a reflection of the social order and even the moral order to an extent. The task of the legislator should be that of an investigator,²³ first and foremost, into the changing needs of different sections of the people at the time and the place. With automation and technological advances, there may have to be new systems of legal control and limitations of hours of work so as to enable the human being to enjoy the fruits of his leisure.

Balancing of Interests

Dean Roscoe Pound considers law as a process of balancing of interests for removing conflicts and compromising of rival claims and interests of different sections of society. This is his theory of 'social engineering'.²⁴ The sociological jurist realises that the purpose of the law is that of promoting social, economic and moral interests in the life of men. If the law does not seek to do this, it would not have an important place in the scheme and would not serve the purpose of an effective means or value.

Solution of disputes by adjudication, discovery and recognition of the common need, agreement and negotiation between interested parties help to maintain the social order. A discovery and a recognition of the social order may best be served through sociological investigation of the common need, to the extent to which it may be possible.²⁵ Just as a physician cannot and should not prescribe the remedy without first diagnosing the disease, so also a law-maker must first determine what exactly is the malady in the existing law. It is necessary to see, for example, how the links of love in the family are maintained through the rules of family law, how the relation between husband and wife, between parents and children could be well balanced; it is fruitful to observe how the labour laws actually work and how industrial disputes are settled. It is important to determine the actual working of the rent laws and how those laws protect tenants while guarding landowners' rights also. It is also valuable to examine how the fundamental rights under the Constitution of the country concerned actually operate and to what extent curbs are necessary for maintaining the solidarity of the State while protecting and maintaining the fundamental freedoms of the citizens.

Laws have, to a great extent, to help religion to cleanse itself of some of its misconceptions. In India, a long time ago, the prevalent practice of sati was

23 In the words of Pollock: "The office of a lawyer is first to inform the legislature how the law stands, and then if change is desired... to advise how the change may be effected. Every modern legislature is constantly and largely dependent on expert aid of this kind." (Justice according to Law, 9 Harv. L. R. 307, 308, cited by Dr. J. M. Williams, in his "The Foundations of Social Science," at p. 212. Cited by Dr. M. J. Sethna, in his Jurisprudence, 2nd edn. p. 178, ft. n. 1.)

24 "Like an engineer's formulae, laws represent experience, scientific formulation of experience and logical development of the formulations; also inventive skill in conceiving new devices and formulating their requirements by means of a developed technique." that under which the widow was even forced to jump into the funeral pyre of her husband. Lord Macaulay passed a law against this practice. The people first thought this to be a great encroachment on their religious feelings and sentiments, but when moral consciousness dawned upon them they realized that the intention of such legislation was not that of hurting their religious sentiments but that of putting an end to this undesirable practice.

Conclusion

It may be said that apparently the dilemma lies in the difficulty of pursuing the ends together, namely, to admit purpose in legal reasoning and at the same time preserve a clear distinction between law and morality. We would, however, not be faced with this dilemma if we try to understand the great relationship between law and morals. A sharp line of distinction between law and morality cannot be drawn.

Holmes rules out the purposive element in law. According to him, law has only a predictive value; only enabling one to know what the Courts would do and how they would act in future.²⁶ If we were to put ourselves in the position of the Courts to see what they would do in the future, a host of presuppositions enter which cannot be examined. Prediction then disappears from our consciousness.

By a proper understanding of the relation between law and morality and by seeing to what extent there can be a separation (at the same time realizing that the one cannot be completely divorced from the other), it may be said that this dilemma would be minimised. Undoubtedly, problems would be found in all branches of philosophy, but by not insisting on a sharp line of distinction between law and morality, it can be realized that the dilemma is not so acute and its shadows not so grave.

GLEANINGS.

SOME ASPECTS OF COPYRIGHT LAW

IN the context of copyright law, "the word 'original' does not in this connection mean that the work must be the expression of original or inventive thought," said Peterson J. in the well-known case of University of London Press Limited v. University Tutorial Press Limited (115 L.T. 301; (1916) 2 Ch. 601). "Copyright Acts are not concerned with the originality of ideas, but with the expression of thought, and in the case of 'literary work' with the expression of thought in print or writing. The originality which is required relates to the expression of the thought. But the Act does not require that the expression must be in an original or novel form, but that the work must not be copied from another work—that it should originate from the author."

Copyright in any original literary work is automatic, and the dictum of Peterson J. makes it clear that even the simple writings of a schoolboy may constitute an original literary work. This prompts some general reflections on the nature of copyright and some of the law surrounding it. A start may be made by looking at the London University case. The university senate appointed examiners for its matriculation examinations. In a letter of appointment, sent to each examiner, it was made a condition that any copyright possessed by an examiner in the examination papers he prepared should be vested in the university. This is a common arrangement, as any present-day examiner will know. In turn the university assigned all the copyright and publication rights in the papers to the plaintiff company. These papers were later published in book form. The defendant company also republished some of the papers. The learned judge held that the examination papers were "literary works" within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Copyright Act 1911 (now sect. 2(1) of the Copyright Act 1956), and dealt with the meaning of the word "original" in the terms already set out. Among other things, the defendants pleaded the statutory defence of fair dealing with the papers for the purposes of private study (now contained in sect. 6(1) of the 1956 Act). Not surprisingly, that plea also failed, for the publication had been for private gain.

The originality or otherwise of a literary work is a matter of considerable importance. Once it is established that a work is "original," copyright is created the minute the work is committed to paper. It persists for the author's lifetime, and for 50 years after his death: sect. 2 of the 1956 Act. Under sects. 11-14 of the Literary Copyright Act 1842 provision was made for registration of literary copyright at Stationers' Hall. Although registration was not compulsory, before any action could be brought for infringement of copyright, the work had to be registered in this way: sect. 24 of the 1842 Act. The only formality now necessary arises in the case of international copyright under the Universal Copyright Convention signed at Geneva in 1952. This provides that all copies of a work published outside the territory of the member's state should bear the letter C, with the name of the owner of the copyright and the year of first publication.

Whatever may happen to the original manuscript, copyright remains with the author, unless he disposes of it. Thus, only a few weeks ago an American collector paid £1,000 for the original typescript of Georges Simenon's Maigret et les Braves Gens at a sale in London. His acquisition gives him no right to reproduce the work or to publish it any way. He bought it as a holograph—a literary curiosity. Copyright may be internationally protected under the provisions of the International Copyright Convention 1948 and similar international agreements.

Generally, the issues are fairly clear cut, but what of copyright in an unpublished lecture? Prior to 1911 there could be no copyright in an unpublished lecture, and, as is stated in Copinger and Skone James on Copyright (9th edit. p. 30), this would still seem to be law "that there is no copyright in a mere extempore speech. It is submitted, however, that, where a speech is made from notes, it might be held that anyone copying the speech was infringing the copyright in the notes." In order for copyright to subsist in a lecture, therefore, it must be expressed in print or writing, even if only in skeleton form. (A lecture includes an address, speech or sermon: sect. 35(1) of the 1911 Act.)

In Caird v. Sime (1887, 57 L.T. 634; 12 App. Cas. 326) the House of Lords had considered the question of copyright in lectures, albeit from a Scottish standpoint. The appellant was a professor at a Scottish university, and delivered lectures as part of his ordinary course. Students were admitted to the course on payment of the prescribed fees. It was held that, in delivering lectures in this manner, the lecturer does not communicate them to the whole world so as to entitle anyone to republish them without the author's permission. The appellant was entitled to restrain publication without his consent. Lord Fitzgerald, in his dissenting judgment, did not take that view. In his opinion delivery of the lectures was tantamount to a communication of them to the public at large. Sect. 48(1) of the 1956 Act defines "performance" so as to include the delivery of a lecture. In fact, in Caird v. Sime the decision turned round the fact that the public at large were not admitted.

It seems that, where a lecture is delivered to a limited audience, it is on the tacit understanding that, while the public can take the fullest notes for personal use, they cannot utilise them afterwards for the purpose of publishing the lecture for profit: see Nichols v. Pitman (1884, 50 L.T. 284; 26 Ch. D. 374). Probably a newspaper can report any lecture without infringing any copyright, assuming that reporters are permitted to be present: see sect. 6(3) of the 1956 Act.

It is quite clear that students present at a lecture can take down as much of it as they are able, for this contingency is envisaged by sect. 6(1), which provides: "No fair dealing with a literary...work for the purpose of research or private study shall constitute an infringement of the copyright in the work." It is equally clear, however, that an injunction would lie restraining publication, and for the destruction of existing copies, if any over-zealous student published his tutor's work without permission, or attempted to do so.

Recently the House of Lords considered the question of originality and the infringement of copyright in Ladbroke (Football) Limited v. William Hill (Football) Limited ((1964) 1 All E.R. 465.) The subject-matter of the copyright claim was somewhat unusual—a "fixed odds football coupon" prepared by the respondents, and widely used by the gambling public. There were two points at issue. First, whether the coupon was an original literary work within the meaning of sects. 2 and 48 of the 1956 Act; and secondly, if so, whether the part produced by the appellants as their own was a substantial part of the whole. (Sect. 48 defines "literary work" so as to include any written table or compilation.) The House of Lords (Lords Reid, Evershed, Hodson, Devlin and Pearce), affirming the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R. and Donovan L.J., Diplock L.J. dissenting), held that the coupons were the subject of copyright and that on the facts there was an infringement of it. Lord Reid, having quoted with approval the dictum of Peterson J. referred to at the beginning of this article, dealt quite shortly with the appellants' contention that only the skill and judgment involved in writing out the material had to be taken into account. The respondents' business, he said, "was to devise a coupon which would appeal to the betting public, and its form and arrangement were not something dictated by previous decisions about the nature of the bets to be offered. The appellants likened the coupon to a trader's catalogue of his wares, and argued that in considering whether a catalogue is entitled to copyright one must disregard the trader's skill and work in deciding what wares he will stock for sale and only consider the skill and labour involved in the actual preparation of the catalogue. I do not think that is a true analogy. Even in the case of a catalogue there may be a question whether the work in deciding what to sell and the work in deciding how to sell it are not so interconnected as to be inseparable. Copyright in a catalogue in no way prevents honest competition—any other trader can decide to stock and sell any or all of the catalogued articles, and he can thereafter make a new catalogue of his own wares. What he must not do is simply to copy the other trader's catalogue."

To continue the analogy, that is what the appellants had done in this case. Thus their ingenious defence was bound to fail. Lords Reid, Hodson and Pearce all expressly approved another dictum of Peterson J. in the London University case to the effect that "there remains the rough practical test that what is worth copying is prima facie worth protecting," and most certainly this provides a useful general guide.

Football coupons have been added to the catalogue of original literary works protected by the law of copyright. Collections of precedents are protected if the Scottish case of Alexander v. Mackenzie (1846), 9 Sess. Cas. (2nd Series) 784) is anything to go by, as are mathematical tables—Bailey v. Taylor (1829, 1 Russ. & My. 73)—and compilations of various kinds. These range from a list of railway stations in the unhappily defunct Bradshaw—Blacklock and Company Limited v. Arthur Pearson Limited (113 L.T. 775; (1915) 2 Ch. 376)—to a commercial advertisement: Maple v. Junior Army and Navy Stores (1882, 47 L.T. 589; 21 Ch. D. 369). The essence of the matter appears to be that there must be some skill and labour involved in the preparation of the work. Copinger and Skone James (op. cit. p. 39) sums up the matter in this way: "While the mere copyist of a written document does not obtain copyright in his copy, it is clear that neither original thought nor original research is essential, and that the standard of originality required is a low one. But it is difficult to state any principle upon which the standard is based." Each case is considered on its merits, but reported decisions provide general guidance and no surprise need be expressed at the Ladbroke decision, as skill, care and ingenuity were needed to draft a coupon to test the punter's skill.

Protection of copyright on an international basis has already been briefly referred to, and to round off the subject a few words on this aspect of the law may be helpful. The present international reciprocal arrangements arose out of a conference held at Berne, as a result of which the well-known Berne Convention was formulated in 1887. It was designed to eliminate pirated editions, and the original convention has been subsequently revised. The present definitive instrument is the Brussels Convention of 26 June 1948. Great Britain acceded to the convention with effect from 15 December 1957. The member countries agree to extend protection of copyright in their own countries to works protected in the country of origin. Art. 4(1) provides: "Authors who are nationals of any of the countries of the union shall enjoy in countries other than the country of origin of the work, for their works, whether unpublished or first published in a country of the union, the rights which their respective laws do now or may hereafter grant to their nationals, as well as the rights specially granted by this present convention" (Cmd. 361).

The United Kingdom also ratified, on 27 September 1957, the Geneva Convention of 1952, which attempts to rationalise still further the protection of copyright internationally, as many countries (notably the Americas) are not signatories to the Berne Convention, although the United States has bilateral copyright relations with many countries by virtue of treaties.—L.T.

JUDICIAL BLUE PENCILS

IN view of the appointment of a committee to advise on tape-recording court proceedings, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Baker, a recent case, casting doubt on the accuracy of shorthand reporting, is of interest. In Bromley v. Bromley [1964] 3 W.L.R. 666; a wife appellant had had delivered to her because of the pressure of time, a copy of the shorthand note of the judgment at first instance showing judge's revisions, rather than a plain copy incorporating them as is usual. For the appellant it was argued that the revisions showed marked variations from the original, particularly in regard to the findings of fact. The Court of Appeal, however, held that they would not look behind the revised version. They did, however, add that the position would be different if a judge so revised his judgment as to alter its sense materially. In such a case evidence from someone in court when it was delivered, preferably with a note taken at the time, would be needed. On the face of it, the private revision of judgments once given is open to criticism. One cannot doubt the human fallibility of shorthand writers, although the problems of taking down judgments are less than those often involved in recording evidence. The Court of Appeal also mentioned the difficulties of delivering extempore judgments, so the object of revision is often to ensure that the judge is recorded as saying what he meant to say. Normally, the parties have no chance to see the extent and nature of the judge's revisions. This case is a danger signal. It is clearly advisable for a solicitor to take a contemporaneous note of the findings on all material issues as judgment is delivered, so comparison can be made if a transcript is later bespoken.—S.J.

JUDGES AS LEGISLATORS

VISCOUNT RADCLIFFE told us at Folkestone that there was never a more sterile controversy than that upon the question whether a judge makes law. "Of course he does. How can he help it?" He went on to say that the Legislature and the judicial process respectively are two complementary sources of law-making, and in a well ordered state each has to understand its respective functions and limitations. Viscount Radcliffe said that more and more he is impressed by inescapable personal element in the judicial decision and that it is unreal to think of a judge of experience as a mere hearing aid and almost hypocritical to speak of him as if each presented itself to his eye in the light of the first dawn of creation. "To me, fairness of mind cannot involve such innocence as that...judicial decisions, no matter who gives them, must always be related to certain basic beliefs about the nature and purpose of a human being which are held by another human being. In that sense he (the judge) may not be 'objective'; but he can be honest and fair...the almost passionate desire sometimes shown by statute-makers to do the judge's work for him in advance by regulating in detail what they cannot even dimly envisage in practice needs to be firmly checked on...ground of constitutional propriety and common sense." The courts have definite disadvantages as legislators. Viscount Radcliffe himself dealt with Rookes v. Barnard [1964] 2 W.L.R. 269; by saying, among other things, that he would take it as fairly clear that it did not come anywhere near laying down a proposition to the effect that trade union officials, by intimating an absolute or conditional intention to call a strike, are thereby rendering themselves liable in damages to an employer affected. Those of us who have ploughed through the fifty pages in the Law Reports cannot say with any confidence what the case did decide and it is comforting at least to have the opinion of one former law lord, who took no part in the decision, on what it did not decide. Realists are delighted that Viscount Radcliffe has said so clearly that judges help to make the law; he would avoid the confusion (which so delights university professors) caused by dissenting judgments by having a single judgment of the House of Lords just as we have a single opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. One of the chief disadvantages of the courts as an instrument of law reform is that they depend on the accidents of litigation. By a side wind the position has been revolutionised by legal aid; we go so far as to say that many overdue measures of law reform have been brought about by legal aid.—S.J.

REVIEWS.

Foreign Enterprise in India: Laws and Policies. By MATTHEW J. KUST. BOMBAY: Oxford University Press, Oxford House, Apollo Bunder. Roy. 8 vo. Pages 498. Price Rs. 35.

THIS book is one of a series of studies prepared under the auspices of the American Society of International Law in its research programme "to describe and analyse", in the words of its Director, "by reference to the experience of and in selected countries, the legal institutions that affect the participation for foreign capital and technology in economic development and to clarify the factors that impede or facilitate foreign participation". The author is a member of the American Bar and for three years he was posted at New Delhi as a Department of State Legal Advisor for economic and technical assistance programmes in South and South-East Asia. In the light of his experience and study during his stay here, he refreshingly examines the legal environment for foreign capital in the context of India's present political, social and economic climate. He also deals comprehensively and analytically with the relevant Indian law and institutions that affect the participation of foreign capital in India. This well-documented and carefully prepared thesis will be invaluable to foreign collaborators and will prove useful to those concerned with the problems of international trade and finance. Further studies in this series, dealing with Colombia, Japan, Mexico and Nigeria, are promised in the near future and judged by their precursor, can be looked forward to with great interest.

Wages, Dearness Allowance, Bonus and other Allowances. By G. L. KOTHARI, Advocate, Maharashtra High Court. BOMBAY 2: Kothari Mc-Dunell & Co., 'A' Aidun Building, Dhobi Talao. Royal 8vo. Pages 603. Price Rs. 27.50.

BASIC wages, dearness allowance, bonus and other allowances and benefits which form the components of wages are exhaustively dealt with in this volume not merely from a legalistic point of view but are studied in the larger context of sociological jurisprudence. With this end in view the author has in the main part of the book endeavoured to present a rational texture of wage fabric deduced from principles laid down by judicial adjudication and has sought to determine how far these principles have achieved socio-economic objectives and attained social justice. In a final chapter the author has made some pertinent suggestions for formulation of a rational wage policy. A section of the book deals with the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, and the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, with their related State amendments. The parent Acts are expounded with brief commentaries and the relevant case law is referred to. The concluding section of the book reproduces reports and summaries of Fair Wages Committee, Bonus Commission and Central Wage Board. Much labour has gone into the preparation of this book which will provide much useful data at a time when, in the words of the author, there is need for evolution of a proper formula for just settlement of wage issue and the development of a system of wage fixation. This book which presents an important facet of labour law will be useful as a book of reference to all engaged in the complex problem of wage determination.

The Central Sales Tax Law. By KHARAG RAM CHATURVEDI, B.L., Advocate.
CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House Private Limited, 54 Ganesh Chandra Avenue.
1965. Roy 8vo. Pages 320 + 353. Price Rs. 25.

THIS treatise exhaustively deals with all the different aspects of the central sales tax law which has grown round the fifteen sections of the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. After considering the historical background and the factors which led to the passing of the Act, the author examines the provisions of the Act in the light of all the decisions of the Supreme Court and the various High Courts bearing on the subject. This is followed by a number of very useful appendices which inter alia contain, notifications about authorised officers who could sign and give valid D-Form certificates, State-wise list of tax-free goods, notifications under s. 8(5) issued by different States, and Sales Tax Geography showing the constituent districts and other important towns of the various States and Union territories of the Indian Union and the general sales tax laws as well as the particular Central Sales Tax Rules applicable to each of them. A portion of the book gives the full texts of the Central Sales Tax (Registration and Turnover) Rules, 1957, and the various Central Sales Tax Rules made by the individual States and the Union territories. This publication which contains all the relevant material on the Central sales tax law within the covers of a single handy volume will be indispensable not only to lawyers but also to sales tax practitioners and the business community at large as a safe and reliable guide through the mazes of an important wing of "the multi-storied sky-scraping criss-cross taxation-structure" in India.

Disciplinary action against Government servants and its Remedies. By KIRPA DAYAL SRIVASTAVA, M.A., LL.B., Advocate and NARESH KUMAR SRIVASTAVA, Advocate. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. Roy 8vo. Pages 680. Price Rs. 25.

IN a parliamentary democracy the important role played by civil servants can hardly be minimised and therefore constitutional safeguards for security of their tenure, machinery for redress of their grievances and discipline among them are crucial questions if they have to function as efficient members of the administration. The present book which now enters into a second edition within a short period of two years deals with the various aspects of these questions under different heads which cover such topics as, dismissals, removals, discharge, suspensions, reduction in rank, retrenchment, compulsory retirement, superannuation and resignation. Apart from a full reference to decided cases the book offers much useful material in the appendices which contain the texts of the All India Services Act, 1951, the Public Servants (Inquiries) Act, 1880, and the various Rules and Regulations affecting the Civil Services. This commendable effort to present the law on the subject which is garnered from various sources will be of much use to lawyers and Government employees.

Commentaries on the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923. By KIRPA DAYAL SRIVASTAVA, Advocate and NARESH KUMAR SRIVASTAVA, Advocate. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, 43 Lalbagh Road. Roy 8vo. Pages 380. Price 17.50.

THE Workmen's Compensation Act was the first piece of social security legislation in this country, and since it was passed as far back as in 1923 it has been amended several times so as to extend its application to cover a greater number of workmen and to allow them more compensation. The fundamental basis of the Act has, however, remained unchanged. The author of this commentary has critically analysed the provisions of the Act and as the Act has been modelled on the English statute of 1925 on the same subject, he has freely drawn upon English decisions and has moreover wherever necessary referred to the corresponding English law. The Indian case law is fully dealt with and liberal extracts are given from important English and Indian decisions to ensure a clear understanding of the principles involved. To add to the utility of the book the full text of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1924, is also included. Apart from the legal profession the book will be found useful to industrial workers and management of industries as the author has been at pains to adopt a popular approach in his exposition of the law without in any way sacrificing its more technical aspects.

Law on Bails, Forfeiture of Bonds & Habeas Corpus. By KESHAVA CHANDRA MEHROTRA, Advocate. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh. Roy 8vo. Pages 310. Price Rs. 15.

THE various provisions regarding bail are essentially a part of adjectival law and as such are regulated by the law under which a particular trial is held. The Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, contains an exhaustive statement of the powers to grant bail and there are also special Acts which lay down their own provisions regarding bail for offences falling under them. This book deals exhaustively with the various aspects of the law on bails in the light of the relevant case law. The author has inter alia discussed the stages at which the accused may be enlarged on bail and how such an application for bail has to be made, the authority which may grant bail, the powers of the Supreme Court, the High Court and the Court of Sessions to grant bail, bail from non-accused persons, discharge of sureties and forfeiture of bonds. A final chapter is devoted to directions in the nature of Habeas Corpus in which the implications of this high prerogative writ are considered. This handy book of reference which lucidly and succinctly expounds the entire law on bails will be of great practical use to criminal lawyers and judicial and police officers.

Please Your Worships. By BANSILAL C. VAKIL, B.A., LL.B. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd. 1965. Demi 8vo. Pages 196. Price Rs. 10.

THIS is a welcome addition to the rather scanty literature dealing with the lighter side of law as administered in India. The author who in the beginning of his career had occasion to appear before Honorary Magistrates has based most of his humorous sketches in this book in the setting of their Courts. It would be invidious to single out a particular sketch from a collection which offers a wide variety of humour but mention may be made of "Is mosquito killing an offence?" in which all the risible possibilities of a prosecution and acquittal of an offence under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1960, are worked out to their hilarious conclusion. At the same time the author's approach to the various incidents and anecdotes retailed in the book is leavened with his long experience on the Bench when he had occasion to observe, as he puts it, the quibbling of a lawyer and his playing on the vanity of a Court, the sense of self-importance of some practitioners usually practising in some higher Courts and their inability to adjust themselves and their submissions to the lower Courts. This is an eminently readable and entertaining book in a genre which unfortunately is not much practised here and which might come in as a corrective to the pomposity and ineptitude which are displayed in some of our judicial proceedings.

The Transfer of Property Act. By KAZI ABDUL-AZIZ, B.A., LL.B. KARACHI-29: Mrs. Nafees Begum A. Kazi, 6/1-F, P.E.C.H.S. Demi 8vo. Pages 353. Price Rs. 8.50.

THIS commentary on the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, as adapted in Pakistan is prepared for students of law by the author who was a lecturer and is now the vice-principal of the Sind Muslim Law College at Karachi. Knowing the special needs of the students, he has explained the difficult provisions of the Act and the principles underlying these, briefly and with commendable lucidity. The commentary is section-wise but in places different sections are grouped together for a complete understanding of similar topics dealt with by them. Important decisions are referred to and wherever necessary extracts from judgments are given to elucidate the points under discussion. The book can be recommended to students as a succinct and reliable guide to the law on the subject.

Principles of Mercantile Law. By KAZI ABDUL-AZIZ, B.A., LL.B., KARACHI: Mrs. Nafees Begum A. Kazi, 6/-F, P.E.C.H.S. Demi 8vo. Pages 90. Price Rs. 3.50.

THIS book, now in its second edition, deals with that portion of mercantile law which is prescribed by the University of Karachi in its syllabus for the 1st LL.B. examination. It briefly explains with the help of relevant case law, life, fire and marine insurance and contract of carriage by land, sea and air. Within a short compass the author has lucidly explained these topics and students going up for the law examination of the university will find it very useful.

ASCERTAINMENT OF A DECEASED COPARCENER'S SHARE.*

DR. DERRETT is critical of the view taken by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in *Shiramabai Bhimgonda v. Kalgonda*¹ on the ascertainment of a deceased coparcener's share² and subsequently preferred to characterize it as "fantastic"³. The present writer is of the view that in the absence of legislative intervention a liberal interpretation subserves best the ends of justice and, therefore, respectfully agrees with the view of the Bombay High Court. In eschewing the lines of least resistance like the literal construction and the views of text-writers their Lordships exhibited conspicuous judicial valour. The doctrine of inconsistency evolved in this decision constitutes a landmark in the judicial process in India and ushers a new era in the progressive interpretation of statutes.

Hiranandani says:

"The rule that law expresses the intention of the legislature applied in the good old leisurely days when laws were few and the legislators had the time to scrutinise the laws carefully before passing them. In these days, laws are not made. They are being manufactured. How can a machine have any volition?"⁴

Therefore the literal construction of Explanation I to s. 6 of the Hindu Succession Act pressed forward by the learned editor of Mulla and Dr. Derrett needs be examined with reference to the legislative history as to the objects and motives behind the adoption of particular language.

On cl. 5 of the first draft of the Hindu Succession Bill the Joint Committee stated⁵:

"The Joint Committee is of the opinion that this Bill is not complete unless it provided for a share to the daughter in Mitakshara Coparcenary properties and also regulated intestate succession to the properties governed by the Marumakkattayam, Aliyasantana and nambudri laws".

Referring to cl. 6 of Bill No. 13-B of 1954 (as amended by the Joint Committee) it was observed⁶:

"It makes clear that this Act does not in any way interfere with the special rights of those who are members of a Mitakshara Coparcenary except to the extent that it seeks to ensure to the female heir, if any, who would be entitled to succeed under the provisions of this Act, a rightful share in the property of such coparcenary".

It is important to notice that cl. 6 of Bill No. 13-B and cl. 6 of Bill No. 13-C refer to "partition" and not to "partition of property". To quote the language of the proviso to cl. 6 of Bill No. 13-C⁷:

"Provided that, if the deceased had left him surviving a female relative specified in Class I of the Schedule or a male relative specified in that class who claims through such female relative, such female or male relative shall be entitled to succeed to the interest of the deceased to the same extent as she or he would have done had the interest of the deceased in the coparcenary property been allotted to him on a partition made immediately before his death".

During the debate on the Hindu Succession Bill in the Lok Sabha, introducing a revised draft of cl. 6 and referring to Explanation I to cl. 6 of the Bill (that is Explanation I to s. 6 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, after the assent) Hon. Pataskar stated⁸:

"This was in the original Bill and it formed part of the first proviso. It had to be separated because we wanted to provide that there should be no hardship so far as the Punjab people were concerned".

Therefore the alteration in language of the section was intended to provide for the position in the Punjab where a son cannot ask for partition of the ancestral property during the lifetime of the father according to the Full Bench decision in *Hari Kishen v. Chandu Lal*⁹.

It is submitted: (1) That the interpretation sought to be put by the text writers like Mulla and Dr. Derrett on Explanation I to s. 6 was not actually contemplated by the Legislature; (2) That the words "partition of the property" in Explanation I to s. 6 was meant to be understood as "partition" in the earlier drafts; and (3) That the section and the Explanation in particular have been enacted to confer on daughters a share in the coparcenary properties and should be construed justly and equitably with reference to their rights.

Also, according to the decision of the Privy Council in *Pratapmull Agarwalla v. Dhanabati Bibi*¹⁰ a mother or grandmother would be entitled to a share on actual partition only. As has been observed by Mitter, J., in *Sheo Dyal v. Judoonath*¹¹:

"But partition, in her case, is the sole cause of her right to the property. It follows therefore, the effect cannot precede the cause".¹²

Therefore, it would savour of begging the question to allot shares to female members under a notional partition. As to *Munnalal v. Rajkumar*¹³ it cannot be deemed to have overruled Pratapmull Agarwalla's case, in toto. The case decides that where a preliminary decree in a partition suit has been passed allotting a share to a female member, it will be deemed to be property possessed by a female for the purposes of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. Where the applicability of s. 14 does not arise Pratapmull Agarwalla's case must be regarded as binding.

The present writer respectfully agrees with Dr. Derrett when he says

"It is of greatest importance that we should make up our minds whether greater injustice will follow in the vast majority of cases if the instant case is followed, than if it is eventually deviated from and another rule adopted".

For, as has been pointed out by Hiranandani¹⁴:

"The Courts have also liberally construed a statute where literal construction would lead to injustice".

In the submission of this writer a literal interpretation of Explanation I to s. 6 of the Hindu Succession Act, in the absence of statutory intervention, will give rise to much greater hardship and injustice, and will introduce complexity and diversity instead of promoting uniformity and simplicity in the Mitakshara law of succession. It is now attempted to discuss this aspect of the matter only. If literal interpretation were to prevail, it follows that effect must be given to the rule of Patni Bhaga where it is in vogue in the law of partition.¹⁵ The paternal grandmother should be allotted a share when a partition takes place between her son and his sons under the Bengal¹⁶ (in cases of families governed by the Mitakshara law) and the Mithila¹⁷ schools along with the wife or wives of her son; and she need not be allotted a share in the Bombay¹⁸ State and in case of a family governed by the Benaras School of Law¹⁹. She will be entitled to a share when partition takes place between her son and the sons of a deceased son, and also where the partition is between her sons' sons, her own sons being dead²⁰. In the South the practice of allotting shares to female members had become obsolete and therefore no share need be allotted under a notional partition. The literal construction inevitably leads to disparity in the shares of female heirs under the Mitakshara law in the different regions. Such a construction might well offend art. 14 of the Constitution. The decision in *The State of Bombay v. Narasu Appa*²¹ will not be of avail in this context, for therein Gajendragadkar J., as he then was, observed:

"...So long as the State Legislature in taking gradual steps for social welfare and reform does not introduce distinctions or classifications which are unreasonable, irrational or oppressive, it cannot be said that the equality before law is offended".

In trying to evaluate the relative merits of liberal and literal interpretations, one question of crucial importance needs be answered. That is: Where a widow of the deceased gets a share in the coparcenary properties under s. 6 and subsequently an actual partition takes place among the sons is the widow-mother entitled to a further share under the law of partition? This question is, as yet, not specifically decided by the Courts. Dr. Derrett thinks she is "indubitably entitled to a share". In Shiramabai's case their Lordships observe:

"But now that they are entitled to succeed to a share on the death of the husband and father under section 4 the rule of partition must be deemed to have been abrogated". The present writer respectfully doubts Dr. Derrett's view for the following reasons:

(1) The judicial decisions hold and the writers on Hindu law generally agree that the share given to a widow-mother at a partition after the death of the father is in lieu of maintenance. In *Munnalal v. Rajkumar*²² Shah J. stated:

"...It is true that under the Sastric Hindu Law, the share given to a Hindu widow on partition between her sons or her grandsons was in lieu of her right to maintenance". As the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, codifies the law on the subject and confers a specific right of maintenance under its provisions, the right of a widow-mother to take a share on partition stands abrogated under s. 4(a) of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956.

(2) In the view of the learned editor of Mayne the Hindu Women's Right to Property Act, 1937, "replaces" the right of a widow-mother to take a share on partition. Referring to that Act it was observed²³:

"The Act replaces the rule of Hindu Law recognised in all the Provinces except in Madras where it has become obsolete, that a widow was entitled to a share when her sons or her step-sons actually divided the estate between themselves".

The observations of the Supreme Court in Munnalal's case lend support to the above view, wherein Shah J. stated (p. 1500):

"...It is true that under the Sastric Hindu Law, the share given to a Hindu widow on partition between her sons or her grandsons was in lieu of her right to maintenance.

She was not entitled to claim partition. But the Legislature by enacting the Hindu Women's Right to Property Act, 1937 made a significant departure in that branch of the law; the Act gave a Hindu widow the same interest in the property which her husband had at the time of his death, and if the estate was partitioned she became owner in severalty of her share, subject of course to the restrictions on disposition and the peculiar rule of extinction of the estate on death actual or civil". (Emphasis added).

The repeal of the Hindu Women's Right to Property Act, 1937, cannot have the effect of reviving the right of a widow-mother to take a share at a partition, in view of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897.

Thus, the literal interpretation can well lead to the anomaly that while we reduce the share of a deceased coparcener on the basis that female members are entitled to shares at a partition, and thereby reducing the shares available to female heirs under s. 6, an actual partition can be postponed merely to defeat their rights or even if it takes place no share need be allotted to the widow-mother.

Even if it is assumed for the sake of argument that a widow-mother is entitled to both the shares, that is under the law of succession and at a partition, the hardship is not obviated. Though technically the widow-mother seems to be a recipient of two shares, her shares cannot exceed the share of a son at a partition, in view of the deduction of stridhana from her share at a partition. Vyavahara Mayukha after citing Yajnavalkya (ii, 123), Vishnu (xviii, 34) and another Smriti says:

"The meaning is, that if she (mother) have dower she shall take only so much as, with that dower, will make her an equal sharer with her sons. But no share (belongs to her) if the property be more than that share".²⁴

To take a concrete illustration: A joint family consisted of deceased father, two sons S1 and S2, two daughters D1 and D2, and a widow-mother W1. The coparcenary property is worth 24000 units. According to the interpretation of Mulla, on the death of the father, W, D1 and D2 will each get 1200 units. At a subsequent partition between S1 and S2 the widow will get (according to Dr. Derrett's view) 4800 units which with her share of 1200 units under the Succession Act will make up for 6000 units. Whereas under the liberal interpretation W1, D1 and D2 will each be entitled to 1600 units. If there is a subsequent partition the widow-mother will be entitled to 3733.3 units which together with her share on succession will be 5333.3 units. No doubt it looks impressive that the mother will be getting 6000 units instead of 5333.3 units. But one must not forget that out of the gain accruing to the coparcenary by the literal interpretation, the sons take a lion's share. In fact in all normal cases where the deceased had left behind not more than one widow, sons and daughters, the maximum benefit to the widow from the gain to the coparcenary property cannot exceed 1/3. If "n" represents the number of sons and there is one widow her share in the accretion arising out of the literal interpretation will be $1/(n+1)$. Here the minimum n will be two, for there cannot be a partition with less than two sons. In other words the maximum benefit that can be obtained by a widow (where the deceased leaves one widow only) from the saving to coparcenary property by a literal interpretation cannot be greater than 1/3 of the saving. The literal interpretation results in augmentation of coparcenary property to the detriment of daughters, and also of mother of a deceased in some cases.

Their Lordships wanted to avoid such result and stated:

"It (Mulla's view) would be highly unjust to her and the other heirs and the sons' shares will be augmented for which there is no rational reason".

Sometimes it is argued that even though a daughter's share is reduced under the literal interpretation still as she is an heir to her mother's property along with the son, under s. 15 of the Hindu Succession Act, there is no real injustice.

While noticing this argument we must remember that execution of wills is not common amongst women in India. So what?

On the intestacy of a woman, if the number of sons exceeds that of daughters in a family, greater portion of the wealth of the mother will go to sons and vice versa. Can it be said that in India in an average family the daughters outnumber the sons? It will be instructive to consider the demographical data at this stage²⁶. The sex ratio at birth for 100 females according to 1951 census in the North, East, West and Central Zones is 105, 101, 101 and 102 respectively. The higher mortality rate among Indian women is well known. The sex ratio per thousand males in some States where the question under consideration assumes importance is as follows: Maharashtra 936; Punjab 864; Rajasthan 903; Uttar Pradesh 909; Madhya Pradesh 953; Gujarat 940 and Bihar 994.²⁷ "The feature of higher masculinity of Indian population is intriguing, but has not been studied in detail."²⁸ If we notice the number of males and females age-wise upto 69 years in the 1961 census we find that in the Northern Zone the females outnumber males only in the figure for the age of 20; in the Central Zone at the ages of 20, 28, 34, 38, 48, 58 and 68; in the Western Zone at the age of 3, 20, 22, 24, 28, 60 and 65²⁹. In the 1951 census per 100 households sons were 108 and daughters 81³⁰. From this data the assumption that in an average family the sons are either equal to or greater than the number of daughters is justified and the view that the daughters vicariously obtain an advantage by the gain to the property of the mother is not convincing.

Another disquieting feature about the literal interpretation is that it has the effect of "feeding the rich and starving the poor" among the female heirs. If the assumption that a mother is entitled to a share at a subsequent partition is correct, the widow-mother is well provided for under the Act. Mother is a Class I heir to a deceased son and as has been pointed out if sons die as infants there is a greater concentration of properties in the hands of the mother³¹. The literal interpretation results in hardship to the needy among the female's heirs like an issueless widow daughter-in-law and a widowed daughter.

Also if the deceased had contracted avyavaharika debts, the shares devolving under s. 6 of the Hindu Succession Act will have to bear the burden, whereas the interest of the sons in the coparcenary properties arising from the right by birth will not be liable. This affects the proprietary interest of female heirs vis-a-vis that of sons.

An argument against the liberal interpretation which has considerable force and which appears to have troubled their Lordships, is that it might affect the rights of unmarried sisters of a deceased coparcener, who might not have acquired any share in the joint family properties or other properties. It is submitted: (1) Social factors reveal that on a balance hardship to daughters is apt to be more than gain to unmarried sisters by a literal interpretation. (2) That within the ambit of the existing law the hardship, if any, can be relieved.

Sociologists refer to a family consisting of parents and unmarried children as a nuclear family, and where it consists of parents, married and unmarried children, or any family consisting of members of three or more generations as a joint family. Their studies reveal that even prior to 1957, the nuclear families were equal, if not more than the joint families. Prof. Kapadia observes³². "In rural community, the proportion of joint families is almost the same as that of nuclear families". His study indicates that while among the higher castes we find 0.6 nuclear family per every joint family, among the lower castes every joint family has its counterpart 1.2 nuclear families. Further in view of the land legislations in most States joint families (in the sociological sense) became nuclear families by effecting partitions. Otherwise one does not find any necessity for s. 10 of the Maharashtra Land Ceilings legislation³³. And in the joint families

"the cases where unmarried sisters are to be provided for along with the daughters of the deceased must be fewer in number for it must be either a case where there the deceased died prematurely, in which case the statistical probability is far less or if the deceased had the normal span of life, the unmarried sister must be belonging to the higher age-group. It may be noted that the proportion of unmarried women to the total population of India diminishes rapidly with successive age-groups."³⁴

But even in the limited number of cases where there is hardship, relief can be envisaged within the ambit of the existing Hindu Law of partition. Mitakshara lays down:

"Sisters also who are not already married must be disposed of in marriage by the brethren, contributing a fourth part of their own allotments".³⁵

In *Rajagopala Ayyar v. Venkatarama*³⁶ the Privy Council accepted the proposition that the right of an unmarried daughter in a joint Hindu family for maintenance and marriage expenses is in lieu of a share on partition and allowed the mother the right of reimbursement for marriage expenses where she had already incurred them. The Full Bench of the Madras High Court in *Subbayya v. Ananta Ramayya*³⁷ relies on the analogy of the law of debts in relation to the marriage expenses of unmarried daughters (females of the first generation in our discussion). Ramesan J. observed³⁸:

"...But the debts of a father not illegal or immoral will certainly fall upon all branches of the family not only upon the father but upon the branches of each of his sons. In each case we have to see whether there is an obligation peculiar or personal to the head of the particular branch or sub-branch or an obligation to which the whole family is liable. In the case of a father's debts, the whole family is liable; in the case of son's debts, the son's branch only is liable...Therefore, after partition, the obligation falls upon all the members of the family...The analogy of the debts which is well-established and well-known makes my meaning clear".

In the writer's humble view the above analogy can provide a solution to the difficulty encountered in relation to the marriage expenses of the unmarried sisters of the deceased. Not only the coparcenary interest of the sons but also the shares devolving on sons and other female heirs under s. 6 should be made liable for such expenses. The Courts are bound to consider this question afresh in view of the categorical duty cast on the brethren to initiate the unmarried sisters.

The present writer submits that a literal construction of Expl. 1 to 6 will give rise to much injustice and needless diversity and complexity. In conclusion it may be said that if what has been laid down by the learned Judges in Shirumabai's case is not sound law then so much the worse for law.

THE CONVERT'S POLYGAMOUS MARRIAGE.*

THE Judicial Committee of the Privy Council cannot make pronouncements on the laws of India nowadays with authority (as it very well knows), but it may still happen that Indian cases may be studied there and commented upon. A curious instance of this has arisen in the case of *Attorney-General of Ceylon v. Reid*¹, the Advice in which is supported by a commendably clear and concise judgment. This was an appeal by special leave from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon. The facts were somewhat disquieting. One Reid married a Christian lady according to Christian rites in Badulla in 1933. They lived together as man and wife for 24 years and there were eight children of the marriage. At the end of those 24 years the wife left her husband and obtained a maintenance order against him in the Magistrates' Court of Colombo. About two years later Reid himself and a divorced lady called Pansy, subsequently Fatima Pansy, were both converted to the Muslim faith. A month later they were married by the registrar of Muslim marriages at Colombo, after all the statutory formalities had been duly complied with. A little over two years later (one wonders why so long a delay occurred) Reid was indicted, and subsequently convicted, for bigamy under s. 362B of the Ceylon Penal Code which corresponds to s. 494 of the Indian Penal Code.

The litigation proceeded upon the footing that the conversion was sincere. Why the two sides agreed this highly debatable point is not clear. Here was a case, one might suppose, where, if ever, it might have been profitable to argue the insincerity and therefore ineffectiveness of the supporting conversion. However, it seems that the factum of conversion could not be impugned, and the matter must rest there.

Their Lordships found that the question of Reid's guilt turned upon the words of the section, "...marries in any case in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of such husband or wife..." Was this second marriage a marriage void because of the existence of the first wife?

There were no distinct authorities in the Privy Council. The passing opinion expressed by James, L.J., in *Skinner v. Orde*² was cited but not treated as decisive—no doubt correctly. There were no authorities in Ceylon on the subject. Public policy would, one might suppose, have required the closest scrutiny of such a situation. If we are to admit that any non-Muslim husband, tired of his first, Hindu or Christian, wife, and unable to divorce her, but willing to pay for her maintenance so much as the Court will be able to extract from him, might simply become a Muslim and then marry the lady of his current fancy, should we not be admitting a great fault in the legal system of the country? Is Islam to be utilised with such motives? The matter requires the closest thought. If one feels (as this writer does) that Islam should not be utilised for this sort of abuse of the law of marriage, it might be one further argument for gradually inhibiting the right of plural marriages by Muslims. The argument, to which we return, namely that cases are numerous in which conversion or re-conversion to Hinduism was allowed to have exactly the same effect, is no longer operative, since Hindus cannot since 1955 contract marriages while spouses to whom they are validly married still live. An argument on the other side is that a wife, whose husband embraces Islam in this fashion and for this purpose, has a simple remedy in that she can sue for matrimonial relief³. But this is hardly adequate in the case of the majority community for whom divorce is not always a desirable step. In Hindu as in Christian marriages the status of marriage does not preclude termination by divorce: but prima facie open to her, in default of cruelty or desertion, is that given in s. 13 (i) (ii): "...has ceased to be a Hindu by conversion to another religion." It will be recollected that cruelty and/or desertion are at present grounds only for judicial separation or separate maintenance.

the unexpected arrival of a co-wife via the husband's change of religion is a hazard for which few can be said to be prepared. Yet the device, which had not been examined in the Privy Council before, and had apparently not bothered the Courts of Ceylon, had often been attempted in India.

The Privy Council turned to Indian cases. A complete set of Indian authorities was not before their Lordships' Board. But the necessary distinctions were observed, with a result which will be observed by authors of textbooks on Indian Criminal Law in their future commentaries on s. 494. The decision of Holloway and Innes, JJ., in Proceedings, dated 8th November 1866^{3a} was favourably cited. The case was one where a Hindu was converted to Christianity, married a Christian, reverted to Hinduism and married a Hindu—a pattern not seldom repeated in the succeeding century. Their Lordships noticed that when a non-Christian became a Christian he did not throw off for ever the possibility of marrying polygamously. The Privy Council quoted from Innes J.'s judgment with approval. Our instant judgment goes on to contrast the case of *Emperor v. Lazar*⁴, in which the earlier Madras cases was not followed. The Privy Council distinctly disapprove of the reasoning in that case. Their Lordships had there relied on English bigamy cases where they should have distinguished them (for both marriages were monogamous marriages), and on other cases, notably In the matter of Ram Kumari,⁵ which most certainly should have been distinguished, since no one can contend that any wife can marry during the lifetime of a spouse by a subsisting marriage, whatever religion she may embrace, plural marriages being open only to Muslim males and (at that period) to Hindu males.

Their Lordships of the Privy Council place emphasis (at pp. 816-7) upon the judgment of Henderson J. in *John Jiban Chandra Datta v. Abinash Chandra Sen*⁶. This case was a case in succession and not marriage, nor was bigamy directly in issue, but the validity of the marriage of a convert from Christianity to Islam to a Muslim lady while his Christian wife still lived was under consideration. Their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court held that upon conversion to Islam the husband became perfectly entitled to contract a further marriage with a Muslim lady.

Citing Chagla J., as he then was, in Robasa Khanum v. Khodadad Bomanji,⁷ their Lordships of the Privy Council emphasise that in India and equally in Ceylon there is no one law of marriage. No marriage was therefore in essence not potentially polygamous. It was emphasised that in a country of many personal laws a change of faith must mean a change of personal law, and so long as no statute provided to the contrary there could be no impediment to full enjoyment of the rights attached to the new personal law.

"In their Lordships' view, in such countries there must be an inherent right in the inhabitants domiciled there to change their religion and personal law and so to contract a valid polygamous marriage if recognised by the laws of the country notwithstanding an earlier marriage. If such inherent right is to be abrogated, it must be done by statute. Admittedly there is none."⁸

The appeal failed, and the respondent, Reid, was held free from guilt.

It will be noted that the position which is adopted in this case is entirely in accord with the more recent Indian case law. Datta v. Sen was decided in 1939. Independently the High Courts of Madras and Mysore have followed rather the authority of Emperor v. Antony,⁹ for what it was worth, than that of Emperor v. Lazar.¹⁰ In cases of Hindus being converted to Christianity and relapsing into Hinduism in order to marry another wife the Courts held that no offence of bigamy within s. 494 was committed thereby: David v. Sudha,¹¹

Mrs. Marthamma v. Munuswami.¹² The case of Lazar seems now to be no longer good law.

There is, however, a statement in the course of the judgment not necessary to the decision and therefore not to be treated too seriously. At p. 814 E their Lordships say that it is not in controversy between the parties that "the first wife can if she so desires treat the second marriage as an adulterous association by her husband on which she can found a petition for divorce." This cannot be right. As the quotation from Datta v. Sen at p. 817 C shows, the second marriage, now held not to be bigamous, is valid and not void, and is not adulterous. Matrimonial offences are judged according to the law applicable to the alleged offender and it has never been the position that a husband of two wives under a polygamous system commits adultery against one wife when he has intercourse with the other.

What follows from this? A Hindu husband falls in love with a young girl whom he can obtain in marriage if he finds a method of so doing. He has no complaint against his Hindu wife, beyond the fact that she no longer attracts him. He treats her with every courtesy. But for the Hindu Marriage Act of 1955 he might have married within Hinduism. The law in fact drives him out of the faith. He and his lady love are converted to Islam. They marry according to Muslim usages. He brings his Muslim wife home. He expects his Hindu wife to live amicably with them. If she sees no prospect of gaining from suing for matrimonial relief upon the only possible ground, namely change of religion, the triangular household somehow manages to survive.

Having become a Muslim for the purpose of marrying, the question may arise whether the convert can freely relapse into Hinduism. Why not? There are respects in which, no doubt, full return to his pre-Muslim condition will be impossible. But do these matter in this day and age? Some Hindus will surely accept him, especially when it is pointed out to them that the conversion was genuine but under the influence of emotion which, when satisfied, gave place to more sober feelings. The lady will likewise relapse into Hinduism. And the triangular household is placed in the situation which it might have occupied but for the Act of 1955, save that the husband has paid a penalty for his religious scruples which, we may be sure, he will not have rated very dear. Someone may object that being a Hindu he cannot have two wives? To this there is a complete answer. One cannot evade one's responsibilities by changing one's faith: *In the matter of Ram Kumari*¹³, and so a husband, by relapsing into Hinduism, does not imperil his rights as against his now-Muslim wife, any more than he deprives her of her rights against him, and the position is not altered if she too relapses into Hinduism. So long as the original Hindu wife is willing to suffer this arrangement the compulsory monogamy of the contemporary Hindu seems to be more nominal than real.

One amusing discovery out of all this relates to s. 13 (2) (i) of the Hindu Marriage Act. That clause was intended to enable wives of polygamous husbands to obtain their freedom, if they wished, upon the mere ground of the subsistence of another marriage of the common husband. But unfortunately the clause refers only to marriages which took place prior to the enactment of the statute itself. Where a Hindu husband has validly married again after the Act (we have shown above how he can do it) he commits no matrimonial offence thereby. Even the provision of a ground for relief in change of religion (see s. 13 (1) (ii)) "has ceased to be a Hindu by conversion to another religion" cannot help her if, shortly after his Muslim marriage he relapses into Hinduism. It is very difficult to claim relief on the ground that a husband became a Muslim if his first defence is that he has been a Hindu and remains a Hindu, notwithstanding a period as a non-Hindu. And the husband may provide no other ground for relief.

[1949] A.I.R. Cal. 436 to the extent there contended for. The rights gained by a change of faith do not extend to the divorcing or repudiating of an existing spouse. The decision in Sinammal v. The Administrator General of Madras, (1885) I.L.R. 8 Mad. 169 may not now be good law.

GLEANINGS.

NEGLIGENCE AT LEVEL CROSSINGS

THE coming of the railways in the last century ushered in an era of cheap and speedy transport, but at the same time brought many legal problems in its wake. As Pollock and Maitland pointed out (History of English Law, vol. 2, p. 471): "In 1846 we still in theory maintained the rule that any animate or inanimate thing which caused the death of a human being should be handed over to the king and devoted by his almoner to pious use 'for the appeasing,' says Coke, 'of God's wrath'." Deodands were eventually laid to rest by the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 62.

Problems of greater magnitude arose too. Thus, sparks from steam locomotives sometimes set fire to standing corn, but in the absence of negligence the farmer was without remedy: Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company (1860, 2 L.T. 394; 5 H. & N. 679). The mantle of statutory authority clothed the railway companies with a protective coat—e.g. the Railway Fires Acts 1905-1923—but with the advent of diesel and electric locomotives such things have become of little more than historical interest.

However, one railway-inspired problem is of abiding importance. Put shortly, what liability attaches to the railway companies (and their successor the British Railways Board) in connection with level crossings? What are their duties in respect to the public, whether pedestrians or drivers?

The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 deals, in sect. 47, with the case of public crossings thus: "If the railway cross any turnpike road or public carriage road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway, where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates; and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across such road on both sides of the railway, except during the time when [road traffic] passing along the same shall have to cross such railway." Thus far the position is clear, although today the gates at level crossings are more often than not operated automatically. The basic duty of care remains the same.

Gray v. North Eastern Railway Company (1883, 48 L.T. 904) is authority for the proposition that it is the duty of a railway company whose line crosses the public highway at a level crossing to take reasonable precautions to warn persons using the crossing of the approach of trains. What are reasonable precautions depend on all the relevant circumstances, but there is voluminous case law on points surrounding the duty imposed by sect. 47. Thus, in North Eastern Railway Company v. Wanless (1874, 30 L.T. 275; L.R. 7 H.L. 12) a youth came to a crossing and followed a horse-drawn vehicle on to the line. Seeing a train approaching on the up line, he waited until it had passed, but in doing so was caught and killed by a down train. The company was bound by sect. 47 to have the gates closed at the time, and this was held to be sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the company. Again, in Charman v. South Eastern Railway Company (1888, 21 Q.B.D. 524) the defendants were held to be in breach of the obligation imposed by sect. 47 where a fence adjoining level crossing gates had been allowed to fall into disrepair, and the plaintiff's horses got through on to the line and were killed. The duty to keep the level crossing itself in repair is a duty to see that it is kept in a state of repair suitable for ordinary and regular traffic: Oliver v. North Eastern Railway Company (1874, L.R. 9 Q.B. 409).

In Stubley v. London and North Western Railway Company (1865, 13 L.T. 376; L.R. 1 Ex. 13) it was made clear that there is no general duty on railway companies to place gatekeepers at level crossings, provided other due precautions are taken. Their obligation is to do all that is reasonably necessary to secure the safety of those who are using the crossing. The burden of proving negligence lies on the plaintiff and the important decision of the House of Lords in Wakelin v. London and South Western Railway Company (1886, 55 L.T. 709; 12 App. Cas. 41) serves to illustrate this. There a man's body was found on the line at a level crossing, at a point from which trains coming in either direction could be seen from a considerable distance. The accident took place at night, and, though the driver had not sounded his whistle as he approached the crossing, the train had carried headlights. As Lord Halsbury L.C. observed, there was nothing "to show that the train ran over the man rather than that the man ran against the train," and accordingly the evidence did not disclose any negligence on the part of the respondents. However, in Smith v. South Eastern Railway Company (73 L.T. 614; (1896) 1 Q.B. 178) it was possible to draw a "reasonable inference" of negligence where the deceased had crossed the line to visit the gate-keeper in his cottage on a dark but clear night. The usual practice was for the gate-keeper, on receiving a signal from further down the line, to go out and signal to approaching trains that the line was clear. On the night in question, after the deceased had left, he remained in his cottage, and almost immediately a train was heard to whistle, and the body of the deceased was found on the line. On the facts, there was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the railway company. The principle of res ipsa loquitur is frequently called in aid in a case of this sort because "where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care:" per Erle C.J. in Scott v. London Dock Company (1865, 13 L.T. 148; 3 H. & C. 596).

The same principles will apply where a level crossing is replaced by a subway, as the more recent case of Law v. Railway Executive (1949, 65 T.L.R. 251), a decision of Hallet J., shows. There the defendants had not taken reasonable precautions to make a subway, which replaced by statutory authority a public level crossing, safe, and they were liable to the plaintiff, albeit he had been contributorily negligent. The railway company are not insurers, but are under a duty to take reasonable care in all the circumstances to see that the crossing is safe. The general principles of negligence apply, and, broadly speaking, all depends on the particular facts.

In the case of private accommodation crossings different principles might apply. Once again, there is a duty to take all reasonable precautions, and the difference is in the degree of care which is required in all the circumstances. The position was fully reviewed in Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford Railway Company v. Stattery (1879, 39 L.T. 365; 3 App. Cas. 1155). There the deceased had attempted to cross the line at a private accommodation crossing late at night, a spot where the public were in the habit of crossing with the acquiescence of the company. At the time he attempted to cross the up line there was a train standing on the down line which obscured his view. He was struck by an express train and killed. Although the train carried lights, it was held by the House of Lords that there was evidence of negligence to go to the jury, as it seemed that, in spite of a company ruling that express trains should whistle at this point, the driver had failed to do so. The effect of notices forbidding members of the public to cross the line was also considered. Their lordships held that, where such notices are displayed, but are constantly disregarded by the public, and the railway authority have not interfered, they cannot subsequently set up the existence of the notices by way of answer to an action for damages.

A similar point arose to be decided in the recent decision of the Privy Council in Commissioner of Railways v. Quinlan ((1964) 1 All E.R. 897), where the respondent was a trespasser on a private level crossing, the gates of which were open. He was injured by a train, the driver of which sounded his whistle too late to be a sufficient warning. The Judicial Committee held that, in these circumstances, the trespasser must take the occupier's activities on the land as he finds them, for there is no duty of care towards a trespasser. The only obligation on an occupier is not to cause wilful injury to a trespasser. In Slattery's case the deceased was not a trespasser, as the occupiers had acquiesced in the position.

The leading case on private accommodation crossings is undoubtedly Cliff v. Midland Railway Company (1870, 22 L.T. 382; L.R. 5 Q.B. 258), which has been applied on many subsequent occasions. The facts are not without interest. The plaintiff, while using a private accommodation crossing, was knocked down and injured by a train, allegedly as a result of the defendants' negligence. There were gates across the road, which were left open, and at one time the railway company had kept a gate-keeper at the crossing, although they had ceased to do so for some time before the accident. A few years before the accident the defendants had received statutory authority to make a new road and discontinue the crossing, these powers to be exercised within a period of five years. In fact, nothing was done about the road until after the accident. The jury negatived negligence in the train driver, but found for the plaintiff on the general ground of "negligence as to the crossing." In summing up the judge left to the jury as evidence of negligence the company's omission to keep a gate-keeper and their failure to exercise their statutory powers. This was held to be a misdirection.

The principle of Cliff was applied by the Court of Appeal in Liddiatt v. Great Western Railway Company (175 L.T. 224; (1946) 1 All E.R. 731), where the plaintiff's servant was driving some cattle over a private accommodation crossing, some 200 yards down the line from a public level crossing which was operated by a gate-keeper. The gate-keeper did not have any regard to the private accommodation crossing, and only one gate of it was visible to him. The Court of Appeal held that the defendants were under no duty to place a keeper at the accommodation crossing, and its nearness to the manned public crossing did not extend their duty in any way.

The duty laid on a railway company in these circumstances is a duty to take reasonable precautions: per Pickford J. in Jenner v. South Eastern Railway Company (1911, 105 L.T. 131). In that case a man drove over an accommodation crossing habitually used for vehicular traffic to the defendants' knowledge and without hindrance by them. The line was curved, and a sign-board instructing train drivers to whistle was partially obscured by a line of trees, which might possibly deaden the sound of approaching trains. The learned judge found on the facts that the precautions taken were an insufficient safeguard for vehicular traffic, but was at pains to point out that the degree of care required varied with all the circumstances. It may be observed that a private accommodation crossing may become a public crossing, as, for example, happened in Lloyds Bank Limited v. Railway Executive ((1952) 1 All E.R. 1248), and in such a case the company are bound by the requirements of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (and similar statutes), which require inter alia the provisions of a gate-keeper. Denning L.J., as he then was, pointed out there that, apart from the statutory requirements, the company is under a common law duty to prevent danger, and as this increases, so must their precautions increase. Clearly, in these days of express diesels and other fast locomotives, a higher standard of precautions is required than in the days of Stephenson's "Rocket."

As in all cases where negligence is alleged, no clear cut answer is possible, and all must depend largely on the facts of the case. That a duty of care exists in favour of users of level crossings there is no doubt, and as Lord Macmillan said, in dealing with negligence in general in Glasgow Corporation v.

Muir (169 L.T. 53; (1943) 2 All E.R. 44, 48), "those who engage in conduct inherently dangerous must take precautions which are not required of persons engaged in the ordinary routine of daily life." There may be only one standard of care, but the degree of care is variable. Thus, greater precautions are necessary in the case of public level crossings than those required at private crossings, while a trespasser must take things as he finds them. The statutory obligations imposed are quite unequivocal, but, as the foregoing survey shows, considerable latitude exists.—L.T.

CONNIVANCE

ONE evening the husband came home to find the wife and the co-respondent embracing. Angrily and in the heat of the moment he said: "If you two want to go to bed together, why the hell don't you?" He slept in his son's room. In the morning he turned the co-respondent out of the wife's bed. Thereafter he made persistent and genuine efforts to persuade the wife to give up the co-respondent and return to him, but without success. During the next twelve months, up till the date of the petition, the wife continued the adulterous relationship which had begun on that crucial night. In these circumstances the House of Lords was called upon to consider the law relating to connivance: Godfrey v. Godfrey and Wall [1964] 3 W.L.R. 524.

The classic definition of connivance is to be found in the judgment of Lord Merriman, P., where he said:—

"The issue is whether, on the facts of the particular case, the husband was or was not guilty of the corrupt intention of promoting or encouraging either the initiation or the continuance of the wife's adultery."

Churchman v. Churchman ([1945] P. 44, at p. 52 (C.A.)), now indorsed by Godfrey, supra.

First, although as a matter of language, connivance means literally to "wink at" or "to take no exception to," as a matter of law mere passivity is not enough. There must be some intentional consent or concurrence. Turning a blind eye may support an inference of connivance, but probably there must be some active encouragement or incitement either by words or by conduct, such as the providing of an opportunity for adultery. For example, words which are "only wild words of little import" (Lord Hodson in Godfrey, supra, at p. 534) uttered in distress at finding the wife and co-respondent in a compromising situation may not constitute sufficient evidence of the necessary corrupt intention.

Secondly, the encouragement must, to some degree at least, effectively cause the adultery to take place as a consequential outcome. A casual connection is likely to be most readily inferred where an adulterous relationship thereupon commences but much less likely to be inferred where the relationship merely continues. On principle it is wrong to permit the husband to complain of adultery to which he has in some degree contributed.

If the husband reasonably suspects that an adulterous relationship has already started he is not guilty of connivance simply because he watches for proof. He is not then consenting to the inception of adultery but only seeking proof of its repetition. Acquiescence in continuance, even by the creation of an opportunity, does not constitute a corrupt intention:—

"The question is, which is the greater evil? To allow the adultery to continue undetected and unproved? or to allow the husband to obtain his proof by creating an opportunity for it?" (per Denning, L.J., in Douglas v. Douglas [1951] P. 85, at p. 98 (C.A.)).

Assuming that there was connivance, how can the husband escape from this absolute bar to divorce which, so long as it operates, prevents him from complaining of the wife's adultery? Certainly there is no principle known to the law of "once connivance, always connivance."

First, there must be true repentance and sincere efforts by the husband to repair the damage and restore the marriage. He must have done all in his power to make amends for his regrettable lapse.

Secondly, the act of connivance must have ceased to be an operating or contributory causal factor upon any subsequent adultery on which the petition is founded. This proposition is best illustrated by examples.

(1) The adulterous relationship may have been only continued and not originally promoted by the connivance, when the husband's behaviour might have no lasting effect and quickly be spent.

(2) A full and complete reconciliation may have intervened, i.e., the husband's efforts to repair the marriage were crowned with success, only to be dashed to the ground by renewed adultery by the wife.

(3) A very long lapse of time may have occurred.

(4) There may have been a break in the adulterous relationships, taken up again for the second time in circumstances far removed in time or purpose from the husband's original connivance.

(5) The wife may have formed an adulterous relationship with an entirely different third party.

Nevertheless, as Lord Hodson said (in Godfrey, supra, at p. 535):—

"It is difficult for a petitioner to discharge the burden which lies upon him to prove that he has not connived at the continuance of adultery with the same person after he has encouraged its initiation."

Where, as happened here, the adulterous relationship continues unbroken for the next twelve months, it cannot be said that the effect of the original connivance has worn off and become spent. The effects may endure so that the subsequent adultery cannot be dissociated from the original connivance.

The burden of proof rests upon the petitioner to satisfy the court either that there was no connivance, or, if there was, that it has ceased to play any effective part upon the respondent's adultery.—Alec Samuels in S.J.

WHOM TO SUE

ATTENTION was focused on the strategy to be adopted in cases where a client has the chance of suing either a principal or his agent by Clarkson, Booker, Ltd. v. Andjel [1964] 3 W.L.R. 466. The defendant had bought air tickets from the plaintiffs on credit. He was in fact acting as agent for a travel agency company who were undisclosed principals. Solicitors for the plaintiffs demanded payment from both the defendant and his principals. Subsequently they issued a writ against the travel agency only, but before judgment was obtained the company went into liquidation. So the present proceedings were then started and the defendant alleged that the plaintiffs had irrevocably elected to proceed against his principals which exonerated him. The Court of Appeal held that taking into account all the circumstances no irrevocable election had been made. What seems new is that it is possible to make an election before a final judgment has been obtained against one party or the other. In a similar case, United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays Bank Ltd. [1941] A.C. 1, the plaintiffs sued for money received on a cheque fraudulently indorsed in favour of a company which went into liquidation before they could obtain judgment. They then sued the bank for conversion, and succeeded because there had been no judgment in the first case. Similarly, in Moore v. Flanagan [1920] 1 K.B. 919, a dressmaker, suing both husband and wife for the price of necessaries where the wife was the husband's agent, failed in her action against the husband because she had obtained judgment in default against the wife. The position now must be that while a judgment is clear evidence of an irrevocable election, other actions prior to that can constitute one.—S.J.

HUSBAND AND WIFE

ECHOES from the American courts suggest that matrimonial relations in the United States have a colour and a character all their own. Where else would you find a case to parallel that of Charles Narrow, aged twenty-three, who married Sissy, the sixteen-year-old daughter of the proprietor of a nudist camp, when for her wedding she wore only a veil and a necklace. Barely six months afterwards he obtained a divorce from her on the ground of extreme cruelty, alleging that she was cold. Perhaps it was well for him that it was he who put the law in motion, for in America a husband who has the misfortune to be divorced by his wife is apt to find himself crippled by the awful weight of alimony. Thus, Mr. Edward Eddington, of New York, a retired policeman whose marriage lasted three years has in the last thirty-five years paid more than the equivalent of £17,000 in alimony and has gone to prison twice for falling into arrears. Now he has rallied together more than 500 aggrieved ex-husbands into a society called Alimony Limited, formed to agitate for the reform of the divorce and alimony laws in New York State. Meanwhile the psychiatrists are, as ever, fertile in their suggestions for improving the husband and wife relationship. Recently the psychologist director of the Institute for Rational Living, addressing the New York League of Sexual Freedom, suggested that 'civilized adultery' (or wife-swopping) was psychologically helpful to marriage. Another stimulating theory embodied in a paper published in the Archives of General Psychiatry by three American psychiatrists, who had devoted five years of research to its elaboration, was that among certain types of marital partners, wife beating may hold a marriage together. The wife beater, they say, is a good provider and a faithful husband, averse from divorce. 'The aggressive act satisfies deep unconscious needs of both man and wife'. Lawyers should whole-heartedly welcome the complications which this discovery will introduce into the law relating to cruelty.—S.J.

LETTER OF THE LAW

Case from Paris.

A bank clerk called Clavier had married a very pretty Greek wife called Ritza. One day she went off for a holiday in Athens with her parents, saying she would be back in three weeks. She stayed away five months. In her absence two letters addressed to her arrived, and in the circumstances her husband opened them. They were Greek to him, so he took them to a translator who told him that they were obviously from a man who had had a passionate love affair with his wife. On the strength of his evidence he started divorce proceedings and, when at last the truant Ritza tripped home, he locked her out. She thereupon took legal advice and counter-attacked, launching a prosecution under the post office regulations against her husband for opening and appropriating her mail. With the prosecution she linked a claim for heavy damages. Counsel for the defence contended that it was absurd to give a wife a remedy against her husband for intercepting her lover's letters. But the law was clear and the court was adamant; the post office regulations were sacred and above human passions and the defence of crime passionnel, although it might be recognised in a case of murder, did not cover tampering with the mails. The defendant was fined the equivalent of over £20. At that point the law unbent enough to look at the merits of the case and awarded the lady nominal damages of one franc.—S.J.

PRINCE CHARLES'S NOTEBOOK

THERE has been much indignation about the ethics of publishing school essays written by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. They have been printed in both Der Stern and Paris Match, but in all the furore the important question of copyright appears to have been entirely overlooked. The acquisition of a manuscript does not automatically convey the right of publication. Even if the Prince did pass on his exercise book to a school-fellow, there would have been no assignment of copyright. This remains with the author, and his writings may not be published without his consent. It was transferred as a holograph, a literary curiosity, and at no time would it appear that copyright was transferred. Even the writings of a schoolboy may constitute an original literary work, and the existence of copyright is automatic. For a work to be original within the meaning of the Copyright Act 1956, it is not essential that it be the expression of original or inventive thought. As Peterson, J., pointed out in University of London Press, Ltd. v. University Tutorial Press, Ltd. ([1916] 2 Ch., at p. 608): "Copyright Acts are not concerned with the originality of ideas, but with the expression of thought, and, in the case of 'literary work' with the expression of thought in printing or writing. The originality which is required relates to the expression of thought. But the Act does not require that the expression must be in an original or novel form, but that the work must not be copied from another work—that it should originate from the author". Copyright is created as soon as the work is committed to paper, and persists for the author's lifetime and for fifty years after his death. It is his property to do with as he wishes, and unless copyright is disposed of it remains with him. In the absence of any agreement with the author to this end, whoever made copies of the notebook infringed the author's copyright. Both France and West Germany are signatories to the International Copyright Convention, 1948, whose members agree to extend protection of copyright in their own countries to works protected in the country of origin. Article 4 of the Convention extends protection to unpublished works, but be the copyright position as it may, it is a great pity that a schoolboy's jottings should have been published in any country at all.—S. J.

AFFRAY

It is not necessary that the incidents giving rise to the offence of affray should occur in a public place. The common law conceived the offence as one of a number of offences to uphold public order and to protect the public generally against lawlessness and disorder; so, where two or more people fight in the presence of persons who neither participate in nor encourage the fighting and thereby some of those persons are frightened or put in fear, the offence is complete. It matters not whether few or many persons are present. The few are entitled to the same protection as the many when public order is being violated. In so deciding the Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Parker C.J., Marshall and Widgery JJ.) in Reg. v. Button and Swain (The Times, 24 February) certified that a point of general importance was involved and gave leave to appeal to the House of Lords.—L.T.

REVIEW.

On the lighter side of the law. By K. G. SUBRAMANYAM, Advocate, Coimbatore. MADRAS: Madras Law Journal Office, Post Box 604. Demi 8vo. Pages 100. Price Rs. 2.

THIS interesting brochure collects some articles which have already appeared in a journal and contains anecdotes and scenes from Courts of law. The author tackles some serious problems in the latter portion of the book where, for example, the question of capital punishment is considered in the framework of an imaginary trial. The author's "deep liaison with English Literature," in the words of the learned Judge who has contributed the introduction, has at least resulted in the creation of a lively and witty production which will cause legitimate mirth.

TERMINATION OF TENANCY.*

AN interesting problem is raised in the Journal of the Bombay Law Reporter under the caption "Termination of Tenancy".¹ The learned author has quoted various decisions, of the Revenue Tribunal, of the Bombay High Court and even of the Supreme Court, to point out the conflict of decisions and the prevailing uncertainty in giving a correct answer to the question as to when exactly an agricultural tenancy is terminated, and one is apt to recall the following lines of Cowper:

"And differing judgments serve but to declare,
That truth lies somewhere, if we knew but where."

In *Sri Ram Ram Narain v. State*² challenging the validity of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Amendment) Act (Bom. XIII of 1956), the Supreme Court inter alia observed as follows (pp. 824-825):

"...The title of the landlord to the land passes immediately to the tenant on the tillers' day and there is a completed purchase or sale thereof as between the landlord and the tenant... This title is defeasible only in the event of the tenant failing to appear (under s. 32G) or making a statement that he is not willing to purchase the land or committing default in payment of the price thereof as determined by the Tribunal. The tenant gets a vested interest in the land defeasible only in either of those cases and it cannot, therefore, be said that the title of landlord to the land is suspended for any period definite or indefinite."

A large majority of the tenants having thus been deemed to have purchased the lands held by them on the tillers' day, the question as to when an agricultural tenancy is terminated would not affect such cases, though, unfortunate as it is, numerous applications made by former landlords for restoration of possession on the ground of purported termination under s. 14 on notices given by them to the tenant-purchasers after the tillers' day are entertained and still pending before the Mamlatdars through ignorance of law, resulting in avoidable inconvenience to the tenant-purchasers. The question, however, has its importance limited to cases in which tenants are not deemed to have purchased the lands held by them on the tillers' day, such as those affected by s. 32F or s. 88C or those under notices of termination under s. 31 and/or s. 14 prior to the tillers' day. Since there is quite a good number of tenants falling in this latter category, it would be worthwhile to explore an answer to the question.

Until the Full Bench judgment of the Bombay High Court in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan,³ it has been consistently held that the tenancy of a tenant is terminated on the expiry of the period of the notice, as is evident from the following cases:

(a) In *Valu Kom Krishna Shirke v. Naru Joti Borge*⁴ it was observed that a notice under the old s. 34 (similar to the present s. 31) must commence on April 1 and end with the midnight of March 31 next. The notice of termination of tenancy to be effective should specify the date of such termination which should statutorily be March 31.

(b) In *Shripad Govind Kulkarni v. Subrao Mahadu Pawar*⁵ where the notice of termination was worded "we have terminated your tenancy rights", it was held that it was a demand forthwith and the landlord did not validly terminate the tenancy.

(c) In another case of *Dagdulal Hirachand v. Dattatraya Nana Sonar*⁶ the landlord's application for possession under s. 25 read with s. 34 was decided in his favour on the tenant agreeing to give up possession, but the landlord having sold the land thereafter, the tenant applied under s. 37 for restoration of possession. The High Court held that there was no surrender as, once the tenancy was terminated, no other tenancy survived for being surrendered.

(d) Chagla C. J. observed in *Durlabbhai v. Jhaverbhai*⁷ that the vested right, the right to possession, accrues to the landlord when the notice has run out its natural course and the tenancy has been determined by reason of the expiry of the notice.

(e) In *Jasvantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi*⁸ in which the landlord terminated tenancy on ground of default in payment of rent and applied for possession from two sub-tenants, who were let into possession at the time sub-tenancy was not declared to be invalid, the Full Bench held that, on termination of the tenancy of the tenant, the contractual tenancy between the tenant and the sub-tenants came to an end, but by reason of s. 4 a statutory tenancy had come into existence and, therefore, the sub-tenants could not be evicted by the landlord.

(f) It was observed in *Satyanarayan v. Vithoba*⁹ that by a notice under s. 14 the landlord can only communicate to his tenant his decision to terminate his tenancy after the lapse of three months from the service of the notice, that if the landlord goes beyond it and calls upon the tenant to do something which he is not entitled to ask the tenant to do under the provisions of s. 14, e.g. calls upon the tenant to hand over possession of the land to him upon the expiry of three months from the date of receipt of the notice, then such a notice is invalid, that a notice under s. 14 is only a notice of termination of tenancy and that upon termination of tenancy, a landlord does not become entitled to possession automatically, but has to apply for possession.

(g) In Raojibhai v. Karsanbhai,¹⁰ S. T. Desai J. dissenting from Satyanarayan v. Vithoba observed that the notice under s. 14 stating "your tenancy is terminated" must be read in its proper context along with the words immediately following, namely, "you should hand over possession of our land after three months of the receipt of this notice", and that, therefore, the notice was effectual and sufficient and was valid.

(h) The Full Bench while considering the effect of the amendment made in sub-s. (2) of s. 25 in *Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala*¹¹ distinguished between the right to terminate the tenancy and the right to obtain possession of the land and observed that the former right was not affected by the amendment, that in respect of the latter right, it had not accrued in cases in which the tenancies had not been terminated before the amendment came into force on August 1, 1956, that the amendment did not affect any accrued or vested rights and that it would apply in all cases in which tenancies were terminated on or after August 1, 1956.

(i) While considering four appeals involving the notices for three defaults in *Raja Ram v. Aba Maruti*¹² the Supreme Court quashed the High Court judgments refusing applications for possession on equitable grounds and observed that a statutory right cannot be displaced by operation of equity, though a contractual right may be. It further observed (p. 572):

"...It is not in dispute in these cases that the tenants were in default in paying rents for three years within s. 14(1)(a)(i) and due notices had been served by the landlords terminating the tenancies as required by the proviso to s. 14(1)," and further (p. 573):

"...First, we have to point out that the tenancy having been terminated in terms of the statute, the statute would necessarily create a right in the landlord to obtain possession of the demised premises. The tenancy having been terminated, the tenant is not entitled to remain in possession and the only person who would then be entitled to possession would be the landlord. The statute having provided for the termination of the tenancy would by necessary implication create a right in the landlord to recover possession. The statute recognises this right by providing by s. 29(2) for its enforcement by an application to the Mamlatdar."

After a chain of consistent decisions on the question of termination of tenancy, the judgment in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan apparently came as a bomb-shell. In that case the landlords gave notice to the tenant terminating his tenancy under s. 31 before December 31, 1956, and filed an application for possession under s. 29 read with s. 31 before March 31, 1957. During the pendency of the application the landlords gave another notice to the tenant under s. 14 for non-payment of rent and filed an application for possession under s. 29 read with s. 14 on December 11, 1958. The Aval Karkun ordered restoration of possession, but the District Deputy Collector in appeal set aside the Aval Karkun's order on the ground that the landlords' application was not tenable. The Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal confirmed the order of the District Deputy Collector in revision. The landlords, therefore, filed a writ petition, which was heard by Tarkunde and Chitale JJ., who raised two questions of which only the first being relevant for the present purposes is reproduced below:

"Whether the landlords' application for possession under section 29 read with section 14 was not tenable on the ground that the landlords, having once terminated the tenancy under section 31, were not entitled to terminate the tenancy again on any of the grounds mentioned in section 14."

Tarkunde J., who delivered the judgment for the Division Bench, held in reply to this question (pp. 637-638):

"...The tenant continues to be in lawful possession of the land even after the landlord's notice terminating the tenancy. Section 29(2) read with s. 15 makes it clear that a landlord, after he terminates a tenancy, cannot obtain possession of the land from his tenant, even where the latter is willing to give it, except by an order of the Mamlatdar. It follows from these provisions, and particularly from s. 4, that after the termination of the tenancy by the landlord the tenant is not only in lawful possession of the land but that he continues to be the tenant of the land... During this period the tenant is liable to pay rent as provided by s. 8 and other relevant sections of the Tenancy Act, and not mesne profits calculated on the basis of the income which he derived or ought to have derived from the cultivation of the land.

We are, accordingly, of the view that the statutory tenancy of a tenant does not come to an end merely by the expiry of the period of notice of termination of the tenancy given by the landlord, and that the landlord, having once terminated the tenancy by a notice under s. 31, is not precluded from giving another notice intimating his intention to terminate the tenancy under s. 14 and approaching the tenancy Court for possession on the grounds mentioned in that section."

The Division Bench referred the case to a Full Bench as its decision ran counter to a former judgment of another Division Bench of the Bombay High Court.

In delivering the Full Bench judgment Chainani C. J. agreed with the conclusion reached on this question by the Division Bench, but for different reasons, namely, that a second notice of termination may waive the first notice, or, if it is given without prejudice to the rights created by the first notice, it may furnish to the landlord an alternative ground for obtaining possession, and observed (pp. 641-642) :

"...Under the ordinary law, if a tenant continues in possession after his tenancy has been determined, his possession is protected by law and he cannot be ousted except in due course of law, but he has no right to possession after the termination of tenancy. Under the Tenancy Act, however, even after his tenancy has been determined by a notice given by his landlord, the tenant has a legal right to continue in possession, until the Mamlatdar has made an order for possession being restored to the landlord. During the intervening period, the tenant has an estate in possession, of which he can only be deprived by an order of the Mamlatdar... It seems to us, therefore, that even after the landlord has terminated the tenancy by giving a notice under s. 31, it is open to him to give another notice intimating to the tenant his intention to terminate the tenancy under s. 14 and to approach the Tenancy Court for possession on the grounds mentioned in this s. 14."

Let us now examine the merits of this judgment insofar as it relates to the first question. At the outset it must be clarified that the judgment was not purported to decide the question as to when tenancy is terminated, but whether an application for possession based on a second notice would be tenable. In the referring judgment answer to the latter question in its turn was based upon an answer to the former and, therefore, the Court incidentally considered the former question also. Tarkunde J. in his referring judgment observed that even after the termination of tenancy by the landlord the tenant continues to be the tenant of the land particularly in view of the provisions of s. 4, and that the tenancy comes to an end not on the expiry of the period of the notice of termination, but on the Mamlatdar's order for restoration of possession of the land. This, it is respectfully submitted, is not a correct view. True that on the expiry of the period of notice of termination the landlord cannot automatically take possession of the land from the tenant, but has to make an application to the Mamlatdar under s. 29(2). What is the position of the tenant during the interim period, that is, from the date of expiry of the period of notice till the Mamlatdar's order for restoration of possession? There is no provision in the Tenancy Act to indicate that the tenant whose tenancy is terminated continues as tenant or that he should continue to cultivate the land until he is dispossessed or that he should pay rent or compensation to the landlord at a certain rate or in a certain manner. It may be possible that the tenant whose tenancy is terminated may continue to cultivate the land or may continue to pay rent at the rate applicable to him prior to the determination of his tenancy, but, as observed in L. I. Corp. v. Bombay Municipal Corp.,¹³ practice does not necessarily make law. After the expiry of the period of the notice of termination, the tenant continues to be in possession of the land until ousted by the Mamlatdar on the landlord's application under s. 29(2). The tenant has, therefore, a right to continue in possession in the meantime. But lawful possession cannot be equated with lawful cultivation. Therefore, until ousted, the tenant is certainly lawfully in possession of the land, but would not be lawfully cultivating the land during the period from the date of termination of his tenancy till the date of his dispossession by an order from the Mamlatdar. A person lawfully cultivating land belonging to another person is deemed to be a tenant under s. 4, but the tenant whose tenancy is terminated by the landlord and is lawfully in possession until dispossessed by proceedings under s. 29(2) cannot be deemed to be a tenant within the meaning of s. 4. The Legislature may perhaps consider amendment of the Tenancy Act by providing for payment of compensation on the lines of s. 32H(1B)(b)(ii) and thus regularise the relations between the former landlord and the ex-tenant in possession of the land for the interim period. That, however, is incidental. The net result would, therefore, be that on the reasoning of the Division Bench a second notice of termination and subsequent application for possession under s. 29(2) would not be valid. Probably for this reason, and, with respect, correctly, the Full Bench avoided the reasoning adopted by the Division Bench. The Full Bench held that after the determination of the tenancy by a notice given by the landlord, the tenant has a legal right to continue in possession or has an estate in possession, of which he can be deprived only by an order of the Mamlatdar. An estate connotes limited interest,¹⁴ and possession connotes the opposite of reversion.¹⁵ Further, possession does not necessarily imply use or enjoyment,¹⁶ e.g. a warehouseman has possession of the goods entrusted to him, without having a right to the use or enjoyment of the goods. His Lordship Chainani C. J., therefore, resorted to the provisions of s. 113, Chap. V, of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which are made applicable to agricultural tenancies insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of the Tenancy Act by an express provision made in s. 3 and observed that a second notice of termination of tenancy after termination by the first notice is valid and tenable, as it amounts to waiver of the first notice or, if given without prejudice to the first notice, may provide the landlord with an alternative ground for termination.

Nowhere in the Full Bench judgment in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan it is said that tenancy is not terminated on the expiration of the period of the notice. On the other hand, it clearly recognises the fact of termination by the first notice, but for the reasons stated therein maintains that a second notice of termination is tenable. In fact the statute itself provides that tenancy stands terminated on the expiration of the period of the notice, but the landlord has to apply for possession under s. 29(2) after such termination and the question whether or not to restore possession to the landlord on such application is to be decided by the Mamlatdar. A notice of termination envisages a valid notice, valid both in law and fact. A notice that is not valid will not have the effect of termination of tenancy on the expiration of the period of the notice. There may be a thousand possible circumstances in which a notice may prove to be invalid. The tenant might not have committed any of the defaults stated in s. 14, but the landlord might wilfully assume that the tenant has defaulted, e.g. the landlord might serve upon the tenant a notice of termination on the ground that the tenant failed to cultivate the land personally. "Failed", as observed in Devu Rau v. Jasingrao,¹⁷ implies omission to do something which it was possible for him to do, whereas, in fact, the land might not have been cultivated personally for reasons beyond the control of the tenant. In all such cases, the notice, though conveying the landlord's decision to terminate the tenancy on the expiry of the period of the notice, would not be operative. Further, s. 14 itself provides for an opportunity to the tenant to remedy the breach during the period of the notice. In the event of the breach being remedied during the period of the notice, the notice becomes ineffective. Thus every notice has not got the effect of terminating the tenancy on the expiry of the notice period. Further, as observed by the Full Bench a notice may be waived by service of a second notice. In such a case also the previous notice becomes ineffective. But barring these and similar circumstances a notice of termination validly given, would have the effect of terminating the tenancy on the expiry of the notice period. That the landlord has to put in an application for possession after such notice of termination within the prescribed period of limitation does not and cannot affect the fact of termination. It is only in the event of the application for possession being rejected that, as provided in s. 25(1), the tenant "shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated." By necessary implication this would mean that until the rejection of the landlord's application for possession, the termination of tenancy on a valid notice is effective. This view is further confirmed by the opening words of ss. 24 and 25(1) which read as under :

"24. Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated on the ground that the tenant has done any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land, no proceeding for ejectment against such tenant shall lie unless and until the landlord has served on the tenant a notice in writing specifying the act of destruction or injury complained of and the tenant fails within a period of one year from the service of notice to restore the land to the condition in which it was before such destruction or injury.

25. (1) Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated for non-payment of rent and the landlord files any proceeding to eject the tenant, the Mamlatdar shall call upon the tenant to tender to the landlord the rent in arrears together with the cost of the proceeding, within three months from the date of order, and if the tenant complies with such order, the Mamlatdar shall, in lieu of making an order for ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy had not been terminated and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated."

These two provisions of the Tenancy Act in terms envisage termination of tenancy on landlord's notice and are sufficient to show beyond any shadow of doubt that the Legislature has expressly provided for termination of tenancy on the landlord's notice, but has sought to give relief under s. 24 to the tenant whose tenancy is terminated on the ground that he has done any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land by providing for a notice specifying the act of destruction or injury complained of and giving the tenant one year's time to restore the land to its original condition. As Vyas J. observed in Satyanarayan v. Vithoba, when the landlord seeks to eject a tenant on grounds of destruction or injury to the land, he has to give two separate notices to the tenant: one under s. 14 conveying to the tenant his decision to terminate the tenancy on the ground of an act which was destructive or injurious, and second, upon the termination of the tenancy, under s. 24, specifying the act of destruction or injury giving him one year's time to restore the land to its original condition, failing which he would be ejected from the land. A second notice to the tenant, whose tenancy is terminated, is thus clearly envisaged by the Act and is not a concept foreign to the Act. The fact of the second notice does not in itself vitiate the termination. So also s. 25 seeks to give relief to the tenant (except one who has committed three defaults), whose tenancy is terminated for default in payment of rent, if he tenders to the landlord the rent in arrears and costs within three months from the date of the Mamlatdar's order.

In Commr. E. P. Tax v. Karamchand,¹⁸ Chagla C. J. held (p. 609) that a statute must be so read that all the sections as far as possible are reconciled and fitted into the scheme which the Legislature embodied in the statute. The Full Bench judgment in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan seems to be perfectly in accord with this principle. In discussing the judicial rule 'stare decisis' Blackstone said¹⁹ :

"It is an established rule to abide by former precedents, where the same points come again in litigation; as well as to keep the scale of justice even and steady, and not liable to waver with every new judge's opinion... Yet this rule admits of exception, where the former determination is most evidently contrary to reason."

Even long established decisions can be overruled [Admiralty Commissioners v. Valverda (owner)].²⁰ The Division Bench in this case having taken a different view on the impugned question of law from the view taken by a previous Bench, the case was properly²¹ referred to a Full Bench. But the Full Bench having discarded the reasoning adopted by the Division Bench, notwithstanding the fact that the conclusion reached was the same, it seems that it is the Full Bench decision, and not that of the Division Bench, that creates a precedent²² and has a binding force on all the Courts of concurrent and subordinate jurisdiction. If this be so, the judgment of the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal in Govind Mahadeo v. Daji Babu,²³ it is submitted, is patently incorrect.

Judicial creativeness in the interpretation of statutes is not only inevitable but desirable in a growing legal order. Law is never static, and law includes case law. The Full Bench judgment in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan in such a process of judicial evolution has resulted in an earlier judgment in *Janardhan Damodhar Dindore v. Bupchand Revchand Gujar*²⁴ being overruled. That need not, however, be deplored, for, in his recent address before the Bar Association of Satara District His Lordship the Chief Justice of India observed²⁵:

"Law, like democracy, seeks to synthesize in a harmonious way the conflicting and competing claims of individual liberty and social good. In the process of this harmonious synthesis, there is no room for absolutes. Reason and experience guide law and democracy, and it is on reason and experience that the changing pattern of law is based."

SOLICITORS: NEGLIGENCE

A WELL-KNOWN passage in the judgment of Greer, L.J., in Jarvis v. Moy, Davies, Smith, Vandervell & Co. ([1936] 1 K.B., at p. 405) deals with the distinction between contractual and tortious liability: "Where the breach of duty alleged arises out of a liability independently of the personal obligation undertaken by contract, it is tort, and it may be tort even though there may happen to be a contract between the parties, if the duty in fact arises independently of that contract. Breach of contract occurs where that which is complained of is a breach of duty arising out of the obligations undertaken by the contract". In relation to a solicitor, the duty to use reasonable skill and care arises only out of contractual relationship, so Plowman, J., held in a careful judgment in Clark v. Kirby-Smith ([1964] 2 All E.R. 835), quoting authorities going back to Howell v. Young ((1826) 5 B. & C. 259). It was there contended that the result of the decision of the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne & Co., Ltd. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd. ([1963] 2 All E.R. 575) was to the effect that negligence constitutes a tort whether it arises out of negligence misstatements made by a person who is not under any contractual or fiduciary obligation to give information or advice, or whether it arises out of the contractual relationship of solicitor and client, but Plowman, J., did not accept that argument—at any rate so far as the liability of a solicitor to his client for negligence is concerned. In Bagot v. Stevens Scanlan & Co. ([1964] 3 All E.R. 577) Diplock, L.J., sitting as an additional Judge of the Queen's Bench

S.C. 868, propounding that "as a result of the confirmation or affirmation of the decision of the tribunal by the appellate authority the original decision merges in the appellate decision and it is the appellate decision alone which subsists and is operative and capable of enforcement."

23 (1964) Mh. L.J. 143. In this case the landlord gave a notice to the tenant under s. 14 for non-payment of rent and filed an application for possession before the period of notice expired. The Aval Karkun decided the application in favour of the landlord, but the District Deputy Collector, in appeal, holding that the application was bad, set aside the Aval Karkun's order. Relying on the judgment of Tarkunde J. in 64 Bom. L.R. 636, the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal held in revision that tenancy would not be terminated on the expiry of the notice, or on the filing of the application, but when the Revenue Authority made an order for restoration of possession and that the application for possession was not premature. It accordingly set aside the order of the District Deputy Collector and restored that of the Aval Karkun.

Division, applied the principles stated in the Clark case to the relationship between architect and client, thus approving obiter the view taken by Plowman, J., in respect of a solicitor's liability to his client. It may be of interest to note that Scottish and English law appear to differ on this point. In Robertson v. Bannigan 1964 S.L.T. 318, an action for damages for professional negligence against a solicitor, the Lord Ordinary, Lord Hunter, confessed himself "unable to accept the proposition that a client does not have a remedy in delict against a negligent solicitor in addition to such remedy as may be available to him in contract", and held that the pursuer was entitled to sue an action for damages for delict.—L.J.

Hawkins and Ryder on the Construction of Wills. By E. C. RYDER, M.A., LL.B., Barrister-at-Law. BOMBAY 2: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. LONDON: Sweet & Maxwell. Roy 8vo. Pages 418. Price Rs. 56.

THIS book is based on Francis Vaughan Hawkin's once famous Concise Treatise on the Construction of Wills which first appeared in 1863. The passing of the Law of Property Act, 1925, rendered a certain amount of matter dealt with by Hawkins obsolete and problems of construction arose as a result of this and other statutes. The present author had, therefore, to rewrite the text completely "with a view to making it a homogeneous work on modern lines". He has however retained certain passages from the original text which have received judicial approval and without impairing the conciseness of the treatment has exhaustively dealt with all the relevant construction cases. The author while acknowledging his indebtedness to Jarman on Wills has rightly claimed that he has paid particular attention to points which are not touched on or dealt with summarily in that book. Much new material has been added consequent on the passing of the aforesaid Act of 1925 and the Administration of Estates Acts of 1926 and 1959 and the legislation on adoption since 1926. The book will be invaluable to the Indian lawyer as an up to date and definitive statement of the general principles governing the construction of wills.

THIS cumulative supplement to the third edition of Stroud's Judicial Dictionary which was published in 1953 is brought down to May 1, 1964. Apart from words and phrases already in use, phrases like "abnormality of mind" and "automatism" which have recently come in vogue and judicially interpreted are included here. This is a welcome supplement to a work which has guided the Courts in the English speaking world for over six decades.

THIS is one more useful addition to the publisher's Nutshell Series. The present brochure is a collection of leading criminal cases decided by the English Courts and is mainly designed for law students. Each case is prefaced by a short explanatory note on the law point involved in it and this is followed by a short statement of the facts of the case and the relevant extract from the judgment in which the law point is dealt with. Of particular interest to the Indian criminal lawyer are the reference to the M'Naghten Rules made in recent decisions and automatism as a defence of a charge of crime considered by the House of Lords in Bratty v. Attorney-General for Northern Ireland [1963] A.C. 386.

SITABATI DEBI v. STATE OF WEST BENGAL.*

(An unreported judgment)

It may appear late in the day to call attention to a judgment of the Supreme Court delivered in December, 1961, but the continued citation in our Courts of the observations of Subba Rao J. in *Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochunni v. State of Madras*¹ that shows that *Sitabati's case*³ has not become generally known to the profession. This is not surprising, for the judgment is not reported, and by a curious coincidence prints of that judgment were not received by Law Libraries which normally receive such prints. But for the reference to the print of Sitabati's case in *Sachindra Mohan v. State of W. B.*⁴ the decision might have escaped attention altogether.

Bhanji Munji's case decided that art. 31 of the Constitution and art. 19(1)(f) and (5) were mutually exclusive and that when property was requisitioned or acquired, the law fell under art. 31, and art. 19(1)(f) and (5) had no application. The decision was given on art. 31 before its amendment. After sub-art. (2A) was added to art. 31 it was clear that there were some kinds of deprivation of property which were not to be treated as acquisition or requisition. It would follow, therefore, that as regards such deprivation of property, art. 19(1)(f) would apply. The impact of art. 31(2A) was averted to, but was not considered, in *Bombay Dyeing & Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. The State of Bombay*⁵ as the impugned law was enacted before the amendment. But on the assumption that money could not be acquired, the Court held a part of the law void under art. 19(1)(f) and (5). Kochunni's case did not deal with acquisition or requisition of property. It dealt with an unusual law, ostensibly for the purpose of removing doubts and purporting to amend the Madras Marumakkatayam Act, 1932, but in substance reversing a decree of the Privy Council and having the effect of giving to the respondents in that appeal rights in property which the Privy Council had held to be the exclusive property of the appellant. It was, therefore, unnecessary to make the wide pronouncement that the decision in Bhanji Munji's case no longer held the field. However, in Sitabati's case the validity of the West Bengal Land (Requisition and Acquisition) Act, 1948, was questioned on the ground, inter alia, that after Kochunni's case, Bhanji Munji's case no longer held the field and consequently the impugned law must satisfy the test of art. 19(1)(f) and (5). In rejecting this contention Sarkar J., delivering the unanimous judgment of the Constitution Bench, observed that before the amendment of art. 31 the Supreme Court had held by a majority that both cls. (1) and (2) of art. 31 dealt with a law giving power to the State to acquire or requisition property. He added:

"Kavalappara Kochunni's Case held that after the amendment cl. (2) of Art. 31 alone dealt with acquisition and requisition of property by the State and cl. (1) dealt with deprivation of property in other ways. This case did not deal with a law of acquisition or requisition of property by the State but was concerned with a law by which deprivation of property was brought about in other ways, which law, it held, had to satisfy Art. 19 and the principle in Bhanji Munji's Case which could have saved that law before the amendment could not save it after the amendment. The observation in Kavalappara Kochunni's Case that Bhanji Munji's Case 'no longer holds the field' has, therefore, to be understood as meaning that it no longer governs a case of deprivation of property by means other than requisition and acquisition by the State. Kavalappara Kochunni's Case was not concerned with a law of requisition or acquisition of property governed by Art. 31(2), as it now stands, and did not decide that question". (Italics mine).

It will be seen that Sitabati's case is of far reaching importance since it "explained" the observations of Subba Rao J. which, but for such explanation, might have been treated by the High Courts as binding on them. Sitabati's case shows that Bhanji Munji's case holds the field as regards any law which provides for acquisition or requisition of property within the meaning of art. 31 of the Constitution.

ETHICS OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.*

CAPITAL punishment is a matter of regularly recurring debate and discussion as it concerns one of the vital issues of social awareness. In 1948 the British Labour Ministry got passed the abolition of capital sentence in the Criminal Justice Act by the House of Commons, but the Lords voted the measure out. Thereafter a massive Report of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment was published in 1953. It was followed by a private member's Bill sponsored by Mr. Silverman in 1956 seeking to scrap the death penalty. Once again the House of Lords vetoed it. Next year the Homicide Act, 1957, was passed confining capital punishment to six types of murders viz., (1) murder done in course of furtherance of theft, (2) murder by shooting or explosives, (3) murder for preventing lawful arrest or effecting escape from lawful custody, (4) murder of a police officer acting in course of his duty or of a person assisting a police officer, (5) murder by a prisoner of a prison officer or a person assisting a prison officer, and (6) murder by a person who was convicted of another murder before.

For all these offences death is the sole penalty and there is no room for a lesser punishment. In effect this Act curtailed the scope of murder but enlarged that of manslaughter. Once again the new Labour Ministry is attempting to abolish the extreme penalty. In India too voices are periodically raised for and against the ultimate punishment. Recently the question has been brought into a sharp focus by way of reflex action to the uproar of the abolitionists in England. The circulation of a questionnaire on capital punishment by the Law Commission, India, has also stimulated a thoughtful interest in the controversy.

I came across a few articles advocating the abolition of the extreme penalty such as:—(1) Capital punishment abolition move in India (A.I.R. 1956 Journal p. 69); (2) Capital punishment, (1962) (2) Cr. L.J. Journal, p. 1) and (3) The Legal and Sociological aspect of Death Penalty (66 Bom. L.R. Journal, p. 153). The arguments in these articles and elsewhere in support of abolition may be grouped under three heads (A) Legal; (B) Sociological; and (C) Ethical.

(A). Legal arguments for abolition.

The foremost legal objection to capital punishment seems to be that there is a high degree of probability of miscarriage of justice. In a majority of 6 See the printed judgment.

*By H. S. Ursekar, M.A., LL.B., Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

cases only the probable guilt is proved legally, which may be far from moral certainty. Accused arraigned for murder are sometimes condemned to capital punishment on the basis of a confession alone. However, the probability of a confession which may neither be true nor voluntary cannot be ruled out. Besides, an accused may be victimized as a result of mistaken identity, even on the testimony of an otherwise truthful witness. Sometimes witnesses may fail not only in their observation, but also in their memory. Lies may be told to wreak a vengeance on a criminal by persons acting in concert. Further the principle of vicarious liability of the members of an unlawful assembly given effect to by s. 149 of the Indian Penal Code may lead to injustice.

Now, this formidable array of arguments against capital punishment do appear prima facie attractive, but whatever is attractive may not be sound. Sometimes it is the other way about.

Generally speaking these legal objections pose a challenge to the vires of our criminal jurisprudence. The Indian criminal jurisprudence is rooted firmly in the British jurisprudence. The theory underlying the Indian Evidence Act is the theory of probability.

The definition of the word 'evidence' as given in s. 3 of the Indian Evidence Act is as follows:—

"Evidence means and includes—

(1) all statements which the Court permits or requires to be made before it by witnesses, in relation to matters of fact under inquiry; such statements are called oral evidence;

(2) all documents produced for the inspection of the Court; such documents are called documentary evidence".

It is an inclusive definition and not an exhaustive one. That is why it is considered to be incomplete as it does not include the whole material on which the decision of the Judge may rest. Evidence means not only the oral and documentary evidence but it also includes other matters before the Court, like the weapon of offence, blood-stained clothes of the deceased etc., known as the material or real evidence. Other matters before the Court also include notes of inspection of the scene of offence, demeanour of the witnesses etc., apart from the matters of which a Court can take judicial notice. This position is deduced from the definition of the word 'proved' as set out in s. 3 of the Indian Evidence Act.

"A fact is said to be proved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes it to exist, or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists."

The test is of probabilities upon which a prudent man may base his opinion.¹ In other words it is the estimate which the prudent man makes of the probabilities, having regard to what must be his duty as a result of his estimate.²

"The true question, in trials of fact, is not whether it is possible that the testimony may be false, but whether there is sufficient probability of its truth; that is, whether the facts are shown by competent and satisfactory evidence".

Thus the definition of the word "proved" in the Indian Evidence Act may be said to sum up the pith and substance of our criminal jurisprudence as it (1) enlarges the area of evidence, (2) legalizes the concept of probability, (3) furnishes the norm of a prudent man for the Judge in assessing and acting upon the evidence before him, and (4) makes way for the principle of benefit of reasonable doubt. If we were to accede to this legal objection it may be seen that, we will have either to revise our fundamentals of criminal jurisprudence or to face not-too-convenient a position of having a double set of standards of proof for capital trials and non-capital trials. The latter alternative cannot be considered feasible as the definition of the word "proved" does not admit of any such double dealing. Further, such step would undermine uniformity of ultimate standards which is looked upon as an asset for any legal system. If, on the other hand, we are to think of reorientation of our criminal jurisprudence it will have to be on realistic and rational lines and not on idealistic lines. We will have to consider, that if even under the present liberal legal system equipped with such effective safeguards like the presumption of innocence of the accused and the consequential saddling of the prosecution with the burden of proof of the guilt of the accused, the proof beyond reasonable doubt, the benefit of doubt, we are still apprehensive of the possibility of a miscarriage of justice, this lack of confidence cannot be restored by any amount of further liberalisation of the rules of evidence or the enlargement of the safeguards.

2 Government of Bombay v. Samuel, (1946)

Despite the existing defensive safeguards the percentage of the guilty being acquitted in contested cases may be regarded as a rather high one by the State, and hence any further enlargement of these safeguards would perhaps jeopardise the enforcement of law and order which is the primary duty of a State. It is submitted that the present system is equal to the task of assuring a normal delivery of justice and preventing its miscarriage. As to the objection to the capital punishment on the ground of the working of the principle of vicarious liability as provided for in s. 149 of the Indian Penal Code, by and large, whenever evidence is found to fall short of establishing with certainty as to who had dealt the fatal blow, the lesser punishment is invariably imposed by the Courts on the guilty member of the unlawful assembly.

As to wrong conviction founded on an involuntary confession, sufficient safeguards are already provided in order to test whether a confession is true and voluntary. The dangers of mistaken identity and of false testimony due to personal vendetta are largely eliminated by the system of cross-examination of witnesses. Cross-examination often works as an Ithuriel's spear and exposes the tinsel of untruth and reveals the gold of truth. In the majority of cases it hits the heel of Achilles in the testimony of the witness.

Thus the legal objections to the capital punishment are of little consequence if we have an abiding faith in the rule of law and the machinery provided for enforcing it.

(B). Sociological arguments for abolition.

The main grievance of the abolitionists from the sociological point of view is that many civilised countries in Europe have abolished the death penalty as follows:—

1. Finland: last execution 1826 (except Revolution 1918).
2. Holland: last execution 1860 (abolished 1870).
3. Belgium: last execution 1863 (except war period).
4. Denmark: last execution 1892 (abolished 1930).
5. Iceland, 1944.
6. Italy, 1948.
7. West Germany, 1949.
8. Austria, 1950.

Besides some of the States of the U.S.A. have also eliminated capital punishment. It is, therefore, proper for India to fall in line with these advanced countries, and to scrap the death penalty.

It is contended by the abolitionists that man is a rational being and that the ultimate penalty is irrational. This is one of the most vulnerable arguments advanced by the abolitionists. The irrationality of the death penalty, according to them springs from its inhumanity. This argument is based more on sentiment than on reason. There is no room for sentimentality in rationalism. Now, only because some European countries and American States have thought it fit in their own circumstances to abolish the capital punishment and because England is on her way to scrap capital punishment it would be irrational to argue that India should also follow suit blindly. Rationalism is rooted in the faith on one's own conviction. Hence, rationalism rules out arguments by analogy or precedent. Rationalism means to think right and to do right in response to one's own power of independent judgment. Shankaracharya, one of the most remarkable rationalists of India, said that he would not accept that fire is cold, despite a hundred texts of the Vedas. Imitation is an arch enemy of rationalism. Independence of judgment is the life breath of rationalism. Therefore, we will have to see whether the conditions obtaining in India at present justify such a step. It is submitted that Indian conditions do not justify such a step where illiteracy, ignorance and poverty mould the passions of men.

One of the arguments of the sociological thinkers is that the present mode of execution by rope is painful. The question of the mode of execution is one of detail which can be settled once we agree upon the retention of capital punishment.

It is urged that capital punishment is based on an unwholesome spirit of retribution which has no place in modern civilised society. It is true that lex talionis or the principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is an anachronism in a modern State. If capital punishment were to be meted out to every murderer indiscriminately without regard to the mens rea or the circumstances under which the murder is committed, this argument would have held some water. But it is well-known that Courts do not impose the death sentence in every case of conviction for murder. This fact alone would show that the death penalty is not a matter of retribution.

All homicides are not culpable. Some homicides are justifiable and are permissible and they are saved by the General Exceptions to the Indian Penal Code. (ss. 76 to 106). Death caused by accident is not punishable. Death caused by a person of unsound mind is also not punishable. Take the case of four surgeons A, B, C and D, who cause death under different circumstances and meet with different consequences. Surgeon A, while operating in good faith, with the patient's consent, to save the life of the patient causes his death as a result of the patient's failure to stand the operation, but not intending to cause his death. Here surgeon A commits no offence. He is exonerated under s. 88 of the Indian Penal Code as he has no intention to cause death. Surgeon B, on the other hand, who causes death of a patient by professional negligence in performance of the operation, say, by leaving the scissors inside the patient, will be liable for punishment under s. 304A, Indian Penal Code, which carries the maximum imprisonment of two years. Surgeon C causes death with intention or knowledge to cause death but while he is deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, would be guilty under s. 304, Indian Penal Code of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and may be awarded 5 to 10 years of imprisonment. Surgeon D, who intentionally causes the death of a person, say of his professional rival, will be guilty of murder under s. 302, Indian Penal Code, and would be liable to the death sentence or imprisonment for life-term. Thus, in the cases of surgeons B, C and D the homicides were culpable, but in the case of surgeon A it was innocuous. It will be seen that homicides are both permissible and prohibited. The graded consequences of a homicide as illustrated above nullify the argument that capital punishment is a product of an unseemly spirit of retribution. It is far from it. It is not in the case of every murder that the extreme penalty is imposed by the Courts. Capital punishment on the other hand is imposed only after anxious thought and exercise of judicial discretion; otherwise every case of murder would have brought in its wake a death sentence invariably. It is clear, therefore, that it is not blind retribution, but judicial discretion is exercised by the Courts in imposing the utmost penalty. Hence capital punishment cannot be condemned as legalised vengeance.

It is felt that capital punishment has failed to protect society and hence is infructuous as murders have not disappeared. If this argument were to be taken seriously the whole body of penal laws would have to be scrapped. In spite of stringent punishments prescribed, robberies and rapes, assaults and abductions, misappropriations and murders are commonplace crime news. Doctors do not prevent diseases, they cure them. Despite the medical profession which is as old as the Aswinikumars, diseases are not obsolete. Crime and disease form a perennial part of the processes of life. Law can only curb crime and protect society from chaos. Law has never and will never root out crime so long as human nature remains what it is.

According to the sociologists the deterrent object of capital punishment is much magnified and that to a criminal, death penalty does not act as a deterrent. In other words death has no fear for the death dealer. It is argued that 80 per cent. of murders are committed in a fit of frenzy or upon sudden quarrel or on grave and sudden provocation and hence capital punishment has no fear for the majority of the murderers. Now, in the first place, this percentage is a guess work. Secondly, even in such cases death penalty has a deterrent effect because every miscreant knows the capital consequences of his extreme act of violence. It does deter him and others.

It is pointed out that murders have not increased in the countries which have abolished capital punishment, nor have they decreased in countries which stick to the gallows. Now it is conveniently ignored here that some countries have restored capital punishment after experiencing the unsocial results of abolition thereof. The latter contention is already answered, while as to the former it may be noted that many arguments of the sociological school are bolstered up by statistics, as for example, as to the ratio of premeditated to the provoked murders, of the shooting up or down of the murder rate as a result of abolition or retention of capital punishment. The utility of statistics in social sciences cannot be denied. But the accuracy of conclusions based on figures in a social science qua a physical science is a matter not free from debate. In physical sciences the hypothesis is that of uniform behaviour of natural phenomenon under a given set of circumstances. This cannot be said with the same degree of certainty regarding social-science-surveys as they are dealing with a material which is as vagarious and volatile as man. The theory of statistical data is grounded in the concept of probability, working through the law of averages. It is also based on the concept of frequency of recurrence of events. Our degree of belief is based on an estimate of situations founded on past experiences collected together. Besides, statistical data is likely to be vitiated by random selection of samples. The possible bias of the investigators in collecting the data on the one side is also a factor to be reckoned with. It is said that statistics have a knack, like a lady's skirt, to expose the extremes and to conceal the essential. Hence too implicit a reliance on statistics in social sciences like law may not be safe and may lead to misleading conclusions. That is perhaps the reason why the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment appointed in England, after considering the statistical data, concluded to the following effect:

"There is no clear evidence to prove that the abolition of capital punishment has led to an increase in the homicidal rate or that its re-introduction has led to a fall."

The abolitionists strenuously canvass that India is a Welfare State which has recognized the principle of probation of offenders long ago. Most of the criminals are illiterate people of indifferent understanding and hence they deserve rather to be cared for and cured than condemned. A murderer is a social misfit. A delinquent is like a diseased limb of society and hence society should not amputate it but should cure it and shape it into a limb useful to society. This argument is apparently unanswerable, but really fallacious. It is well-known that some diseases are incurable and amputation is the specific remedy. Take a case which happened some years ago in the Bombay State. Two brothers found six persons, men and women from a scheduled tribe, picking grain from their standing crops. They caught and tied the thieves to trees and hacked them to pieces. One of the brothers lodged a false complaint with the police that he had come across six persons murdered in his field. Ultimately these barbarous brothers were tried for murder and hanged. Can it be maintained in the face of these facts that these two brothers could have been cured and redeemed, in the spirit of picking up blossoms from the dust? It would have been a case of misplaced mercy.

(C) Ethical arguments for abolition

The moralists take exception to capital punishment on the ground that it militates against human conscience. It is urged that life is sacred as it can be created by the Supreme Creator alone. Hence man has no right to take away something which he cannot create. Man i.e. the State has thus no right to take away human life. Now there are a number of things in nature which man cannot create and yet he destroys them. Further, in theory, the life of a citizen belongs to the State. That is why man has no right to put an end even to his own life. Attempt to commit suicide is made an offence on this principle. The State has a paramount right over the lives of its citizens and the land within its territory. Population and territory are, therefore, regarded as essentials of a State along with Sovereignty. How the State can be denied the right to take away something which belongs to it? In fact right to destroy a thing is the sine qua non of the right of ownership. Hence it is not correct to argue that the State has no right to take away human life by virtue of the rule of law. Thus in the face of the sovereignty of the State the conscientious objection to the death penalty loses much of its force.

Another argument is that the death penalty is irrevocable and a decision discovered to be wrong after the execution of the highest sentence cannot be rectified as the convict is then beyond the power of man. The flame of life once put out cannot be rekindled. With a number of judicial appeals and executive memorials cases of hanging of innocents are extremely rare in modern times. Secondly, on the question of restoration of the damage done by the execution of death sentence, it may be asked as to how the man who has suffered imprisonment can be restored to his own sense of self-respect, even if he is found to be innocent later on. His reputation and liberty are lost irretrievably; what compensations can wipe out his mental torture?

The ethical idealists contend that death penalty is a source of sin for the Judge and the State. It is the duty of the King i.e. the State to protect the subjects. No sin can attach to the Judge or the State for performing their duty. In fact they will incur sin if they fail to do their duty. Punishment is deemed to be a sort of expiation of sin. Manu says men who are guilty of crime and have been punished by the King go to heaven.⁴

It is further contended that the moral law requires that sin should be destroyed and not the sinner. Now murder is one of the Mahapatakas as regarded by the Hindu Dharma Shashtra. In case of a murder the sin and the sinner are inseparable like the body and its shadow, and hence the former cannot be destroyed without destroying the latter.

Capital punishment is condemned as the State murder or judicial killing. Now an individual has a right to voluntarily cause death in exercise of his right of private defence (ss. 96 to 106, Indian Penal Code). Section 100 of the Code prescribes that in case of apprehension of assault with the intention of committing murder, rape, kidnapping, abduction or wrongful confinement etc., a person can voluntarily cause death of the miscreant and yet the man is not guilty of any offence, much less of murder as the death of the wrong-doer is caused in the exercise of the right of private defence (s. 96, Indian Penal Code). Under s. 103 of the Penal Code the right of a person to voluntarily cause death of the wrong-doer is prescribed and it extends to cases of robbery, house-breaking by night etc. Now if a citizen can voluntarily cause death with impunity in defence of life, liberty or property, not only that of his own but that of any other person, what justifiable objection can there be for the State to exercise the right to voluntarily cause death of the wrong-doer in defence of life, liberty and property of its subjects. Hence it is not open to the abolitionists to urge the scrapping of the capital punishment unless they succeed first in scrapping the right of private defence. Therefore, it is illogical to deny the right to voluntarily cause death with justification to the State which is a sovereign body, when that right is available to the citizen of the State.

It is pointed out that to err is human and to forgive is divine, and hence a murderer must not be hanged. Now even if he is sentenced to a life-term we do not forgive him but we are punishing him, though by a lesser degree of punishment. Forgiveness means freedom from punishment, it does not admit of any degree of punishment, it means absence of punishment. The only form of punishment based on the spirit of forgiveness is by binding over the accused. I do not think that even the abolitionists would go to the extent of approving of a probationary treatment to a murderer.

It is even urged that the principle of non-violence is the main feature of the moral and spiritual values of India. But the death sentence passed by the Court is in the discharge of the duty of the Judge. Duty is the most sanctified thing in the world. Wordsworth says that duty is the stern daughter of the voice of God.

There cannot, therefore, be any valid ethical objection to capital punishment. Thus, on a consideration of the legal, sociological and ethical arguments advanced by the abolitionists it will be seen that they are based more on sentiment and less on reason. They are more ideal than real, more psychological than logical and carry more heat than light.

The State is a sovereign body. The State has now taken the place of the ancient King. The Creator created the King for the protection of the world and it is the duty of a king to protect the subjects⁵. He is to punish the wrong-doer. Danda or punishment is one of the seven elements of sovereignty. It is out of the fear of punishment that people dare not swerve from their duty. Mahabharata says that people do not commit wrongs due to fear of punishment from the king⁶.

Kautilya and Manu say that if the King does not impose punishment it gives rise to a condition of anarchy viz., might is right.⁷ [Matsyanyaya] Kautilya warns that a King who metes out soft punishment is insulted by his people.⁸ Manu, Kautilya, Yajnyavalkya, Vishnu, Vriddha-Harita and other ancient law-givers prescribe the death punishment. It will be, therefore, seen that having regard to the present conditions of India as well as the fundamentals of the capital punishment it should not be done away with, for even in a Social Welfare State the police function of the State is indispensable, till we reach the ideal stage of the withering away of the State.

POWERS OF THE MANAGER: AN UNEXPECTED DICTUM IN THE SUPREME COURT.*

OBITER DICTA in the ordinary way are worth as much as the personal reputations of the Judges who utter them. But the obiter dicta of the Supreme Court are in another category. Inferior Courts are bound to treat them with the greatest respect, and indeed it has been held that they are actually bound by them.¹ An obiter dictum of J. R. Mudholkar, J. in Balmukand v. Kamla Wati,² an appeal from the High Court of the Punjab, will cause many eyebrows to be raised, when, as is inevitable, sooner or later an enterprising advocate uses the case as support. Otherwise, perhaps, this rather silly little case would never have been heard of. It was precisely because of this dictum that the editor of the Supreme Court Journal thought it worthwhile to print a report, and no doubt he was quite right, provided that a caveat is first entered from some other quarter.

The plaintiff had in stages bought what amounted to 17/20ths of a particular plot of land, and he wanted the remaining 3/20ths. This was owned by a joint Hindu family apparently governed by Hindu law, and so by Mitakshara law.³ The family consisted for practical purposes of several brothers, one of them being the manager. The plaintiff made an agreement with the manager, and paid a sum as earnest money, that he should buy that plot at an advantageous figure, an appreciable amount above the then market price of the land, evidently because of the convenience which such a purchase would afford him. But the manager did not execute the sale deed, either because he was rebuked by his brothers for what he had done, or because the value of the land was changing or because there had been a genuine misunderstanding—it remains unclear. The plaintiff instituted a suit for specific performance of the contract. All the coparceners objected. He failed, and his failure was confirmed ultimately in the Supreme Court.

The reasoning which constitutes the ratio is entirely acceptable and calls for no comment.^{3a} A manager has no power to sell joint family property, even at a good price unless certain conditions are fulfilled. In the absence of necessity, there must be positive benefit to the family or its estate: in other words some distinct inconvenience must be obviated, some loss averted, or some additional advantage obtained. Land in particular cannot be sold when there is no intention specifically to invest in other land or, if possible, in equally secure and more profitable sources of income. Though the manager has the freedom to act as a prudent owner, he cannot bind the family unless a distinct and certain advantage is thereby obtained. The cases cited in the Supreme Court judgment (K. Subba Rao and Mudholkar, JJ.)⁴ and others which could be called upon to illustrate the position,⁵ make it abundantly clear that though the manager is not confined to defensive acts, he cannot sell land belonging to the family merely because he can obtain a good price. In this family there was plenty of money, there was no necessity, there was no proposal to invest in a better security, and there was no detriment to the family by reason of its remaining in ownership of the land in question. The act of the manager was bad, and the plaintiff was reduced to a personal remedy against his alienor, who had acted without authority of law.

One of the cases discussed was that of Sital Prasad Singh v. Ajab Lal Mander,⁶ in which the learned Chief Justice approaches the rare but possible case where an irregular alienation may be authorised by the concurrence of the coparceners (there being, of course, no minor coparcener nor one in the womb at the time).^{6a} At pp. 9-10 of our present judgment his Lordship, Mudholkar, J., says:

"...Apart from that the adult members of the family are well within their rights in saying that no part of the family property could be parted with or agreed to be parted with by the manager on the ground of alleged benefit to the family without consulting them. Here...there is no allegation of any such consultation."

3 There is no trace in the judgment of any contention that the parties were governed by customary law.

6a In which case, of course, the alienation is not that of the manager but that of the coparcenary body itself.

This would appear to make it the law that even in cases where the manager sees that benefit would accrue to the family from the sale of family property (whatever its nature) the manager must consult the coparceners and obtain their agreement before his transaction, however much in accordance with the powers allowed to him by the Mitakshara law, will bind them and he can give a good title to strangers. This is not the Hindu law, and, so far as this writer knows, never has been the Hindu law during the British period and after, except in the State of Mysore:⁷ and it is not beyond doubt whether it is still the law in Mysore or any part of that State.

The whole point of having a manager is that his co-owners shall not be bothered with details of policy or business. If they are dissatisfied with his management they can separate from him; if they distrust him they must do this, or hold out to strangers that notwithstanding their distrust they will stand by his actions, provided, of course, that the latter are within the Hindu law. It is up to the manager to use his discretion properly, and, when he has done so, to act upon it, or he is no manager. If what is suggested in this obiter dictum is correct we should have introduced into Mitakshara law the dreadful mixture of insecurity and intrigue which has been eating up the Malabar joint family these many years. In Kerala the karnavan or manager is often deposed, and he could be reappointed subject to what is called a *karar*⁸ whereby his powers are delimited and defined. If he oversteps these—and a good example of such a restriction would be a power to alienate only with the prior consent of a two-thirds majority of his co-owners—the alienation may be upset, no matter how good the excuse for the act or how pressing the need. Alienees have to obtain information of the terms of the karars if they want to be safe in dealing with the karnavan, and they cannot deal with anyone else, unless the karnavan is deposed and another appointed. The present writer doubts whether anyone in Maharashtra would like to convert his family law into a Malabar-type system. On the contrary Maharashtrians will probably be reassured to be told that, notwithstanding this dictum, the power of manager to act, in proper cases, without consulting anyone survives in full vigour. The dictum was, it is submitted, not merely obiter but also per incuriam.⁹

GLEANNINGS.

THE DUTY OF CARE RE-EXAMINED

WHEN Lord Atkin propounded his famous "neighbour principle" in Donoghue v. Stevenson ([1932] All E.R. Rep., at p. 11), he was attempting to define the general criterion or test for determining whether or not a duty of care exists in a given fact situation. The attempt had been made earlier by Lord Esher, M. R., in Heaven v. Pender ((1883) 11 Q. B. D., at p. 509), and again in Le Lievre v. Gould ([1893] 1 Q.B., at p. 497). Indeed as Mr. Fifoot points out (History and Sources of the Common Law, pp. 164-165) Lord Ellenborough, C.J., referred to the existence of a duty of care as early as the beginning of the 19th century (Glovett v. Radnidge, (1802) 3 East at p. 69).

Lord Atkin's attempt was successful in that it quickly gained general acceptance, unlike those of his predecessors. It is now indisputable that the law imposes on each individual a general duty to avoid causing harm or injury to others through careless conduct. In Donoghue v. Stevenson a stone was cast on to the waters of the law, perhaps without realising the circles to which its outer ripples might reach. Undoubtedly there has been a continual extension of the ambit of the general duty of care, albeit that duty is not unlimited in scope. One of the most interesting post-War developments in the law of tort has been the way in which the principle of liability for negligence has been gradually extended. True it is that "there is still some uncertainty as to how far the neighbour principle does extend" (see Salmond on Torts (13th edn.), at p. 410), but the last few years have been a period of vigorous judicial development in this field.

⁷ Derrett, Introduction to Modern Hindu Law, § 442.

⁹ Derrett, § 12.

The most recent case is Haley v. London Electricity Board ([1964] 3 All E.R. 185) where the House of Lords considered whether one has to adapt one's conduct so as to guard against dangers to the blind in general circumstances. The Court of Appeal (Lord Denning, M.R., Donovan and Danckwerts, L.J.J.) held that there was no such duty ([1963] 3 All E.R. 1003), and the kernel of the decision was summed up by Lord Denning, M.R., in these words:

The defendants do not have to cater for the man who walks with his head in the air and does not look where he is going. He is such an exceptional person that they need not provide for him. If he runs into (an obstacle) it cannot be helped. It is not their fault. Likewise, I am afraid I must say, the defendants do not have to provide for the blind, at any rate in places where they have no particular reason to expect blind persons to be. It would be too great a tax on the ordinary business of life if special precautions had to be taken to protect the blind".

The proceedings arose out of an accident which occurred in 1956. The appellant, a registered blind person, was accustomed to walk from his home in Woolwich, using his white stick, to an omnibus stop where he caught an omnibus to take him to work. The respondents had dug a trench some 60 feet long lengthwise along the pavement. To guard the trench the workmen had put a punner-hammer (a long-handled instrument used to ram down earth) across the pavement, with its handle resting on some railings. The other end of the trench was protected by a similar arrangement with a pick and shovel, the purpose of both obstacles being to prevent pedestrians from falling into the trench. There were sign-boards at each end of the trench stating that there were road works ahead. The appellant was using reasonable care, but his stick failed to detect the arrangement, and he tripped over the handle of the punner-hammer and fell, becoming completely deaf as a result of the fall.

The House of Lords (Lord Reid, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Evershed, Lord Hodson and Lord Guest) reversing the Court of Appeal held unanimously that the appellant was entitled to succeed in his action for negligence. Lord Reid was of opinion that Mr. Haley was entitled to succeed at common law. Indeed, he said, the respondents' precautions were only "just sufficient to attract the attention of ordinary people with good sight exercising ordinary care". The respondents contended that in carrying out works on the city pavement they were not bound to have in mind the needs of blind or infirm pedestrians, and they relied on Pritchard v. Post Office ((1950) 114 J.P. 370). There, Post Office workmen had surrounded a trench with a light fence, and a blind person had stumbled through the fence and was injured. The case was distinguishable because the sole cause of that accident was the plaintiff's contributory negligence, although both the county court Judge and the Court of Appeal based their decision on there being no special duty to protect the blind or infirm.

In any event, as Lord Reid pointed out, that was an ex tempore decision, and in any case was not binding on the House. He concluded with his characteristic forthrightness by saying,

"I can see no justification for laying down any hard and fast rule limiting the classes of persons for whom those interfering with a pavement must make provision. It is said that it is impossible to tell what precautions will be adequate to protect all kinds of infirm pedestrians or that taking such precautions would be unreasonably difficult or expensive. I think that such fears are exaggerated, and it is worth recollecting that when the Courts sought to lay down specific rules as to the duties of occupiers the law became so unsatisfactory that Parliament had to step in and pass the Occupiers Liability Act 1957. It appears to me that the ordinary principles of the common law must apply in streets as well as elsewhere, and that fundamentally they depend on what a reasonable man, careful of his neighbour's safety, would do having the knowledge which a reasonable man in the position of the defendant must be deemed to have".

The fallacy in the respondent's argument that it was not reasonably foreseeable that a blind man might pass that way, or that the chance of that happening was too remote, lay in the fact that it is common knowledge that there were a great many blind persons throughout the country, and this fact had to be taken into account. In the same way, the appellant tendered evidence showing that other public undertakings, such as the Post Office, always take into account the needs of blind people in guarding their excavations.

The remaining four members of the House delivered concurring judgments, although Lord Evershed confessed to having greater difficulty in reaching the same conclusion as his brethren. He pointed out that there was a dearth of authority on the point, although the Scottish case of M'Kibbin v. Glasgow Corporation 1920 S.C. 590 gave support for the view that a duty exists to have regard to the needs of blind pedestrians. There, the plaintiff was nearly blind, and stepped into a water hydrant on the pavement, from which the cover had been removed. She was seriously injured by falling against a turn-key which protruded some three feet above the pavement, and was successful in her claim for damages. The Court of Session made observations about the duty of care towards the blind and infirm, and in particular Lord Salvesen said:

"The streets of any city are open to be used by persons of more or less defective eyesight, hearing, and capacity and I think, as a general proposition, that (the defendants) must take note of that fact and, if they are guilty of negligence, they cannot escape the consequences by saying that a more vigilant person than the one who was injured would in all probability have escaped injury".

Perhaps that was the crux of the matter there: the defendants had been guilty of negligence by any standard.

Too much must not be read into this decision of the House of Lords for Haley was ultimately decided on a question of fact. The punner-hammer was not an adequate or sufficient warning to a blind person, because of its position. The basic principle remains that in order to support an action for negligence, the plaintiff must show that he has been injured by the breach of a duty owed to him by the defendant to take reasonable care to avoid that injury. Mr. Haley was able to do that, for he could show (to use the jargon of jurisprudence) that a "duty situation" existed. As professor James has aptly observed, Law of Torts (2nd edn., p. 155), the concept of the duty of care "serves as a useful negative test by which the possibility of establishing negligence can be excluded", the standard of care required always being "reasonable care in all the circumstances" (per Lord Somerville in Cavanagh v. Ulster Weaving Co., Ltd. [1959] 2 All E.R., at p. 752).

A few months before Haley another aspect of negligence was considered by the House of Lords in Hughes v. Lord Advocate ([1963] 1 All E.R. 705) which shows that the test of reasonable foreseeability does not extend to a requirement that the precise way of causing the damage should be foreseeable. The tragic facts were that a child was seriously injured by burning after an explosion caused by a paraffin lamp left by an open and unguarded manhole, which the infant knocked or lowered into the hole. In an action for damages for negligence, the defendants were liable, because although the exact manner of the injury being caused and turn of events was not predictable, it was reasonably foreseeable that an accident of the type that did occur might happen. As Lord Jenkins said, "the distinction between burning and explosion is too fine to warrant acceptance".

The supposed absence of duty owed by an occupier of premises to a trespasser raises problems of its own. The matter was considered recently by the Court of Appeals in Videan v. British Transport Commission ([1963] 2 All E.R. 860), and more recently still by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Commissioner for Railways v. Quinlan ([1964] 1 All E.R. 897). In the latter case, the respondent was injured when trespassing on a private level crossing, his presence on the line being unknown to the appellant occupier. The long established principle has been that a person trespasses at his own risk, and in order for liability to attach to the occupier "there must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm, or at least some act done with reckless disregard for the presence of the trespasser" (per Lord Hailsham, L.C., in Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck [1929] All E.R. Rep., at p. 4).

Here the respondent contended that the extent of an occupier's duty towards a trespasser had been extended by Donoghue v. Stevenson. Viscount Radcliffe, delivering the opinion of the Board, dealt with that point quite shortly, when he said,

"what the law does not admit however is that a trespasser, while incapable of being described otherwise than as a trespasser should be elevated to the status of an ordinary member of the public to whom, if rightfully present, the occupier owes duties of foresight and reasonable care. It does not alter a trespasser's description merely to christen him a 'neighbour'".

On the other hand, in Videan a majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning, M.R., and Harman, L.J.) suggested that "the circumstances may be such that (the occupier) ought to foresee the presence of a trespasser; and then the duty of care extends to the trespasser also". Pearson, L.J., preferred a more conservative approach:

"The trespasser is a neighbour, though an underprivileged neighbour. It must be said, both on principle and authority, that the duty of care owing to a trespasser by the person who knows of, or ought reasonably to anticipate, his presence is radically different from the duty of care owing to a lawful visitor... (the occupier) owes to the trespasser a duty of care which is substantially less than (that owed) to a lawful visitor, because the duty to a trespasser is only a duty to treat him with common humanity...".

The Judicial Committee reasserted the traditional view, and it would seem unrealistic to hold that an occupier owes the statutory "common duty of care" to trespassers. It may well be that liability for injury to trespassers does rest upon foresight, for Lord Hailsham's "reckless disregard" test may be regarded as merely another way of saying that there is some duty of care to trespassers based on foreseeability. This seems largely a matter of linguistic analysis.

To sum up, the appellate Courts in recent years appear to have adopted a very flexible approach in negligence cases. A conservative approach was at first discernible in applying Lord Atkin's dictum in Donoghue v. Stevenson, but it is now clear that the problems of duty, care, and breach and remoteness of damage are all at the forefront of judicial development. There are and always will be circumstances in which no duty of care exists, unless we move towards the insurance principle of liability in tort, but as Lord Evershed stated at the conclusion of his judgment in Haley's case the common law rules have "the characteristic that in general they can never be said to be fully limited by definition, but have rather the capacity of adaptation in accordance with the changing circumstances of succeeding ages."—L.J. (Vincent Powell-Smith).

CONNIVANCE AT ADULTERY

A HUSBAND who encourages his wife to commit adultery commits no less a matrimonial offence than the adulterers themselves, and can expect no relief from the courts. But does the initial wrong persist, so as to shut him out from the remedy of divorce for any subsequent act of adultery, however remote? Can he never repent of his connivance, offer his wife a reconciliation, and thus wipe out his matrimonial offence, so that any later adultery by her will give him grounds for divorce? The rigid attitude of the ecclesiastical courts seems to have been that nothing less than full reconciliation would wipe out the connivance, but in Godfrey v. Godfrey and Wall [1964] 3 W.L.R. 524, the House of Lords has made it clear that the modern view is more relaxed. The facts are not very important—indeed they may be misleading—but from the judgments some guiding principles can be spelt out. First, connivance can spend itself, either by lapse of time or by the subsequent acts of the parties, and full reconciliation amounting to condonation is not the test. Secondly, since the conniver is a wrongdoer in the eye of the law, the burden is on him to show that his connivance has spent itself. Most important of all, each case depends on its own facts: the test to be applied is, was the connivance the cause of—or one of the causes of—the adultery in question, or would that adultery have taken place irrespective of the connivance? In other words, connivance is something like conduct conducing; to be a bar to relief it must be the causa causans of the adultery. If these tests are applied to the facts in Godfrey, many will no doubt feel that the petitioner was most unfortunate in failing to get a decree. Their lordships were sympathetic, but not prepared to interfere with the trial judge's finding that words spoken in a moment of great stress, and under the influence of drink, were sufficient encouragement to excuse the wife's adultery more than six months later. The relaxation of the law on connivance is in this case cold comfort for the petitioner.—S.J.

RES NULLIUS?

THE House of Lords decided last week (Brown v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 108 S.J. p. 636) that deposit interest earned on a solicitor's clients' account does not belong to the solicitor, although they did not specify to whom it does belong. The Council of the Law Society gave an opinion in 1958 (55 Law Society's Gazette 210) to the effect that a solicitor may properly place clients' moneys on deposit with a bank and that it is permissible for him to retain for his own benefit the interest accruing from such deposit, provided that if he places on deposit a specific sum for a named client or clients, the interest arising therefrom must be credited to the client or clients and not to the solicitor. Lord Reid recognised that the decision (which affirmed the decision of the Court of Session: see 107 Sol. J. 705 and 718) might have rather wide repercussions and might give rise to some practical difficulties: this is the understatement of the week. We do not know how many solicitors place part of their clients' account on deposit, but three solutions to the problem suggest themselves. The first is to follow the example of many firms and keep the office account at a low level with the tacit agreement that no charge is made so long as the level of the client's account is kept correspondingly high. We believe that it is possible to run an overdraft at a cheap rate of interest on the same basis. The second is for a firm, which has so much clients' money in and out that this first suggestion does not appeal, to obtain the decision of the court as to whom the interest does belong, preferably with the financial backing of the Law Society. The third course is to devise some form of contract with each client whereby sums to a certain amount held by a solicitor for less than a certain time may be placed by him in his own deposit account. We think that this might well give rise to difficulties. The case reached the House of Lords on the narrow point of whether the interest was earned or unearned in the hands of the solicitor: they held that it was not his income at all. Sometimes it is simpler to let sleeping dogs lie. The ultimate solution may well be legislation to provide that to some extent solicitors the bankers.—S. J.

QUALIFIED PRIVILEGE

THE letter which was the subject of the action for defamation in Egger v. Davies (The Times, 22 July, 1964) had been written on a privileged occasion. It was the product of a committee. Some of those responsible were actuated by malice, others were not; and the question which confronted the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning M.R., Harman and Davies L.J.J.) was whether or not the latter were in a position to rely on privilege. The court, reversing Marshall J. (The Times, 25 February), who had relied on Smith v. Streatfeild (109 L.T. 173; (1913) 3 K.B. 764), held that they were. The Master of the Rolls referred in the course of his judgment to the following passage in Gayley on Libel and Slander: "Where two or more persons are sued in respect of a joint libel, proof that one of the defendants was actuated by malice will defeat any plea of privilege on the part of the others." Such a rule, his lordship said, had no existence. Smith v. Streatfeild was wrongly decided and ought to be overruled. Supporting statements in Adam v. Ward (117 L.T. 34; (1917) A.C. 309) were obiter and in his lordship's view erroneous. Other authorities—e.g. Longdon-Griffiths v. Smith ((1950) 2 All E.R. 662) and Meekins v. Henson ((1962) 1 All E.R. 899)—were to the opposite effect.

The Master of the Rolls thought that the root of the trouble lay in the tacit assumption that if one of the persons concerned in a joint publication was a tortfeasor, all were joint tortfeasors and must stand or fall together, so that the malice of one was the malice of all. That rested on a fallacy. No tortfeasors could truly be described solely as joint tortfeasors; they were always several tortfeasors as well. In any joint tort the party injured had his choice whether to sue all of them together or any one or more of them separately. Even in a joint tort the tort was the separate act of each individual. Each was severally answerable for it and severally entitled to his own defence. If he was himself innocent of malice, he was entitled to the benefit of it. He was not to be dragged down with the guilty. By English law no one was to be pronounced a wrongdoer, or be made liable to pay damages for a wrong unless he himself had done wrong, or his agent or servant had done wrong and he was vicariously responsible for it. Save in the cases where the principle respondent superior applied, the law did not impute wrongdoer to a man who was in fact innocent.—L.T.

DAMAGES: COMPENSATORY OR EXEMPLARY?

LORD Devlin's speech in Rookes v. Barnard ((1964) 1 All E.R. 367) contains some very important observations on the subject of exemplary damages, which he distinguished from aggravated damages—a species of compensatory damages enlarged by the motives and conduct of the wrongdoer. The former differed essentially from ordinary damages, their object being to punish and deter. The exemplary principle operated only in the case of arbitrary or unconstitutional action by servants of the government or where the defendant's conduct had been calculated by him to yield a profit for himself which might well exceed the compensation payable to the plaintiff. Whenever exemplary damages were appropriate a jury should be directed that, if, but only if, the sum which they had in mind to award as compensation was inadequate to punish the defendant for his outrageous conduct, to mark their disapproval of such conduct and to deter him from repeating it, then they could award some larger sum.

The plaintiff, a doctor, in McCarey v. Associated Newspapers Limited (The Times 7 November, 1964) had been awarded by a jury £9,000 damages for libel against four newspapers which in their reports of an inquest suggested that he had attempted to shift responsibility for an accident and had been rebuked by the coroner for so doing. A man had died as a result of the plaintiff's injecting surgical spirit instead of saline, and the plaintiff stated that he had admitted his responsibility at the earliest possible stage of the proceedings. The Court of Appeal (Willmer, Pearson and Diplock, L.J.J.) held that the above-mentioned distinction applied to libel actions and ordered a new trial limited to the question of damages. Pearson L.J. observed that in this case no damage had been caused to the plaintiff by these libels other than that to his reputation. There was, for example, no evidence of what might be called "social" damage and the learned lord justice could not resist the impression that the amount awarded went beyond a reasonable sum and must include an element of punishment for the defendants or of bounty for the plaintiff. There was no doubt that a substantial wrong had been done to the plaintiff, but the award of £9,000 should not be allowed to stand.—L.T.

REVIEWS.

Law in the Making. By SIR CARLETON KEMP ALLEN. Seventh Edition. BOMBAY 1: Oxford University Press, Oxford House, Apollo Bunder. Demi 8vo. Pages 649. Price 63s net.

THIS extremely interesting treatise on the sources of law which was first published over three decades ago has undergone much revision and re-arrangement in the light of recent changes and amendments and the case law is brought down to the end of 1962. Starting with custom as the raw material of law the author goes on to consider judicial interpretation as the source of law. The latter in turn leads to an absorbing discussion on the doctrine and operation of precedent. Equity which the author considers a constant and indispensable factor in legal development is next taken up and the book concludes with a dissertation on the constitutional organs of law making, namely, legislation original and subordinate. The chapter on the topic of subordinate legislation takes account of the report of the committee under the chairmanship of Sir Oliver Franks which culminated in the passing of the Tribunals and Inquiries Act, 1958. This is legal literature at its best and apart from its profundity and the depth of learning displayed, the book is a veritable mine of recondite information gathered from not easily accessible sources. Within the limited space of a short notice it is not possible to touch on the different aspects of the problems dealt with here but special mention must be made of the chapter dealing with the authority and operation of precedent wherein it is pertinently observed that "Courts of law exist not to adorn learning by the elaboration of legal subtleties, but to do justice between citizens on concrete issues". A book warmly to be recommended to all who are interested in the dynamics of the judicial process.

Principles of the English Law of Contract. By SIR WILLIAM R. ANSON, Bart., D.C.L. Barrister-at-Law. Twenty-second Edition by A. G. GUEST, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. BOMBAY 1: Oxford University Press, Oxford House, Apollo Bunder. Roy 8vo. Pages 635. Price Rs. 14.40.

ANSON'S classic work on Contract known to generations of law students, now makes a welcome appearance as a low-priced paper-back in the English language Book Society Series. The present editor who had carried out extensive revision of the original text in the last edition of this book so as to conform to modern requirements, has in this edition continued this process by re-casting material dealing with such topics as the Terms of the Contract, Incapacity, Misrepresentation, Illegality, Privity of Contract, Discharge by Agreement and Discharge by Frustration. In considering the present state of the law the editor has made some useful suggestions indicating where reform in the law of contract is necessary. The case law is brought down to June 1, 1964 and of particular interest is the discussion, on the far-reaching effects on the law relating to Misrepresentation, of the decision of the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne & Co., Ltd. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd., [1964] A. C. 465. This authoritative work on an important branch of the law must find its place on the shelves of every well-equipped law-library. A word of praise is due to the publishers who have made it available at such a low price—an example which can well be emulated by some of our publishers of books printed on thick paper with heavily loaded matter.

ARTICLE 31A(1)(a) AND THE SUPREME COURT.*

SEVERAL decisions of the Supreme Court have dealt with the meaning and scope of cl. (a) in art. 31A(1) of the Constitution. The two latest decisions on this subject,¹ can be said to have at last settled the law. It is proposed to examine in this brief article those two decisions in the context of the earlier decisions of the Court and the history of the enactment.

Article 31A was first inserted in the Constitution in 1951 in order to eliminate any challenge to agrarian reform measures. The reason underlying the insertion was explained by the Prime Minister, Mr. Nehru, thus²:

"Another Article in regard to which unanticipated difficulties have arisen is article 31. The validity of agrarian reform measures passed by the State Legislatures in the last three years has, in spite of the provisions of clauses (4) and (6) of article 31 formed the subject-matter of dilatory litigation, as a result of which the implementation of these important measures, affecting large numbers of people, has been held up.

The main objects of this Bill are, accordingly,...to insert provisions fully securing the constitutional validity of zamindari abolition laws in general and certain specified State Acts³ in particular."

Though the enactment of the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, ensured that certain agrarian reform measures were put beyond challenge, the extent of art. 31A, as enacted in 1951, was found insufficient. The Statement of Objects and Reasons to the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Bill, 1955, explained that an extension of art. 31A (and the addition to the list of protected Acts in the 9th Schedule) was necessary in order, inter alia, to achieve the next objective in land reform, viz., "the fixing of limits to the extent of agricultural land that may be owned or occupied by any person, the disposal of any land held in excess of the prescribed maximum and the further modification of the rights of land owners and tenants in agricultural holdings." The other objects were to ensure the beneficial utilisation of vacant and waste lands in urban and rural areas and the clearance of slum areas; to ensure State control of mineral rights; to grant the State power to take over the temporary management of a company in the public interest; and to grant the State certain powers of amalgamation and transfer of companies⁴. This led to the enactment of the Fourth Amendment Act in 1955.

After 1955, therefore, any legislation authorising acquiring of an "estate" or extinguishing or modifying rights in an "estate" could not be challenged on the ground of violation of art. 14, 19 or 31. "Estate" was defined to mean in any local area what that expression meant in the local law relating to land tenures in force in that area, and included a jagir, an inam, a muafi or similar grant, and a janmam right.⁵ The Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act, 1964, has further amended (with retrospective effect) this definition so as to include land held under a ryotwari settlement, and land held or let for purposes of agriculture or for purposes ancillary thereto, including waste land, forest land, land for pasture or sites of buildings and other structures occupied by cultivators of land, agricultural labourers and village artisans.

After the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, two interesting questions arose for consideration. The first was general: how was art. 31A to be construed. The second was narrower: was there anything in art. 31A to limit the very wide meaning the expression "estate" would have in several local areas. Both these questions remain of interest even after the enactment of the Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act, 1964.

Article 31A is contained in the Part on "Fundamental Rights", even though it is in the nature of a limitation on the rights guaranteed by arts. 14, 19 and 31, and carries the marginal heading "Savings of laws providing for acquisition of estates, etc." Its inclusion in Part III of the Constitution as an independent fundamental "right" is itself somewhat odd. However that may be, there can be little doubt that it was intended to, and did, operate in the nature of a proviso or exception to arts. 14, 19 and 31, and the non-obstante clause with which it begins shows this to be so. One would have thought, therefore, that on settled principles of construction, it was to be construed narrowly⁶. Such an approach would also be justified on the broader ground that art. 31A which tends to reduce rights of citizens should, therefore, be narrowly construed. Yet, in *Atma Ram v. The State of Punjab*⁷, the Supreme Court observed:

"...Keeping in view the fact that Art. 31A was enacted by two successive amendments—one in 1951 (First Amendment), and the second in 1955 (Fourth Amendment)—with retrospective effect, in order to save legislation effecting agrarian reforms, we have every reason to hold that those expressions have been used in their widest amplitude, consistent with the purpose behind those amendments. A piece of validating enactment purposely introduced into the Constitution with a view to saving that kind of legislation from attacks on the ground of constitutional invalidity, based on Arts. 14, 19 and 31, should not be construed in a narrow sense. On the other hand, such a constitutional enactment should be given its fullest and widest effect, consistently with the purpose behind the enactment, provided, however, that such a construction does not involve any violence to the language actually used."

The judgment in Atma Ram's case was delivered by Mr. Justice Sinha (as he then was) on December 8, 1958, on behalf of a Bench of five Judges consisting of S. R. Das C.J., Bhagwati, Subba Rao and Wanchoo, JJ. (and himself). The question before the Court was whether a part of an estate was an "estate". The Court held that it was, applying the principle that the greater must include the less. It would appear, therefore, that a construction of art. 31A, based on the ordinary meaning of the words used in the article, would have resulted in the rejection of the Petition, and that no question directly arose as to whether the article should be construed strictly or literally. Strictly speaking, therefore, the observations quoted above were obiter dicta.

About a year and a half later, on May 4, 1960, the Supreme Court delivered its judgment in *Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochuni v. State of Madras*⁸. The majority, consisting of Sinha C.J., Subba Rao J., and Shah J. (Imam and Sarkar, JJ. dissenting) laid down the opposite rule. Subba Rao J., who delivered the judgment of the majority, observed that this article deprived citizens of fundamental rights, and ought not be extended to overreach the object implicit in the article⁹. Mr. Justice Subba Rao actually cited part of the passage in Atma Ram's case set out above¹⁰, but did not refer to the latter portion thereof.

8 [1960] 3 S.C.R. 887.

9 At p. 900.

10 At p. 903.

It is clear that there is a conflict between the two observations. Whereas Atma Ram's case enjoins a construction giving the fullest and widest effect to it, consistent with the purpose behind the enactment, subject only to any limitations in the language of the article itself, Kochuni's case contemplates a limitation of the article not to its language, but to the object implicit in it. It is true that Atma Ram's case refers to the "purpose behind the enactment", but the passage as a whole makes it clear that it enjoins a liberal construction. The difference in approach is made clear by the premise; while Atma Ram's case looks upon art. 31A as a validating or ameliorative measure, and therefore to be liberally construed¹¹, Kochuni's case refers to it as an exception to fundamental rights, which occupy a transcendental position, and therefore, necessarily to be narrowly construed¹².

This divergent approach was not resolved until several years later, and that was not to last. In Ranjit Singh's case¹³, a unanimous Supreme Court, consisting of Gajendragadkar C.J., and Wanchoo, Hidayatullah, Das Gupta and Ayyangar, JJ., in a judgment delivered by Hidayatullah J. on August 20, 1964, politely buried Kochuni's case as a "special case", or so it seemed. As will be seen below, in an appeal decided by another unanimous Bench (Subba Rao, Wanchoo, Hidayatullah, Dayal and Sikri, JJ.) a bare two months later,¹⁴ the principles underlying Kochuni's case, and the decision itself, have been reaffirmed.

In order to appreciate the second question, it is easier to depart from the chronological order, and to begin with Kochuni's case. In that case, the Supreme Court was considering the validity of a Madras Act¹⁵ which merely enlarged the rights of junior members of certain tarwad properties, and the Court found this was unconnected with agrarian reform. If the expressions "estate", and "rights", as defined in art. 31A were construed literally, there could be no doubt that the Act was an Act providing for the extinguishment or modification of rights in an estate, and therefore within the protection of the article. And this was in fact found to be so by Mr. Justice Sarkar, who delivered the dissenting judgment for himself and Mr. Justice Imam¹⁶.

A similar question had arisen in a Bombay decision¹⁷, since reversed by the Supreme Court¹⁸. The Court was considering a Bombay amendment to the Land Acquisition Act providing, inter alia, that land could be acquired for a housing scheme without paying the 15 per cent. solatium usually provided, and by paying the market value of the land not on the relevant date but on January 1, 1948. A Division Bench of the Bombay High Court observed that the Act was protected by art. 31A as it provided for the acquisition of land; and as "estate" was defined by s. 3(s) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code—which was the relevant local law relating to land tenures—as "any interest in lands... vested in a person... capable of holding the same".

Had the Bombay view been accepted almost any statute acquiring, or interfering with rights of or in, immoveable property would be within the protection of art. 31A. Illustrations would be the Rent Acts as they merely modify rights in land; legislation dealing with mortgages; building regulations; Town Planning Acts, etc. And this is not a problem limited to Bombay; for many local laws dealing with land tenures contained a definition of "estate" as wide as that contained in the Bombay Land Revenue Code.

The problem before the Supreme Court in Kochuni's case was, therefore, this. If art. 31A was to be construed literally, it would mean that the protection of arts. 14, 19 and 31 would not be available to citizens in many parts of the country in respect of almost any legislation pertaining to immoveable property. Such a result ought to be avoided; but how? The Court resolved the problem by resorting to the well-settled rule of construction first laid down in *Heydon's case*¹⁹, and by relying on the use of the word "estate" in art. 31A. The Court cited the Statement of Objects and Reasons behind the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955²⁰; and observed that the Fourth Amendment was enacted to save measures of agrarian reform. It followed that the wide language of art. 31A(1)(a) was to be construed narrowly so as to cover only measures of agrarian reform. The Court found support for this view in two earlier decisions of the Court which contained observations stating that that article was enacted as a measure of agrarian reform²¹.

Though Kochuni's case was decided on May 4, 1960, in a later judgment delivered on April 25, 1961, a unanimous Court (Sinha C.J., Sarkar, Das Gupta, Ayyangar and Mudholkar, JJ.) without referring to Kochuni's case, held that Bihar legislation acquiring the right of a land-owner to hold a mela on his own land, was within the protection of art. 31A²², even though it was unconnected with agrarian reform.

This confusion was attempted to be set at rest in Ranjit Singh's case²³, in which the Court described Kochuni's case as a "special case", and observed that the rule laid down in that case was not to be applied where the general scheme of the legislation was agrarian reform, and that something ancillary thereto in the interest of rural economy was also attempted to be done thereunder. The Court observed that the scheme of rural development to-day envisages:

"not only equitable distribution of land so that there is no undue imbalance in society resulting in a landless class on the one hand and a concentration of land in the hands of a few, on the other, but envisages also the raising of economic standards and bettering rural health and social conditions. Provisions for the assignment of lands to village Panchayat for the use of the general community, or for hospitals, schools, manure pits, tanning grounds etc. enure for the benefit of rural population and must be considered to be essential part of the redistribution of holdings and open lands to which no objection is apparently taken."²⁴

In other words, the Court accepted Kochuni's decision as being correct; only legislation pertaining to agrarian reform would be protected by art. 31A, but the Court gave to that expression a wider meaning so as to include all matters ancillary thereto, and almost all matters pertaining to rural improvement were treated as ancillary matters. This position was reasserted by the Supreme Court in *P. V. Mudaliar v. Spl. Dy. Collector*²⁵. In the latter case, the Court held that a Madras Act providing for the acquisition of property for housing was not protected by art. 31A(1)(a).

Though it is difficult to be clear in view of the uncertainty and changes in the Supreme Court decisions discussed above, it is submitted that the law as it stands to-day may be stated thus:

I. The whole of art. 31A is to be strictly construed. In view of the decisions in Kochuni's case, and P. V. Mudaliar's case, the observations to the contrary in Atma Ram's case, and Ranjit Singh's case are not to be regarded as binding.

II. Even though there is nothing in the language of art. 31A(1)(a) to so limit it, it must be limited to measures of agrarian reform.

III. "Agrarian reform" must, however, be liberally construed, so as to include all matters leading to the improvement of rural life.

19 (1584) 3 Co. Rep. 7a, 76 E.R. 637.

20 But unfortunately omitted clause (ii) which specifically mentions the object of beneficial utilisation of waste and vacant lands, and clearance of slum areas.

21 Sri Ram Ram Narain Medhi v. State of Bombay, [1959] Supp. 1 S.C.R. 489; Atma Ram v. State of Punjab, [1959] Supp. 1 S.C.R. 748.

The Acts impugned in both these cases were, however, obviously measures of agrarian reform.

22 State of Bihar v. Rameshwar Pratap, [1962] 2 S.C.R. 382.

25 [1965] A.I.R. S.C. 1017.

Can this approach of the Court be justified according to the settled principles of the interpretation of the Constitution? This is not an easy question to answer. It is respectfully submitted, however, that proposition I is undoubtedly correct for the reasons already indicated above. The article must be strictly construed because it is in the nature of a proviso or saving clause, and because it limits the fundamental rights of citizens and other persons.

Coming to the proposition II, the Court in Kochuni's case apparently found the limitation in the objects and reasons behind the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, and also, as Mr. Justice Subba Rao made clear in P. V. Mudaliar's case, in the use of the word "estate". The reference to the Statement of Objects and Reasons in Kochuni's case was unfortunate, for the Court omitted the object of slum clearance, and the beneficial utilisation of vacant and waste lands in urban and rural areas. It is clear that the Government intended art. 31A(i)²⁶ to protect legislation for the beneficial utilisation of all vacant and waste lands, and for slum clearance. It is also clear that in several local areas, legislation providing for the acquisition of land even in urban areas for any of these objects would be within the clause, if the ordinary meaning of the language in the clause, and in art. 31A(2)(a), is to govern such legislation. If one looks at the objects and reasons even to ascertain the prevalent conditions when the Amendment was enacted, it is apparent that the problem of slums and the utilisation of all vacant and waste lands was one of the problems sought to be resolved by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Bill, 1955.

In Kochuni's case, the Supreme Court also referred to the use of the word "estate" in art. 31A(1)(a), and in the definition in sub-art. (2)(a), which the Court found emphasised the fact that the article dealt with land tenures. It was, therefore, "manifest that the said Article deals with a tenure called 'estate' and provides for its acquisition or the extinguishment or modification of the rights of the land-holder or the various subordinate tenure-holders in respect of their rights in relation to the estate"²⁷. The Court went on to observe that to hold otherwise would enable the State to divest a proprietor and vest his estate in another without any reference to agrarian reform. It is this reasoning which the Supreme Court itself described in P. V. Mudaliar's case as the "real basis" of the decision in Kochuni's case.

It must be confessed that this reasoning is not wholly satisfactory. Assuming that the use of the expression "estate" suggests land tenures, all that follows is that it was intended to cover all legislation pertaining to land tenures. Land tenure means the basis on which land is held from or under the State; and is applicable equally to rural and urban lands²⁸. All that necessarily follows from the use of the word "estate" is, therefore, the limitation of art. 31A(1)(a) to land. No reference to agrarian reform emerges from the use of the word "estate".

The argument based on the Statement of Objects and Reasons cannot stand if one considers the object of beneficial utilisation of vacant and waste lands, and slum clearance; and the argument based on the use of the word "estate" does not lead to a limitation based on agrarian reform. One is forced to conclude, with respect, that the reasoning of Kochuni's case, though expressly approved in P. V. Mudaliar's case, is not sustainable.

It is respectfully submitted, however, that the principle laid down by the Court in those two cases can be partly sustained by a slightly different approach. As has been seen, the principle that art. 31-A is to be strictly construed (pro-

26 It may be noted that the Bill contained a specific clause in art. 31A(1) dealing with a law for the acquisition of land, building or huts declared to be a slum or any vacant or waste land. That clause was dropped when the Bill was enacted. It is arguable, therefore, that the Legislature no longer desired this object to be achieved through art. 31A.

27 [1960] 3 S.C.R. 887, at p. 900.

28 Even in the English Law of Real Property, lands are held on a tenure; "fee simple" or copyhold, etc., are all descriptions of different tenures.

position I above) is correct. The next step in the argument would be the simple fact that the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, enacted a most complicated definition of "estate". The word meant what it, or its local equivalent, meant in the relevant law dealing with land tenures; it also included a jagir, an inam, a muafi right and a janmam right. Instead of this complex definition, all that the Legislature had to do was to define "estate" as meaning any interest in land. Had this been done, all doubts would be set at rest, and the clause would cover all legislation pertaining to land. The very fact that the Legislature having before it such a simple means available, did not adopt it, suggests that it was not intended to cover all legislation pertaining to land. The Legislature clearly had in mind something narrower than all land. What it had in mind was the acquisition of certain kinds of rights in certain kinds of land. The kind of rights, as well as the kind of land suggested by the language is rights of tenure in agricultural or rural land. The limitation which the word suggests is, I would submit, a limitation confining the article to agricultural lands. This does not, however, bring in the concept of agrarian reform.

If what is stated above is correct, it would follow that legislation dealing with agricultural lands would be protected under art. 31A(1)(a), whether or not it is a measure of agrarian reform. What lands would be protected would (under the Fourth Amendment Act) vary from local area to local area. The third proposition set out above does not survive if the view expressed here is correct.

Much support is given to this view by the subsequent enactment in 1964 of the Constitution (Seventeenth Amendment) Act. That Act adds to the definition of "estate" two further clauses:

(ii) any land held under ryotwari settlement—this sets at rest the uncertainty as to whether ryotwari lands were an estate in several local areas;

(iii) any land held or let for purposes of agriculture or for purposes ancillary thereto, including waste lands, forest land, land for pastures or sites of buildings and other structures occupied by cultivators of land, agricultural labourers and village artisans.

The very wide definition in cl. (iii) brings within it all non-urban land, but clearly does not include urban lands. When the Seventeenth Amendment was enacted, Parliament had before it not only the judgment of Kochuni's case, but certain other judgments in the High Courts applying that judgment. If it had intended to include urban lands, cl. (iii) could have been so drafted. It also follows that the object of utilisation of vacant land and waste lands, and slum clearance, mentioned at the time of the Fourth Amendment, was lost sight of; or, perhaps, Parliament in 1964 did not wish to have such measures protected by art. 31A.

The language of cl. (iii), as now enacted, also suggests that the test of agrarian reform is no longer sustainable unless the expression is given the very wide meaning of rural improvement suggested in Ranjit Singh's case. Agrarian reform, as commonly understood, would not relate to acquisition of forest lands, or building sites in villages, yet these are now expressly included by cl. (iii).

The correct interpretation, as submitted above, would not materially affect the law except in a few cases. The decision in P. V. Mudaliar's case, for instance, would be the same. The difference would arise in those few cases where rights in agricultural lands are sought to be interfered with by a legislation wholly unconnected with agrarian reform. One illustration would be the Madras Act struck down in Kochuni's case. Such an Act would, if the view expressed here is correct, be protected by art. 31A²⁹. Another would be the legislation relating to melas, upheld in *State of Bihar v. Rameshwar Pratap*³⁰.

²⁹ If the Siknam properties were agricultural land.

GLEANINGS.

ART OF CROSS-EXAMINATION

WHILE many of the books on cross-examination are of value to the reader and particularly to the young lawyer, it is well to bear in mind the following admonition. Each lawyer possesses his own peculiar characteristics and personality, including his own particular method of speaking, mannerisms, and thought. It does not follow that because one lawyer has been successful in the performance of a courtroom tactic that another lawyer will be successful by deliberately aping or mimicking the actions of the first lawyer. What may impress a judge or jury as fine work on the part of one attorney, may seem ludicrous when aped or mimicked by another. The basic tactic employed by an experienced and accomplished cross-examiner may be followed by another with equal success; but the latter must adapt the tactic to his own mannerisms and personality in order that it be impressive, forceful, and effective.

It has been correctly emphasized that the art of cross-examination is to know when not to question an adverse witness. This can best be illustrated by referring to a case that was tried some years ago. The matter involved the testamentary capacity of an old lady. The proponents of the will called many personal acquaintances of the testatrix, all of whom testified that the old lady was rational and possessed testamentary capacity. Those seeking to overthrow the will called a medical expert, who, on a hypothetical question, gave his opinion that the woman was irrational and did not possess testamentary capacity. The lawyer on the other side was one of San Francisco's leading trial lawyers, and the expert witness braced himself for a vigorous and searching cross-examination. The noted lawyer walked up and down in front of the expert and finally asked but one question—whether the expert had ever seen or known the deceased in her lifetime. When the expert answered the question in the negative, the lawyer said "that is all." Needless to state, the jury found the old lady to have been sane and capable of making a valid will.

The converse of the foregoing rule at time is the course that should be followed. Never forego a cross-examination if you believe that it will produce one or more facts in your favour.

In a recent case, a lawyer probating an estate was charged with stealing $5,000. The complaining witness and her sister each testified that after the death of the complaining witness' husband they found $5,000 in currency secreted in the home; that they went one morning to the lawyer's office and turned the money over to him without getting a receipt; that the lawyer never accounted for the money and denied that he had ever received it.

The cross-examinations were long and minute, not only as to the time and how long the ladies were at the lawyer's office, but as to what they had done, whom they had seen, and where they had been both before and after leaving the lawyer's office; also as to what each of the women had done the day before and the day after they claimed visit to the lawyer. By tracing down these facts, the defense was able to establish the exact time of the alleged visit as between 11 and 11:30 in the morning of a particular day; then the defense was able to prove by the records of the court that on that morning the lawyer was actively engaged in the trial of a case from 9:30 in the morning to well after noon.

It should be manifest that one should not cross-examine merely because he has the right so to do. Where a witness has given damaging testimony against your client and you have no expectation of causing the witness to change or alter his testimony, a futile cross-examination merely allows the jurors to again hear the damaging testimony against your client.

Never ask general questions that permit the adverse witness to give long explanatory answers and that may result in the witness giving testimony that otherwise would be inadmissible. Questions on cross-examination should be definite and certain, thus calling for a definite and certain reply.

In a case where the question had to do with the human brain, an expert brain surgeon was called and gave his testimony. On cross-examination, the attorney asked this general question: "Doctor, just what do you know about the human brain?" The witness then started a discourse on the brain and after talking for about an hour the judge interrupted him with the following question: "Doctor, how much longer is it going to take to complete your answer?" The doctor turned to the judge and said: "Your honor, I am a professor at such-and-such medical school, my course consists of 20 lectures on the human brain, and I have just finished giving the jurors my first lecture." The court and both counsel agreed that the doctor need not give the balance of his lectures. The answer to the simple, general question greatly enhanced the standing of the witness and strengthened his testimony.

Where one has cause to believe that the testimony given on direct examination is false and fabricated and the witness has learned his or her testimony by coaching or by heart, then the cross-examination should call for repeated repetitions of the testimony, particularly if it related to a conversation with the defendant.

It is well known that one may repeat the substance of a conversation, but it is almost impossible to give again and again the same words claimed to have been used in the conversation.

A witness had detailed a long conversation with the defendant; the cross-examination took place about two days later, a Saturday and Sunday having intervened. Counsel for defendant argued to the jury that the testimony was fabricated and that the witness had learned the testimony by heart or rote; that no one could relate and then reiterate word for word a lengthy conversation. In support of this contention, counsel read to the jury a comparison of the testimony of the witness on direct and cross-examination, portions of which were as follows:

- D. "Hi, Mrs. N., How are you?" I said "I can't complain."
- X. "Hi, Mrs. N., How are you?" and I said "I can't complain."
- D. Mrs. N., I'll come right to the point.
- X. Mrs. N., I will come right to the point.
- D. I'll give you enough money to squeeze your dad into cooperating with me.
- X. I'll give you enough money to squeeze your dad into cooperating with me.
- D. You owe me $400 for services rendered. I'll give you $4,600, and leave town and your dad can never find you.
- X. You owe me $400 for services rendered, and I will give you $ 4,600, and you can leave town and your dad won't find you.
- D. If you can do that I'll keep it confidential, and if you can't, somebody will get hurt.
- X. If you can do that I will keep it confidential, if you can't, somebody will get hurt.
- D. The money isn't mine, it is a legitimate expense.
- X. The money isn't mine, it is a legitimate expense.
- D. He said what have ethics got to do with saving my reputation? We all have to make a living.
- X. He said what have ethics got to do with saving my reputation? We all have to make a living.
- D. I said Too many things can go wrong. If dad ever found out he would disown me.
- X. I said Too many things can go wrong. If dad ever found out he would disown me.
- D. Mr. H. said You would have the money and be out of town.
- X. Mr. H. said You would have the money and be out of town.

The foregoing caused the jury to believe that the testimony on direct examination was false and that the witness had been coached and learned her testimony by heart.

Never, on cross-examination, gild the lily. Once you have the witness state a material fact in your favour, drop the subject. Otherwise the witness may get off the hook by weakening his prior answer or by explaining it away; besides, you may refer again and again to this admission in argument and stress it.

In defense of a man accused of being a confidence operator, by indulging in the handkerchief-switch trick, it came to counsel's attention that a witness had previously identified two other men as being the ones who had perpetrated this trick on him in another county. Counsel for the defendant questioned his client as to the occurrence before trial and was informed that there was no basis for the charge in the other county as, even though he had been arrested, the case had been dismissed. At the trial, the witness appeared and after testifying to the matters concerned in the accusation of grand theft (the handkerchief-switch), then admitted that he had previously identified two other persons as having perpetrated the crime. Defense counsel, not being satisfied to let the matter rest on such testimony, then asked the following additional question to which he received the following reply:

Q. Is it not a fact that after the defendant in this case was arrested in this other county, that the case against him was eventually dismissed?

A. That is true, the case was dismissed after the defendant gave me back my money.

Of course, this ended the case so far as a defense was concerned, and the defendant was promptly convicted.

The moral is—let well enough alone, the additional question merely tried to gild the lily and resulted in a conviction.

Never underestimate the knowledge and ability of opposing counsel. Never attempt to show that the opposing counsel has no legal learning and does not know the facts of his case.

Where one underestimates the ability of opposing counsel, he may eventually find out that his estimate of his opponent was wrong and, by being so cocksure awake to find that the case has gone against him. Far better it is to assume that the opponent has at least the legal knowledge and training that you believe you possess; thus, even though you believe the opponent has poor ability as a trial lawyer, you will not be caught napping and will be able to prepare to meet any issue raised in the case or theory or contention raised by the opposite side.

In cross-examination never browbeat an elderly person or a young child. Never make fun of a witness because he is uneducated, or speaks with an accent, or has difficulty making himself understood. Members of the American public and, therefore, jurors, resent such tactics. It is a trait of Americans to side with the underdog. This is evidenced by sport events; the people who attend generally pull for the weaker person or side and delight in seeing the champions defeated. Remember that one or more of the jurors may be poorly educated, or that the parents or relative of a juror may have come from some foreign country, and still speak with a pronounced accent or speak English poorly. Most people despise a smart aleck and have no use for one who tries to ingratiate himself by belittling another.

If the direct examination of an adverse witness is incredible on its face, or even smacks of incredulity, a long and meticulous cross-examination is called for to emphasize the absurdity thereof. In such circumstances, merely because the direct examination has been damaging to your client, you should not surrender the right to cross-examination at length to bring about a grave doubt as to the veracity of the witness or the truthfulness or accuracy of his testimony.

Never cross-examine on an issue that has no relevancy to the defense of your side of the case. Thus, in a prosecution for arson where the defense is that your client did not set the fire, it is futile to cross-examine the adversary witnesses on the issue of whether the fire was of incendiary origin. Stick to the defense that your client did not start the fire, irrespective of whether it was or was not of incendiary origin.

The most dangerous question that one can ask a witness on cross-examination is the simple word "WHY?" Such a question simply allows the witness to discourse at length on the issue involved. Questions should be phrased definitely and be certain and should call for answers exactly answering the question propounded.

Lastly, it should always be borne in mind that you must not adopt the attitude that you know all about the case, and the witnesses, and the facts involved. Better to adopt the attitude that you know but slightly more than the jurors about the case and that you are merely attempting, by cross-examination, to develop the truth.

Of course, it is necessary that you know about the case, the witnesses for the other side, and the issue to be met.

If you have acquired this knowledge by proper pre-trial preparation, you may not only conduct adequate and impressive cross-examinations, but you will be able to conduct the entire trial in such manner that no matter even if the verdict is against you, you can be comforted by the thought that you did all that was possible in the circumstances.—C & C.

AMOUNT OF WIFE'S MAINTENANCE

MANY are the disputes over wife's maintenance, and they are mostly over its amount. In determining that, each case must, of course, be decided on its own particular facts. Yet the approach to each case ought to be similar, and much turns on it. Recently the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Sir Jocelyn Simon, P.) stated what was the right approach at the present day. He was giving judgment in an appeal from a magistrates' court's order for a wife's maintenance on her complaint of the husband's desertion. Counsel in that case had disclaimed the "one-third rule" as being discredited. Sir Jocelyn Simon, P. summarised the general principle in the following way. A wife, during cohabitation with her husband, shared with him a standard of living appropriate to his income, or, if she also were earning to their joint incomes. If cohabitation were destroyed by the wrongful conduct of the husband, her maintenance should be so assessed that her standard of living did not suffer more than was inherent in the circumstances of separation. Her standard of living might have to be lower after the end of cohabitation than it was before, since there would then be two households to be maintained in place of one. In general, however, she should not be relegated to a lower standard of living than that which her husband enjoyed. That did not mean that there was now a "one-half approach" in place of the discredited "one-third" rule, for not only was there a maximum beyond which justices could not go, but also there might be other circumstances to be taken into account such as obligations to support or contribute towards the support of a child at an appropriate standard. In the particular case (Kershaw v. Kershaw, July 14, 1964) the husband's earnings were £14 net weekly with an uncertain addition as a club artiste, which he put at £6 weekly and the magistrates found probably to be about £10 weekly. There was one child. The Divisional Court upheld an award of £7 10s. weekly for the wife and £2 10s. for the child, assuming, for the purpose, that the aggregate of the husband's earnings was £20 weekly, although the Court did not override the magistrates' finding of what the husband's earnings were.—L.J.

Chitty and Jacob's Queen's Bench Forms. Nineteenth Edition by I. H. JACOB, LL.B., A Master of the Supreme Court, Queen's Bench Division. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. LONDON: Sweet & Maxwell, 11 New Fetter Lane, Royal 8vo. 1965. Pages 1184. Price Rs. 201.60. £ 12.12 sh.

THIS book, in the words of the editor of the 19th edition of Chitty's classic work, provides within the space of one volume the appropriate Forms, other than pleadings, which may be used at any stage in the course of any litigation undertaken in the Queen's Bench Division. The present day tendency of the English Courts as reflected in the Supreme Court Rules of 1962 not to be bound by formalistic technicalities does not however permit the irregular use of Forms which might delay and obstruct the work of the Courts and increase costs. As the editor rightly observes that if procedure lies at the heart of the law, Forms lie at the heart of procedure which provide lubrication for the smooth working of the machinery of justice. Therefore, the importance of the use of the correct Form cannot be minimised and this work goes a long way in providing Forms suitable and adequate for use at any stage of the diverse proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division. In this edition the editor has practically re-written the original text because of the extensive changes in the legal procedure made by the Supreme Court (Revision) Rules, 1962. There are in all 1720 Forms including Prescribed Forms, i.e. those prescribed by the Rules of the Supreme Court and Practical Forms, i.e. those others which have been sanctioned and approved by the relevant authorities. There are also Forms which are in every day current use and Forms which are used in special or exceptional instances. In addition to these, new Forms have been added to meet the requirements of the present practice prevailing in the Queen's Bench Division. A useful feature is the table of the Rules of the Supreme Court which provides a ready reference to each Rule mentioned in the text and so to the relevant Form relating to that Rule. A very comprehensive index is given at the end which will greatly facilitate the work of finding out the required appropriate Form. In view of what the Lord Chief Justice of England has said in his foreword about the merits of the book it will be unnecessary if not impertinent to say anything more in its praise.

Mew's Digest of English Case Law, 1964. Edited by PETER ALLSOP, M.A., BARRISTER-AT-LAW. BOMBAY-2: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. LONDON: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 11 New Fetter Lane. Roy 8vo. Columns 548. Price Rs. 50.40. £ 3.35 sh.

THIS extremely well produced and well edited digest comprises cases reported in 1964 in over a dozen legal periodicals including the Weekly Law Reports, the Law Reports, the Solicitors' Journal, the All England Law Reports and Lloyd's List Law Reports, from the latter five of which the headnotes are made use of. The matter is arranged subject-wise and in alphabetical order. At the beginning of the book a cumulative table of cases for the years 1961 to 1964 is given and at the end a table of statutes—Imperial, Dominion and Colonial—judicially considered. A section is devoted to cases reported during the years 1962 and 1963 which are affected by decisions of the Courts reported in the present volume. The book ends with an enumeration of cases followed, approved, overruled, questioned, explained, distinguished and commented on, and an Index of subject matter contained in the volumes of the Digest for 1961 to 1964. This publication eminently fulfils the requisites of a good digest which are accuracy, exhaustiveness and facility of reference. To the Indian lawyer who has occasion to refer to English decisions on Company law, the law of libel, the law relating to copyright and trade mark etc. this Digest will come in very handy.

Human Law and Human Justice. By JULIUS STONE. BOMBAY-2: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. 1965. Roy. 8vo. Pages 415. Price Rs. 45.

THIS sequel to the author's Legal System and Lawyer's Reasonings gives in his words "an analytical, historical and critical account of the growth of human ideals of justice as they bear on human legal orderings and in their relation to the legal, social and economic contents in which they have arisen." The book opens with a historical survey of the concept of justice in Greek mythology and philosophy and gives a detailed account of the Hebraic concept with an interesting side-light on the lex talionis. This leads to a consideration of natural law as the bearer of early criteria of justice into the main stream of Western thought in the 17th and 18th centuries. This is followed by an examination of the various forms of the individualist criteria which emerged concurrently with the early industrial and political democratic revolution of the 18th and 19th centuries, particularly the ethico-juristic teachings of Immanuel Kant, the utilitarianism of Jeremy Bentham, Rudolf von Ihering's social utilitarianism, Leon Duguit's notion of "social solidarity" and Rudolf Stammler's social idealism. The succeeding chapters are concerned with contemporary speculation about justice under the heads natural law or its reappraisal, relativism in modern theories of justice with particular reference to Gustav Radbruch and interest-pragmatism with a critical examination of Roscoe Pound's theory of justice. The concluding chapters take stock of theories of justice in general in relation to the realities of contemporary social life and includes the author's own position on the search for "absolute", "normative" elements of justice. This is a difficult book to read and the author's terse and allusive style does little to relieve the reader's burden but a little patience and concentration will be found highly rewarding. Though mainly addressed to students of the philosophy of law, the book can be studied with much profit by legislators and judges who are alive to the responsibilities of their high offices.

Of Law and Life & Other things that matter. By FELIX FRANKFURTER. Edited by PHILIP B. KURLAND. BOMBAY 1: Oxford University Press, Oxford House, Apollo Bunder. Published by the Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts, U.S.A. Roy 12 mo. Pages 257. Price $5.95.

THIS is a thought provoking collection of addresses and writings of the late Felix Frankfurter who till his retirement in 1962 was a distinguished Judge of the Supreme Court of U.S.A. These deal with a variety of subjects ranging from a discussion of the proper spelling of the principal character in Daniel M'Naughten's case (10 Cl. & Fin. 200) to a feeling reference on the passing of his friend Lord Brand, a distinguished economist and civil servant. In between there are tributes to such varied personalities as Mr. Justice Brandies and Mr. Justice Cardozo of the Supreme Court, Presidents Roosevelt and Wilson, Harold Laski, the political theorist, Robert Frost, the poet and the physicist Niels Bohr. Apart from these studies which bear witness to his varied interest in life, the reader will be particularly drawn to his reflections on some legal problems as these appear in his lecture on "The Supreme Court in the Mirror of Justices" and the talk as recorded in "The Profession of the Law." In the former of these, while showing that prior judicial service is not necessary for a Supreme Court Judge, he sums up the responsibilities facing the Supreme Court and the qualities needed in its Justices, in these memorable words:

"The Court sits in judgment, that is, on the views of the direct representatives of the people in meeting the needs of society, on the views of Presidents and Governors, and by their construction of the will of legislatures the Court breathes life, feeble or strong, into the inert pages of the Constitution and the statute books.

Such functions surely call for capacious minds and reliable powers for disinterested and fair-minded judgment. It demands the habit of curbing any tendency to reach results agreeable to desire or to embrace the solution of a problem before exhausting its comprehensive analysis. One in whose keeping may be the decision of the Court must have a disposition to be detached and withdrawn. To be sure, these moral qualities, for such they are, are desirable in all Judges, but they are indispensable for the Supreme Court. Its task is to seize the permanent, more or less, from the feelings and fluctuations of the transient."

One could quote on endlessly but it will suffice to repeat here what he has said about Justice Cardozo, for the words must equally apply to him.

"Immense legal learning, wide cultivation beyond the bounds of law, a serene outlook and a tolerant view of his fellow men without mistaking tolerance for fuzziness of thought, intellectual courage, and a purity of heart that assured the almost automatic exercise of the two most important faculties called for in a justice—disinterestedness and humanity—equipped Cardozo to a rare degree with qualities that are the special requisites for the work of the Court in whose keeping is entrusted in no small measure the destiny of the nation."

In a nascent democracy like ours where the ruling party commands an absolute majority and the Courts are called upon to perform the delicate task of balancing the citizen's rights against the exigencies of the State, such weighty words will not only warm the hearts of the guardians of our freedom but must act as pointers in the direction from which one can swerve only at one's peril.

Mulla on the Code of Civil Procedure. Thirteenth Edition by T. L. VENKATARAMA AIYAR, B.A., B.L. Vol I. BOMBAY-2: N.M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street, 1965. Roy. 8vo. Pages 947. Price Rs. 80 for 2 volumes.

SINCE Sir Dinshah Mulla revised the 10th edition of his classical commentary, a succession of eminent jurists have brought the book up to date. The distinguished present editor, a former Judge of the Supreme Court, has brought to bear upon it his deep scholarship and long experience on the Bench. He has strictly confined himself to revising the text without altering the original framework and broad features of the work. Over a decade has passed since the last edition was published and this has necessitated considerable modifications and additions in the light of legislative changes and the new rules framed by the different High Courts and the newly established High Courts. This volume contains commentaries on the Code and Orders I to XX. The second volume will contain the remaining Orders, table of cases, index etc. This being mainly a practitioner's book some new features are introduced which will be of great practical use to the busy lawyer, namely, synopsis for the commentaries for important sections and rules and incorporation of rules of the High Courts in the body of the Code under the particular rules of which they are amendments. In a standard work which is of daily use to the profession an addenda incorporating important last minute decisions would have been welcome, in which event reference could have been made to the decision of the Supreme Court in Gulabchand v. State of Gujarat which deals with res judicata in relation to a writ petition under art. 226 of the Constitution of India. This white book on the Code which for nearly half a century has come to be recognised as an authoritative exposition of the subject will continue to instruct and inform both the Bench and the Bar. A word of praise is due to the publishers for the excellent get up of the book and its handy format.

Law of Crimes in India. Vol. I. By R. C. NIGAM, LL.B., LL.M., M.A., PH.D. BOMBAY-1: Asia Publishing House, Calicut Street, Ballard Estate. Roy. 8vo. Pages 538. Price Rs. 32.

THE author of this treatise who is Dean of the Faculty of Law, Lucknow University, has made a specialised study of criminal law and criminology. For over two decades he has lectured and written on this subject and the present work is the outcome of his study and research in this field of law. The first part of this work contains a rapid historical survey and under the rubric principles of criminal law are dealt with such topics as elements of crime, theories of criminal liability, principles and theories of punishment and executive clemency. Part two is concerned with general defences under the heads, excusable, justifiable and partial defences and a last chapter in it is devoted to some rights and protections conferred on the accused under the criminal law and the Constitution of India. A notable feature of this book is the comparative method of treatment whereby the provisions of the Indian Penal Code are considered vis-a-vis the principles obtaining under Anglo-American criminal jurisprudence with an extensive reference to English and American decisions. There are, however, a few points which need looking into when the book goes into a new edition. Explaining the meaning of life sentence the author has overlooked a decision of the Supreme Court of India in Gopal Vinayak Godse's case decided early in 1961, in the light of which his discussion of the Privy Council decision in Kishori Lal's case is now of academic interest only. Some of the statutes referred to in the book like the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889, and the Bombay Children Act, 1924, are repealed by Act XLIII of 1958 and Bom. Act LXXI of 1948, respectively, and the reference to the Indian Children Act, 1952, must presumably be to the Children Act, 1960, which latter Act applies only to Union territories. Apart from this the book can be recommended as a fairly comprehensive study of the general principles of criminal law in India.

Sarkar's Specific Relief Act. Tenth Edition. By DURGA DAS BASU, M.A., B.L. CALCUTTA-12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C College Square. Demi 8vo. Pages 494. Price Rs. 17.

THE Specific Relief Act, 1963, which came into force on March 1, 1964, has not only recast statutory law relating to specific relief in India but has incorporated some new provisions necessitated by judicial pronouncements. The editor who is the author of a standard commentary on the Constitution of India has not only explained the scope and object of each important provision of the statute but has laid bare the principles involved therein in the light of all the relevant decisions. The commentary though comprehensive is lucid, brief and to the point and by way of illustration to the provisions summaries of decided cases are given. The Addenda brings down the case law up to date and a comparative table showing the provisions of the old Act of 1877 and the new Act is included. This handy yet authoritative exposition of the Act will be of great help to the profession.

Delegated Legislation in India. Prepared under the auspices of the Indian Law Institute, New Delhi. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Limited. Royal 8vo. Pages 253. Price Rs. 15.

THE genesis of this informative and timely publication is the suggestion made at the Seminar on Administrative Law held under the auspices of the Indian Law Institute for carrying out research in the area of delegated legislation. This study incorporates the material contained in the draft prepared on the subject by Dr. V. N. Shukla, Dean of the Faculty of Law, Lucknow University, and the thesis prepared by Mr. P. L. Shrivastava on the same subject for his doctorate degree of the London University. After dealing with forms and classification of delegated legislation the study proceeds to consider the procedural safeguards subject to which the power of delegated legislation is to be exercised, wherein a suggestion is made for separate publication of such legislation. Next to be dealt with is the important topic of the constitutionality of legislative delegation in which the implications of In re Delhi Laws Act case and the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court are fully discussed. In this context are also considered the law and practice relating to the permissible limits of delegated legislation in U.S.A., Australia, Canada and South Africa. The enquiry ends with a discussion of the control exercised by the Courts and Parliament over the exercise of the law-making power of the delegate. This publication which high-lights the problem of control of delegated legislation should be pondered over by legislators who, in the words of the compilers, "seem to be indifferent to, and even unaware of, the dangers involved in giving legislative powers to the executive without keeping a watch on the way in which those powers have been exercised."

The Bombay Court Fees Act, 1959. By B. K. AMIN, Bar-at-Law. AHMEDABAD: Gujarat Law House, Bhadra. Demi 8vo. Pages 228. Price Rs. 15.

THIS is yet one more commentary on an overworked piece of legislation which has its justification in the fact that it deals with matters which are of daily reference to the lawyers. The present book is compiled with a view to making it useful to practitioners in the States of Maharashtra and Gujarat and, therefore, decisions of the High Courts at Bombay and Ahmedabad are fully discussed. The summary of the Act given in the opening pages of the book gives a bird's-eye view of its provisions. To add to its utility a table of rates of ad valorem fees prescribed by art. 1 of Sch. I is prepared, the text of the Suits Valuation Act, 1887, is given and there is a comprehensive subject-index which will facilitate reference to the required point. This book will prove itself useful to the practitioner as a vade mecum on the law of Court-fees as obtaining in the two States.

Mulla on the Sale of Goods Act and the Indian Partnership Act. Sixth Edition by KAIKOBAD SORABJI SHAYAKSHA, B.A. (OXON), of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. Roy 8vo. Pages 166. Price Rs. 7.50.

THIS book dealing with two important branches of the law of contract which has proved itself useful to generations of law students since its first appearance, incorporates the latest decisions on the subjects. The comments though brief are lucid and are supplemented with illustrations and charts for easy comprehension of the points discussed. This is par excellence a beginner's book which will give him a clear conspectus of the provisions of the Acts.

Delegated Legislation. By K. CHANDRASEKHARAN, M.A., B.L. Advocate. MADRAS: The Madras Law Journal Office, Post Box 604. Roy. 12 mo. Pages 109. Price Rs. 7.50.

IN recent years the ambit and scope of delegated legislation in India has come under much scrutiny and the result of a research conducted at the instance of the Indian Law Institute has been noticed above. The present book is based on two lectures delivered under the auspices of the Sundaram-Aiyar-Krishnaswami Aiyar Endowment donated to the Madras University by the late Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyar. The author has given a rapid survey of the development of delegated legislation in India and has shown how in England and the U.S.A. excessive executive action has been met by safeguards such as "laying" of rules and judicial control. In his exposition the author has referred to a number of important decisions bearing on the subject and has wherever necessary quoted the opinions of eminent jurists to further elucidate the points under discussion. As a lucid and brief survey of the entire field of delegated legislation this book will commend itself to serious students of law.

The Hindu Marriage Act. By A. N. SAHA, LL.B. CALCUTTA-12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons Private Ltd., 1-C College Square. Demi 8vo. Pages 183. Price Rs. 6.

CERTAIN statutes seem to attract commentators more and the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, is one of these which to date has been dissected by not a few. The present commentary follows more or less the pattern of its predecessors. The sections are explained in the light of decided cases, Indian and English, and an appendix contains Rules made by the various High Courts under the Act. As a concise statement of the law on the subject the book will be useful to the practitioner.

Hand Book of Criminal Laws. Vol. II (Minor Acts) (Central). Edited by P. C. SARKAR, Advocate, High Court, Calcutta. Third Edition. CALCUTTA-12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. Demi 8vo. Pages 1154. Price Rs. 20.

THIS book which is received about a year after its publication gives the text of some 124 important minor criminal Acts of the Central Legislature bringing these down to the year 1962. Amendments to these made during the preparation of the book have been given in an Addenda. Some of the State amendments to the various Acts are noted under the relevant sections of the Acts. In a publication of this kind a subject index would have increased the utility of the book. This collection of criminal Acts which also includes Acts containing penal provisions within the covers of a handy volume will be very useful to the lawyer practising in the criminal Courts.

The Hindu Succession Act, 1956. By K. M. PANDA, LL.B., Advocate, Sambalpur CALCUTTA-12: S. C. Sarkar & Sons Private Limited, 1-C, College Square. Demi 8vo. Pages 165. Price Rs. 6.

THIS is yet one more book published about a year ago and just received. It has added to the many other commentaries on an Act which looking to its recent enactment and shortness has caused more divergence of opinion about some of its provisions than any other newly enacted statute. Within a small compass the author has not only explained the provisions of the Act with an adequate reference to the case law but has dealt with points which are yet open to judicial pronouncement. An appendix gives a list of Scheduled Tribes in the various States to whose members the provisions of the Act are not applicable. There is also an addenda containing case law reported during the preparation of the book. This book should prove a handy and reliable guide to the law on the subject.

LITERATURE AND OBSCENITY*.

"We are always striving for things forbidden and coveting those denied to us."—Ovid.

PART I.

THE object of this article is a limited one: it is an endeavour towards a critical appreciation of the law of obscenity with regard to literature (obtaining in India) after the decision of the Supreme Court in Ranjit D. Udeshi v. The State of Maharashtra (In re Lady Chatterley's Lover, by Lawrence). In order to avoid distraction caused by foot-notes for each and every assertion made, a bibliography and citation of cases are appended at the end of the article.

Before discussing the law as laid down in Ranjit Udeshi's case by the Supreme Court a few preliminary remarks seem to be apposite. This branch of law is one of absorbing interest both to the lawyer and the layman. The writer, the artist, the sculptor, the painter, the vendor of the book, the publisher—all evince interest in this branch of law: so too does the general public. This branch of law also lends itself to curious results: a book which is eulogised in one country may be found condemned in another; the scenes of a cinematographic film which are considered to be the very essence of the theme in one country may be rigorously censored in another; dance which is an everyday ritual in one land, may be taboo in another. There is no universality in human conception of obscenity and so there is no universal standard of value judgment in this field.

It is rather difficult to admit—but, unfortunately, the fact remains—that many a time the result reached regarding the same matter will be different depending on the race and the language of the participating artists. Indeed, it is true, that the censoring authorities will not look at the matter from the point of view of language and race; they are more concerned with the impact of the scene on a receiving mind. Later on we shall see that one of the questions that agitated the mind of the Supreme Court was the repercussion of the permission given to a book written by an Englishman in English language on the regional language literatures. It cannot but be emphasized that the value judgment in this branch is of a subjective character; it necessarily consists of many variables; and the result may not always lend to uniformity.

The second point to be noted is the freedom of the writer vis-a-vis the social control necessary in any organized society. No society, whatever the political creed it may adhere to, has ever given to the individual an absolute freedom in respect of speech and expression. On one side lies the right of the artist to articulate himself—a primary human urge out of which the civilised society has received all that is of enduring benefit to humanity; on the other, over-riding all individual considerations, there is the concept of social interest for subserving which all social institutions—and the State is one such—come into being. The freedom of thought and expression will necessarily include non-conformist thought, and revolutionary ideas, ideas that are antagonistic to the current trend. How far this freedom of expression should be curbed "in the interests of...public...decency or morality" or, to put it differently, where will the dividing line be drawn between permissible and impermissible expression of thought, is not an easy thing to settle.

The third preliminary point that may be stated is that the characteristic of good law is precision; it must speak unequivocally. A citizen should know beforehand what are the permissible limits of his action. If the infraction of any rule of conduct is to be visited with penalty, that rule of conduct must be laid down in precise terms. To state the law that you may write whatever you like so long as it is not obscene, and to say that what is obscene in a given case is what the Court will deem to be obscene, may be anything, but it is not a prior statement of permissible limitation.

The three preliminary points may be summed up thus:

(1) Human conception of obscenity is a variable one: in a given society at a given point of time it ought to be fairly ascertainable.

(2) An individual's right to the freedom of speech and expression is a sacred one, but overriding all his rights there lies a conception of social interest which necessarily curbs such freedom.

(3) Law which impinges upon an individual's right must be specific; it must be ascertainable today on the spot and not through a painful process of judicial determination.

PART II.

We shall now try to read the various implications of the judgment of the Supreme Court of India in the case of Ranjit D. Udeshi v. The State of Maharashtra. The judgment of the Supreme Court is important in many respects. It is the first case of its kind to reach the Supreme Court. The book impugned, Lady Chatterley's Lover and its author, D. H. Lawrence, are well-known in the literary world. It was for the first time that the constitutional validity of s. 292 of the Penal Code was challenged as infringing the freedom guaranteed in art. 19(1)(a). The judgment is notable for erudite scholarship and broad human sympathy towards the writer and the artist. Yet, with all this, the law laid down by the Supreme Court has not been that clear-cut as it generally is in the judgments of this Court.

The test of obscenity.—The main headache in this branch of law arises because of the absence of any definition of the word "obscene" in the Penal Code. This lacuna was supposed to have been made good by the Courts in India by importing the now famous definition laid down by Cockburn C. J. in Regina v. Hicklin as follows:

"...the test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall..."

The test, it may be stated, has been uniformly applied in India. It now stands condemned in America, and in England, its native place, it has been replaced by a more sober and accurate definition contained in the Obscene Publications Act, 1959.

The test is vulnerable from many angles. No one will admit that he himself will be corrupted by reading any sort of book—he is, indeed, too sane for that! But the puritanical urge is that it must not corrupt others; and who are these "others"? According to the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn they are "those whose minds are open to such immoral influences". In India, this test has varied: sometimes he (the person whose mind is open to such immoral influences) is an ordinary individual, a person neither of exceptional susceptibility nor without any susceptibility at all. In others, adolescents have been roped in on the specious ground that such persons are also likely to read the impugned book and, if so, the effect of the publication on their minds cannot be eliminated.

The test talks of the 'tendency' and when this is judged not by jury but by the Magistrates or the Judges, it becomes the 'tendency' which they in their wisdom think the book will have on the average person or even on the adolescent. Accordingly, there is no scope for determination of any contemporary community standard. The subjective opinion, therefore, dominates the field. Its weakness is the non-availability of prior ascertainment.

The Supreme Court held that the test of obscenity laid down by Cockburn C. J. in The Queen v. Hicklin, should not be discarded. Their Lordships said:-

It makes the Court the judge of obscenity in relation to an impugned book...and lays emphasis on the potentiality of the impugned object to deprave and corrupt by immoral influences. It will always remain a question to decide in each case and it does not compel an adverse decision in all cases. (Italics are mine).

In another context the present writer pointed out that so long as the law remains as it is, ultimately it will be for the Judges to say whether a particular book is obscene or not. The exercise of the judicial function, it was stated, will have to be discharged on a case-by-case basis, and howsoever onerous or ungrateful the task, the Judge cannot escape an instance-by-instance examination of cases. There is no talismanic formula of general applicability.

Unfortunately, this does not meet the charge so ably made by Mr. Justice Black in Kingsley Corporation v. Regents of University of New York, in connection with the same book, Lady Chatterley's Lover, but in respect of a motion picture of it. Said he:

So far as I know, judges possess no expertise providing exceptional competency to set standards and supervise the private morals of the nation...Under these circumstances, every member of the Court must exercise his own judgment as to how bad a picture is, a judgment which is ultimately based at least in large part on his own standards of what is moral. The end result of such decisions seems to me to be a purely personal determination of individual justices as to whether a particular picture viewed is too bad to allow it to be seen by the public. (Italics are mine).

The remarks apply with equal force in the case of books and the case by case determination, which, in their Lordships opinion, "does not compel an adverse decision in all cases". The attack is not that the judicial determination will always compel an adverse decision, but that the judicial determination of obscenity may not coincide with the general public notion or, to put it in other words, the contemporary community standard and judicial determination may not square. Be it noted, however, that it is no fault of the Judges that they are saddled with this thankless task. The duty, however unfortunate, falls on them until the Legislature deems it fit to change the law.

Had the Supreme Court stopped after agreeing with the test as laid down by Cockburn C. J. nothing much could be said against it, howsoever one might have regretted such concurrence on the part of the Supreme Court. But the Supreme Court laid down two other points which deserve careful study and analysis. The first point is as follows:

The test of obscenity to adopt in India (regard being had to community mores) is that obscenity without a preponderating social purpose or profit cannot have the Constitutional protection of free speech and expression and obscenity is treating with sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature, or having that tendency. Such a treating with sex is offensive to modesty and decency but the extent of such appeal in a particular book etc. are matters for consideration in each individual case. (Italics mine).

According to the present writer the following propositions are deducible from the foregoing test:

(1) In a book where there is found a treatment of sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature or having that tendency, it will be considered obscene. Such a treating with sex is offensive to morality and decency.

(2) The extent of such appeal should be judged case-wise.

(3) To claim constitutional protection in such a case it must be shown that there was a preponderating social purpose or benefit.

It is submitted, with respect, that the test has become unduly harsh. All treatment of sex which appeals to the carnal side of human nature or which has such a tendency has come into the net. To claim constitutional protection, only a preponderating social purpose or benefit will avail. This will undoubtedly protect literature on medical or social sciences, but will it protect novels, dramas, short stories and the like? Are we now to have a new dimension in literary writing and that is that it must subserve some social purpose, or must look at some social interest or be motivated by some public good. Will a writer's own urge signify nothing: Does the social purpose become so paramount that deeply felt convictions cannot be articulated? George Meredith said: If it is deeply conceived it cannot be immoral. And who will be the arbiter of the fact that the particular work—novel, poem or drama—does possess a preponderating social purpose? Undoubtedly, a writer is free so long as he does not tread in the field of sex—indeed he may eliminate sex from his writing. But even a cursory look at the post war literature will show how unpleasantly dominated it has become by themes on sex, with all its perversions, and of terror and violence. No reasonable person can look with equanimity on the continuous inroads these themes are making today: the world has become a much less pleasant place and the realities of life much too harsh. Will it come to this then that the Court will stop all such writings? If so, something will be gained, but alas, something will also be lost in the process.

Another thing to be noted is that "treating with sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature" is too vague a term. In a literary work sex, generally speaking, is interwoven with other human passions and sentiments, senses and sensibilities. What type of dealing with sex will be appealing to the carnal side of human nature is difficult to speculate; it will vary from person to person. Some may dislike any reference to sex at all; others may not mind even candid delineations. It will again lead to the same subjective determination by the magistrate in the first instance: Is this book really dealing with sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature?

Let us now go to consider the second passage:

In this connection (i.e. in connection with judging the matter impugned) the interests of our contemporary society and particularly the influence of the book etc. on it must not be overlooked. A number of considerations may here enter which it is not necessary to enumerate, but we must draw attention to one fact. Today our national and regional languages are strengthening themselves by new literary standards after a deadening period under the impact of English. Emulation by our writers of an obscene book under the aegis of this Court's determination is likely to pervert our entire literature because obscenity pays and true art finds little popular support. (Italics mine).

The above passage goes to emphasize the incidence of the subjective element in determination of obscenity. The Supreme Court has done nothing startling: it has only stated categorically some of the grounds which necessarily go into the Court's value judgment.

We began with Hicklin test which asked the judge or the jury to consider the effect of the impugned book on persons whose minds are open to immoral influences in depraving or corrupting them. This was also a subjective determination dependent upon many variables. But the test itself was rather simple. The Judge, the Magistrate or the jury had to read the book, and if, in their opinion, it would tend to deprave or corrupt those into whose hands it would be likely to fall, they would condemn it. Now if we read the two passages quoted above from the judgment of the Supreme Court what do we get? The process today will be as follows:

The Magistrate

(a) will have to see whether the book treats with sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature and ascertain the extent of such appeal or tendency;

[Any two magistrates may differ whether the book appeals to the carnal side of human nature or not.]

(b) will have to take cognisance of the interests of the contemporary society by ascertaining the influence of the work on it;

[The fashionable society of Bombay, Delhi or Calcutta may wink at many things which will not pass muster in a mofussil town and the findings of the authorities as regards the effect of the book on contemporary societies may be different regard being had to the locale and the social climate.]

(c) will have to take note of many other considerations;

[The Supreme Court does not mention all these considerations, but emphasises one of them. This is a dangerous innovation and a prehensile one too; no one can now state what other points the magistrate may take into consideration.]

(d) will have to ascertain whether the passing of the book by him may have the effect of evoking emulative spirit in the regional language or Hindi literature to their detriment; and

[This is not only an imponderable but it also creates other difficulties. Will a Bengali authority pass a book thinking that its effect on Bengali literature would not be harmful whereas an authority in the Punjab may think it otherwise with regard to the Punjabi literature? By the way, will the authorities be at all cognisant about the growth of the regional literatures or, for the matter of that, of the national language literature?]

(e) will have to see whether it has a claim to a preponderating social purpose or interest.

One would almost surely say that the previous test was, in fact, much better. It was not satisfactory, but, at least, it was simple. The present test is neither satisfactory, nor is it simple.

Dominant theme test.—The defence on the ground of dominant theme has scarcely been advanced in India but the argument of part obscenity has always been rejected by the Courts here. The general nature of the argument is that the Court should not be astute enough to rest its judgment on some stray passages here and there in the book. In other words incidental intrusion of obscenity should not invite judicial stricture on the whole book.

On this aspect the Supreme Court again has not been very clear. There has been a noticeable softening of attitude in that it was stated that a stray word or an insignificant passage will not suffice. But the real rule was laid down as under:

An overall view of the obscene matter in the setting of the whole work would, of course, be necessary, but the obscene matter must be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so decided that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influences of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall.

This is an improvement from the previous state of affairs, though the law remains still harsh.

Mens rea.—As usual, mens rea was negatived and the rule of strict liability invoked. This was done on the ground of the difficulty to obtain legal evidence of the offender's knowledge and also on the ground that s. 292, Indian Penal Code, did not make knowledge an ingredient of the offence. The argument that a bookseller may be just an innocent vendor, he having neither the time nor any ability to go through numerous publications, was negatived stating that the Court had to administer the law as it found it, and if there was any exception to be made, it was for the Parliament to do so. The law against obscenity has always imposed strict liability and their Lordships confirmed the old view in this respect. Their Lordships were also in agreement with the view that such absence of knowledge may be taken into consideration in mitigation of sentence.

In this aspect the law remains the same as before.

The problem of scienter, that is knowingly doing an act, was only slightly referred to but no statement of law was made.

Expert evidence.—As for expert evidence the Court said that on behalf of the accused Mr. Mulkraj Anand, a writer and art critic, gave evidence, and in a detailed analysis of the novel, he sought to establish that inspite of its apparent indelicate theme and the candidness of its delineation and diction, the novel was a work of considerable literary merit and a classic and not obscene. Their Lordships then stated that the question did not altogether depend on oral evidence because the offending novel and the portions which were the object of the charge had to be judged by the Court in the light of s. 292, Indian Penal Code, and the provisions of the Constitution.

There is nothing sacrosanct about expert evidence and, in any event, it is for the Court to come to its conclusion whether a particular book is obscene or not. But what is objected to by the present writer is not the rejection of the analysis made by Dr. Anand—the Court had every right to reject it—but the arrival at its own conclusions after an elaborate study of many critics of Lawrence. In Regina v. Penguin Books Ltd. (the same book, Lady Chatterley's Lover was involved there), before Mr. Justice Byrne at the Old Bailey were arrayed 70 experts for the defence—eleven of them were from the world of education, ten were editors or art critics, four were clergymen including one bishop, three were writers, three were publishers, one was a psychologist, one a barrister-editor, one a Member of Parliament (author of the Act of 1959) and various others. They supported the book unanimously, a striking thing considering the divergence of opinion that generally prevails in the literary world and specially with regard to obscene matters. It will be wrong to state that their Lordships of the Supreme Court should have taken into consideration these opinions. But, it is respectfully submitted, that their Lordships should also not have considered the opinions quoted by them in the body of the judgment. If one was irrelevant, so was the other. Particularly unfortunate is the reference to Middleton Murray.

Nor is it understood what purpose is served by diagnosing the motive of Lawrence in writing the book. Their Lordships stated that Lawrence had a dual purpose in writing the book. It is respectfully submitted that motive or purpose of an author is an extraneous consideration. If the book be in fact obscene, the purpose of the author, howsoever laudable, will not save it; on the other hand, if the book is innocuous, the purpose of the author, howsoever reprehensible, will not affect it. Lawrence undoubtedly had his detractors, probably still he has some. But he had also people who appreciated his writings and still do. The opinions of neither are relevant.

Plea of public good.—This plea unfortunately was not raised and their Lordships consequently did not opine on the subject as to whether the book could claim exemption on the ground of public good. The categories of exemption in England runs thus: "If it is proved that publication of the article in question is justified as being for the public good on the ground that it is in the interests of science, literature, art or learning, or of other objects of general concern" then no one should be convicted with regard to such publication. To be frank, in India such a broad category of exemption is not statutorily available nor has the judicial determination been so flexible. But the statement made by their Lordships may presage a better deal in the future if, and only if, 'public good' is construed broadly. The Court stated:

It may, however, be pointed out that one may have to consider a plea that the publication was for public good. This bears on the question whether the book etc. can in those circumstances be regarded as obscene. It is necessary to bear in mind that this may raise nice points of the claims of society to suppress obscenity and the claims of society to allow free speech. No such plea has been raised in this case but we mention it to draw attention to the fact that this may lead to different results in different cases.

It is rather unfortunate that this point was not raised, particularly as the contention of the defence in England was exactly on that ground.

Art and obscenity.—Some remarks of the Court are both interesting and instructive on this point. The Court said:

The laying down of the true test is not rendered any the easier because art has such varied facets and such individualistic appeals that in the same object the insensitive sees only obscenity because his attention is arrested, not by general or artistic appeal or message which he cannot comprehend, but what he can see, and the intellectual sees beauty and art and nothing gross... where obscenity and art are mixed, art must be so preponderating as to throw the obscenity into a shadow or the obscenity so trivial and insignificant that it can have no effect and may be overlooked.

Such a brave statement on the appreciation of art in the former part and the statement of the law in the latter brings out the inner conflict: Whether art is preponderating or obscenity, is a determination of the receiving mind, the mind which their Lordships themselves state may be sensitive and, therefore, receptive of the aesthetic values, or insensitive and, therefore, receptive of the gross. The nemesis of subjective appreciation is always there. Yet, the sentiments are admirably stated and the problem is not minimised.

Constitutional validity of section 292, Penal Code.—This was upheld on the ground that the restraint imposed by the section did not travel outside the limitations of reasonable restriction put on the exercise of the right of freedom in the interests of public decency and morality as envisaged in art. 19(2) of the Constitution.

Pornography and obscenity.—Incidentally their Lordships brought out the difference between obscenity and pornography. The latter, according to the Supreme Court, denoted writings, pictures, etc. intended to arouse sexual desires, while the former may include writings etc. not intended to do so but which have that tendency. Both offend against public decency but pornography is obscenity in a more aggravated form.

We have seen above the law as it now stands after the judgment pronounced by the Supreme Court. It cannot but be stated that the state of law is unsatisfactory and the decision of the Supreme Court has not improved matters much. Reform in any branch of law is a tedious and time consuming affair. It becomes necessary for many over a period to think, discuss and agitate matters so that the Legislature may move in reforming the law. It is always easy to let things run their course: it is always difficult to bring in a new approach. Yet, all changes worth having are also worth the sacrifice that they entail.

NON-LIABILITY OF THE STATE FOR ITS TORTS.*

Two years after the Supreme Court in *The State of Rajasthan v. Mst. Vidhyawati*¹ unceremoniously rejected the theory of sovereign immunity of the State for tortious actions as "feudalistic" and inapplicable to our Republican Constitution, the Court in *Kasturi Lal v. State of U.P.*² has held that the State is not liable for the tortious actions of its employees if such actions are the exercise of sovereign powers of the State. In Vidhyawati's case the Court held that:

"Viewing the case from the point of view of first principles, there should be no difficulty in holding that the State should be as much liable for tort in respect of a tortious act committed by its servant within the scope of his employment and functioning as such as any other employer. The immunity of the Crown in the United Kingdom, was based on the old feudalistic notions of Justice, namely, that the King was incapable of doing a wrong and, therefore, of authorising or instigating one, and that he could not be sued in his own courts. In India, ever since the time of the East India Company the sovereign has been held liable to be sued in tort or in contract and the Common Law immunity never operated in India. Now that we have by our Constitution established a Republican form of Government and one of the objectives is to establish a Socialistic State with its varied industrial and other activities, employing a large army of servants, there is no justification, in principle, or in public interest, that the State should not be held liable vicariously for the tortious act of its servant." (p. 1007).

Justifiably, counsel for the appellant in Kasturi Lal's case, relying on Vidhyawati's case, contended that his claim against the State for damages for the loss caused by the misappropriation by a police constable of gold seized from him could not be defeated on the plea that the seizure was an action in exercise of Sovereign powers. The Supreme Court, whilst conceding that there were certain observations made in Vidhyawati's case which supported counsel's submission, reviewed the position in law and held that, subject to any law which the competent legislature may make hereafter, Government could be sued for the tortious actions of its servants only where such actions could not be attributed to the exercise of Sovereign powers of the State. Such a result in the Court's opinion followed from art. 300 of the Constitution which read with similar provisions in the previous Constitutional Acts governing India down to s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, equated the liability of Government to be sued to like cases in which the East India Company could be sued. The historical accident of the East India Company, being a company to whom Sovereign powers were delegated and which was engaged in transactions partly for the purpose of Government and partly on their own account without any delegation of Sovereign powers, gave rise to a two-fold distinction in its liability to be sued viz: for acts done in the exercise of what are termed Sovereign powers and acts done in the conduct of undertakings which might be carried on by private individuals without having such powers delegated to them. The same dual nature of liability attached to the State under our Constitution by reason of the "pedigree" of art. 300, with the result that the State could not be sued for the tortious acts which were carried out in exercise of its Sovereign powers. To the extent of this finding in Kasturi Lal's case the decision of the Court in Vidhyawati's case must now no longer be considered good law. The ghost of the East India Company thus stalks the Republican Constitution of India of 1950.

In arriving at this conclusion, the Supreme Court placed exclusive reliance on the decision of Peacock, C. J. of the Calcutta Supreme Court in *P. & O. S. N. Co. v. Secy. of State for India*³ decided in 1861 and on a "few representative decisions" which in the opinion of the Court had followed this decision. The P. & O. case made a distinction in liability of the E. I. Co. between its trading activities and its activities for the purposes of Government and it held that in respect of the former the E. I. Co. was always liable to be sued and in respect of the latter the E. I. Co. could not be sued. The crucial dicta in the P. & O. judgment which received from the Supreme Court the tribute of being a "classic statement" was the following (p. 14):

"...where an act is done, or a contract is entered into, in the exercise of powers usually called sovereign powers, by which we mean powers which cannot be lawfully exercised except by a sovereign, or private individual delegated by a sovereign to exercise them, no action will lie".

In Kasturi Lal's case the Supreme Court held that in the case before it the appellant could not maintain a suit against the State for the recovery of gold seized from him whilst he was arrested by police officers, as his arrest and seizure of gold were under statutory powers which "in the last analysis" were powers which could properly be characterised as Sovereign powers. The Court thus stated an unqualified proposition that the E. I. Co. and its successors would only be liable (in tort) if their actions were not in exercise of Sovereign powers. Finally, the Court observed that this doctrine of immunity was based on the common law principle that the King could do no wrong and even in England that principle had been abrogated by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947. The Court felt oppressed that such an immunity should prevail now in India under the Constitution and exhorted the legislatures in India to seriously consider whether they should not pass legislative enactments to regulate and control the state's claim from immunity on the same lines as the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947.

It is unfortunate that the Court accepted the above-mentioned dicta in the P. & O. case as the principle enunciated in that case. It is also unfortunate that the Court was influenced by a mistaken belief that the principle which it had extracted from the P. & O. judgment had been uniformly followed in India. It is submitted that had the Court critically examined the P. & O. decision it would have found that the dicta was without foundation in constitutional law, and in the form in which the proposition was stated in the P. & O. judgment and approved by the Supreme Court it was contrary to earlier and later judgments of the Privy Council and had been dissented from by later decisions in India.

First, no immunity for actions of the Crown which are attributable to the exercise of sovereign powers simpliciter exists or ever existed in the U.K. The immunity of the Crown (till the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947) for the tortious actions and breaches of contract by its employees was based not on any theory of sovereign powers but on the theory that the King could do no wrong and could not authorise another to commit a wrong. The P. & O. judgment did not state that the basis of the immunity of the E.I. Co. for actions in exercise of its sovereign powers was the theory that the King can do no wrong as the Supreme Court in Kasturi Lal's case mistakenly assumes.⁴ On the contrary the P. & O. judgment expressly repudiates that this is the basis of the immunity of the E.I. Co. and rejects cases based on this theory as apposite for the case under its consideration. Nothing can be clearer than repeated statements to this effect in the judgment, the most striking of which is,

"In determining the question whether the East India Company would, under the circumstances, have been liable to an action, the general principles applicable to Sovereigns and States, and the reasoning deduced from the maxim of the English law that the King can do no wrong, would have no force ... the fact of the Company's having invested with powers usually called sovereign powers did not constitute them sovereigns" (p. 9).

This mistaken assumption of the Supreme Court of the basis of the immunity of the E.I. Co. for its actions in exercise of sovereign powers accounts for its finding that the E.I. Co. was not liable for all of its actions in the exercise of its sovereign powers. Further, closer examination of the P. & O. judgment would reveal that though Peacock C.J. made a distinction between the class of acts which a private individual or a trading corporation can perform and those which can be performed by a sovereign power, what the case actually decided was that the particular act which the Court was considering fell within the former category. Whether the Company or its successor could be sued in cases not connected with the conduct of a business or commercial undertaking was not in issue before the Court.⁵

It is submitted that the only valid basis of the immunity for acts of the E.I. Co. and its successors in the P. & O. judgment is for acts done in the exercise of sovereign powers which do not profess to be justified by municipal law i.e. acts of State. The expression "act of State" is defined for general purposes as an act done by the State as a matter of policy in relation to a foreign State or in relation to an individual who is not within the allegiance of the State. In truth, as one text book puts it, all that the State does in the sphere of foreign affairs falls within the category of acts of State.⁶

There can, therefore, be no act of State between the State and a person within its allegiance.⁷ The cases cited in the P. & O. judgment in support of the non-liability of the E.I. Co. viz., *Nabob of Carnatic v. East India Co.*⁸ and *Elphinstone v. Bedreechund*⁹ are typical cases of acts of State. In cases of acts of State the doctrine that the King can do no wrong has no application. The non-liability of the State arises not because the act was not actionable in law but because a municipal Court can have no jurisdiction to declare it as such.

If the P. & O. case is an authority for the proposition that the E.I. Co. was only liable for such of its acts as were outside its sovereign powers, then (apart from the fact that, as stated above, this theory is unfounded in constitutional law) the proposition is manifestly contrary to earlier and later Privy Council cases which have explained the liability of the E.I. Co. in the exercise of its sovereign powers. In The Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamachee Boye Sahaba,¹⁰ a leading case on the nature of an act of State, the Privy Council was concerned with the seizure of the Raj of Tanjore by the E.I. Co. The Privy Council posed the question before it thus (p. 77):

"The next question is, what was the real character of the act done in this case? Was it a seizure by arbitrary power on behalf of the Crown of Great Britain of the dominions and the property of a neighbouring State, an act not affecting to justify itself on grounds of Municipal law? or was it, in whole or in part, a possession taken by the Crown under colour of legal title of the property of the late Rajah of Tanjore ... If it were the latter the defence set up, of course, has no foundation."

The Privy Council further stated (p. 76):

"...The careful and able review of the several Charters and Acts of Parliament bearing upon the subject which they had the advantage of hearing at the Bar, has satisfied them that the law as it stood in the year 1839, is accurately stated in the following passage in the judgment of the Chief Justice Tindal in the case of Gibson v. The East India Company" in which after referring to various legislative enactments he observes that from these—"It is manifest that the East India Company have been invested with powers and privileges of a twofold nature, perfectly distinct from each other; namely, powers to carry on trade as merchants ... and power to acquire and retain and govern territory, to raise and maintain armed forces by sea and land, and to make peace or war with the native powers of India." That acts done in the execution of these Sovereign powers were not subject to the control of Municipal Courts, either of India or Great Britain, was sufficiently established by the cases of the Nabob of Arcot v. The East India Company in the Court of Chancery in the year 1793 and the East India Company v. Syed Ally before the Privy Council in 1827."

The Privy Council held that the property had been seized by the East India Company acting as a sovereign power and the act so done with its consequences was an act of State over which the Court had no jurisdiction.

Next, the case of *Forrester v. Secretary of State for India in Council*¹² decided in 1872 is clear authority that not all acts of the East India Company in exercise of their sovereign powers are outside the jurisdiction of Courts. There, the plaintiff sued to recover an estate which had originally belonged to Begum Sumroo and to which the plaintiff claimed title. The Company resisted the suit on the ground that the Begum was an independent or quasi-independent sovereign and the resumption and seizure were acts of State whose propriety was not cognizable by any Municipal Court. The Privy Council, having found that the Begum was not a Sovereign, overruled the plea holding that the resumption was taken under colour of legal title, the title being the undoubted right of the sovereign power to resume lands held rent free.

The clearest exposition and correction of the scope of the non-liability of the East India Company and its successors was given in 1882 in an admirable judgment by Chief Justice Turner in *The Secretary of State for India v. Hari Bhanji*¹³ where the Madras High Court dissenting from the Calcutta High Court in *Nobin Chunder Dey v. The Secretary of State for India*¹⁴ held that where an act complained of is professedly done under the sanction of Municipal law and in the exercise of powers conferred by that law the fact that it is done by the sovereign power and is not an act which could possibly be done by a private individual does not oust the jurisdiction of civil Courts. The Madras decision in Hari Bhanji's case has been followed subsequently, and was endorsed by Mukherjea J. of the Supreme Court in *Province of Bombay v. Kushaldas Advani*¹⁵ with these words:

"The liability of the East India Company to be sued was not restricted altogether to claims arising out of undertakings which might be carried on by private persons but other claims if not arising out of acts of State could be entertained by Civil Courts, if the acts were done under sanction of Municipal law and in exercise of powers conferred by such law."

From the aspect of contracts by the State the Privy Council in *Venkata Rao v. Secretary of State for India*¹⁶ expressed a prima facie view that "it did not think s. 32 of the Government of India Act, 1915 had "an effect to limit or bar the right of action against Government which would otherwise be enforceable by action against it merely because an identical right of action did not exist at the date when the East India Company was the body, if any, to be sued."

The proposition that the liability of East India Company to be sued was restricted to actions in exercise of non-sovereign powers was not adopted in other cases also.¹⁷

This formidable body of legal opinion finds no mention in Kasturi Lal's case. On the contrary the Court erroneously believed that the principle of the P. & O. judgment had been uniformly followed. The Supreme Court relied on a single Privy Council case, viz: *Secretary of State for India v. Moment*¹⁸ and six High Court cases¹⁹ as "representative decisions" in India. As to Moment's case, contrary to the Court's statement, there is no "express approval" of the principles in P. & O. case at all. In that case the Privy Council held that s. 41(b) of the Burma Act IV of 1898 which deprived a Civil Court from having jurisdiction to determine any claim to any right over land against Government was ultra vires as being in contravention of s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, as a suit of that character would have lain against the East India Company for the reasons explained in the P. & O. judgment. There was no discussion at all on the liability of the East India Company qua its sovereign and non-sovereign functions. Indeed, the reported arguments show that the liability of the East India Company to be sued for a claim over land was not at all disputed and, therefore, there was no question at all as to what were the actions for which the East India Company could not have been sued. As for the six High Court decisions, it is difficult to say that they subscribe to the proposition that the E. I. Co. and its successors could only be sued for its non-sovereign functions with the possible exception of The Secretary of State v. Cockcroft.²⁰ These decisions can hardly be called "representative" in view of the above mentioned Privy Council decisions, the observations of Mukherjea

J. of the Supreme Court on the point and other decisions of High Courts in India.

It is most likely that had the correct basis of the non-liability of the East India Company been highlighted in Kasturi Lal's case, and the above mentioned decisions of the Privy Council and several High Courts and the observations of Mukherjea J. in Advani's case been cited, a different view of the State's immunity would have been arrived at, viz. that the State is only immune in municipal Courts for its acts of State. In the result, the Court's invitation and exhortation to the legislatures to step in would have been quite unnecessary. It is learnt that Parliament is shortly introducing a bill to remedy the situation arising from Kasturi Lal's case. Such a law will inevitably result in further litigation as it is likely to contain a large number of reservations of non-liability in favour of the State. One cannot help feeling that the citizen might conceivably have been spared this result if Kasturi Lal's case had been presented in all its aspects before the Supreme Court. Is it, one may hazard to ask, too late for a reargument?

GLEANNINGS.

TRADITIONS OF THE BAR

It has been the practice in our Courts, though honoured more in the breach, for an advocate to appear in a friendly capacity on behalf of a brother advocate in a litigation in which the latter is personally involved. There is also the common spectacle of the desperate struggles made to get rid of such a reluctantly accepted assignment on the ground of a last minute materialisation of a part-heard matter or the sudden appearance of a case on Board. One dreads to think what chance a poor litigant has in such a set up. The following incident culled from the life of Norman Birkett by H. Montgomery Hyde will at least provide to the victim of such unprofessional conduct, a heartening thought, albeit a poor consolation, that in some quarters the ethics of the profession are not forgotten in the rat race after lucre.

A prisoner was put up at the Lincoln Assizes on a charge of shooting with intent to kill a gamekeeper who had caught him poaching. On entering the dock, the poacher, who apparently had the sum of £1 3s. 6d. with him, asked the judge if he could have a 'dock defence'.

The judge, who was Mr. Justice Sankey, signified his assent, whereupon the prisoner looked round the court room and promptly picked out Birkett. 'I'd like him', he said.

'Mr. Birkett', said the judge, 'I know you are very busy. Would you like to be excused?'

'No, my Lord', Birkett replied. 'I think it is my duty in accordance with the traditions of the Bar to accept'.

When Birkett later telephoned his clerk, Bowker, in London to say that he would not be returning next day as he was staying on in Lincoln for a 'docker', Bowker was furious, since they were snowed under with work in chambers at the time, and the clerk had to cancel various appointments.

The case lasted the rest of the day and the best part of the following day. But Birkett had the satisfaction of getting the charge reduced to one of unlawful wounding, so that his client received a sentence of six months' imprisonment instead of a term of penal servitude.

PRISONER'S RIGHT TO A SEAT AT HIS TRIAL

PRISONERS of all kinds often showed signs of great emotional stress when they went into the dock, and Birkett (later Lord Birkett of Ulverston) took the humane view that as a rule they ought to be allowed to be seated except at certain solemn moments in the trial such as when they were called on to plead to the charge and during the giving of the verdict and passing of sentence. While this is the general rule today, at the time in question the more old-fashioned among His Majesty's judges opposed it. On one occasion, when Birkett was defending a railway time-keeper charged with forgery at Nottingham Assizes, and the case had proceeded for some time, he asked the judge, Mr. Justice Horridge, if his client might be seated in the dock.

'Why?' inquired his Lordship sharply.

'I think the prisoner is under some strain', Birkett replied.

'Not unless there is some special reason', the judge rejoined. 'We are getting really too delicate in our habits towards people who are being tried'.

The result was that, when the judge came to pass sentence—six months' hard labour—the prisoner fainted in the dock and had to be revived and assisted below.

This incident had an interesting sequel at the next assize town, which was Derby. Here another circuit member, Maurice Healy, made a similar application on behalf of the prisoner, which the judge again refused. But he allowed Healy to argue it, which that witty and urbane Irishman did with courage as well as courtesy. Birkett was greatly impressed by Healy's masterly argument, as indeed was the whole Circuit Mess including the Clerk of Assize.

The prisoner comes to the bar as an innocent man and is to be regarded as an innocent man. He is entitled not only to every right but to every privilege which is granted to every other person in court. When your Lordship comes into court we all stand up because your Lordship represents the Majesty of the King, and when your Lordship sits down we are all allowed, by that courtesy, to resume our seats in such ease as enable us to perform our respective duties, and I submit that that courtesy should be extended as much to an unconvicted prisoner as to anybody in court.

I am extremely sorry that I should make a demand which is unpleasant to your Lordship, but there is something which all counsel must do, and that is that they should have courage in defending the rights and in defending the liberties of their clients, and the constitution of this country has never been more jealous than in pruning all relics of harsh and cruel treatment of prisoners. For these reasons I submit that as a matter of right the prisoner, unless there is danger of his escape, should be allowed to be seated. At first Mr. Justice Horridge was adamant, but after Healy had opened his case and called one or two witnesses, the judge relented and allowed the prisoner to have a chair. Nor, it must be admitted, did he bear any malice in the matter, either towards Healy or Birkett. And the fact remains that from the date of these incidents, which received fairly wide publicity, the invariable practice of every trial judge has been to direct that the prisoner be seated immediately after he has been 'given in charge' of the jury. Lord Nottingham's 'Manual of Chancery Practice' and 'Prolegomena of Chancery and Equity'. Edited by D. E. C. YALE, Fellow of Christ's College and Lecturer in Law in the University of Cambridge. BOMBAY-1: Macmillan & Co., Ltd., 276 Dr. Dadabhoy Naoroji Road. LONDON N. W. 1: Cambridge University Press, Bentley House, 200 Euston Road, 1965. Roy. 12 mo. Pages/385. Price 57s. 6d. net (Rs. 46).

LORD Nottingham, known as the Father of Modern Equity and who was Lord Chancellor from 1673 to 1682, had besides his Chancery Reports prepared two treatises, one on Chancery practice in his day and the other an exposition of rules of Equity as they existed when he first held the Great Seal. These latter which Lord Nottingham prepared for his private use and study now see the light of day after nearly three centuries of neglect. In a scholarly introduction, the editor, who has made a specialised study of the noble Lord's processes of thought, has discussed at some length the procedure and process in the Chancery Court against the historical background so as to offer an account of some of the significant features of the exposition in the treatises. This recent addition to the Cambridge Studies in English Legal History will be invaluable to students of the history of English Equity and must find a place on the shelf of every well-equipped law library.

The Law of Specific Relief. By Prof. G. C. VENKATA SUBBARAO, B.SC., M.L., Advocate. First Edition. 1965. MADRAS 4: The Madras Law Journal, Post Box 604. Roy. 8vo. Pages 720. Price Rs. 25.

THE Specific Relief Act, 1963, which replaced the Act of 1877, was passed as a result of the recommendations made by the Law Commission in 1958. By this Act many vital changes have been effected apart from clearing up doubts and difficulties in the pre-existing law. A reappraisal of the law in the light of statutory changes and judicial decisions was therefore necessary and the present book eminently supplies that desideratum. The author who is a well-known jurist with nearly two decades of teaching experience behind him is well fitted for his task in dealing with a complex subject which intersects different branches of substantive law. After setting out the bare text of the Act, the author has critically examined its provisions topicwise under different headings and sub-headings. The Indian case law is dealt with exhaustively and for a clearer exposition of the principles underlying the sections of the Act liberal extracts are given from the judgments of the English and Indian Courts. To add to the utility of the book some very useful material is provided in the Appendix which includes a discussion on the validity of s. 42 of the Act, recent Indian and foreign case-law bearing on the subject and Forms of Pleadings and Decrees. This book which has been highly commended by Mr. Koka Subbarao, an eminent Judge of the Supreme Court of India, will take its place as a standard work on this difficult branch of law.

The Law of Hire-Purchase in India and England. By BHAWANI SHANKAR CHOWDHURY, M.A., LL.B., Advocate. CALCUTTA-13: Eastern Law House Private Ltd., 54 Ganesh Chandra Avenue. Demi 8vo. Pages 332. Price Rs. 15.

THE English Hire-Purchase Acts of 1938 and 1954 came to be passed inter alia "to establish a minimum standard of fair dealing between owners and hirers". In India with the rapid growth of industry hire-purchase transactions are coming to the fore and in the absence of any statutory law on the subject, the law applicable to such transactions has to be gathered from different sources. This book provides a reliable guide to the study of hire-purchase law in India with a detailed examination of the English law on the subject. Of particular interest to lawyers will be reports of some dozen leading English decisions bearing on the subject, model form of a hire-purchase agreement and other forms and pleadings based on standard English precedents and the texts of the English Acts. For the high standard of a Tagore Law lectureship aspired to by the author and the suitability of the book for "some academic distinction" as recommended in a foreword by the Chief Justice of West Bengal, he would have been well advised to include the decision of the Supreme Court in Damodar Valley Corporation v. State of Bihar, (1961) 12 S.T.C. 102, where the Court at some length has considered the essential features of a hire-purchase agreement. There is also an illuminating recent decision of the High Court at Bombay in Commercial Credit Corp. Ltd. v. State (67 Bom. L.R. 138) which lays down tests for the determination of a hire-purchase agreement. This however is a commendable effort to present in a refreshingly original manner the law on a subject of ever-growing importance and some of the author's suggestions deserve serious consideration.

First Steps in Advocacy. By LEO PAGE of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

ADVOCACY or the art of persuasion is of ancient lineage deriving as it does from the great orators of antiquity. In more recent times this art had come to full fruition in British Courts where the names of such eminent advocates as Carson, Birkenhead and Marshall Hall are still fresh within living memory. Perfection is rare in such an art but as in other arts there is always an endeavour to attain the ideal. This little book which has established itself as a standard work for nearly two decades, puts the neophyte on the right path to the attainment of such an ideal. The author does not lay claim to more than this, for as he observes of the beginner:

"however great his legal knowledge, until he can think, and think fast, while on his feet he will never have the composure or alertness of mind to enable him to take full advantage of the inspiration of the moment. It is that inspiration, amounting to a sort of intuition, which is the secret of successful advocacy."

There are, however, rules and principles of advocacy which could be acquired and this book supplies that need in ample measure. The tone is set in the opening chapter dealing with the ethics of advocacy where the author states that the high traditions of the Courts can be maintained only if those who practise in them appreciate and respect the principles of professional conduct which promote not only the dignity but the integrity of the administration of law. After stating in broad outline the ethics of advocacy, the application of the principles deduced therefrom are next considered, stress being particularly laid on simplicity, sincerity and moderation in the presentation of a case before the Court. This is followed by useful hints on the preparation of a case and a chapter dealing with conduct in Court which is enlivened with interesting Court anecdotes involving some distinguished advocates of the English bar. This leads to the important subjects of examination, cross-examination and re-examination of witnesses where by way of illustration excerpts from some notable cross-examinations are given. Within the short compass of this excellent book the beginner in the profession will find all that he needs to know about the art of advocacy at its best and to the seasoned lawyer it will provide much entertainment and stimulation. A book like this could well be recommended as a side study for students going up for the Bar Council examination, so as to, in the words of the author, effectively help the new-comer to the Courts to avoid much early disappointment and in later days to attain the more surely the end which he has in view.

The Importance of Muhammadan Law in the Modern World. By Asaf Ali Asghar Fyzee, M.A. (Cantab), BARRISTER-AT-LAW. AHMEDABAD-9: Published by the Registrar, Gujarat University. 1965. Pages 24. Price 50 Paise.

THIS is the script of a lecture delivered under the auspices of the Board of Extramural Studies of the Gujarat University. The importance of the subject of the lecture can be gauged when one considers that it deals with the law relating to a group of Muslims numbering about a hundred and ten million who are governed by the Hanafi school of Sunnite law. After discussing the relevancy of the Islamic law to the problems of the twentieth century and the importance of its study in India, the lecturer, a one time principal of a law college, advocates the institution of chairs of Hindu and Muhammadan laws by introducing the study of comparative law and makes some suggestions concerning the adequate study of Muhammadan law in Indian universities with a view to "improving the farcical system of instruction in legal subjects in our schools of law". Altogether a thought provoking dissertation, lucidly and forcefully expressed.

PROTECTION TO THE STATE AND OTHER PUBLIC AUTHORITIES: SECTION 80 OF THE CIVIL PROCEDURE CODE.*

Section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code¹ provides as follows:

“Notice.—No suit shall be instituted against the Government, or against a public officer in respect of any act purporting to be done by such officer in his official capacity, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been delivered to, or left at the office of—

(a) in the case of a suit against the Central Government, except where it relates to a railway, a Secretary to that Government;

(b) in the case of a suit against the Central Government, where it relates to a railway, the General Manager of that railway;

(c) in the case of a suit against a State Government, a Secretary to that Government or the Collector of the District;

and, in the case of a public officer, delivered to him or left at his office, stating the cause of action, the name, description and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims; and the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered or left.”

There are analogous provisions in a large number of Central and State Acts, as the following illustrations will show: (1) Section 273 of the Cantonments Act, 1924²: Two months' notice re. cantonments. (2) Section 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888³: One month's notice re. the Bombay Municipal Corporation. (3) Section 206-A of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925⁴: One month's notice re. Municipal Boroughs. (4) Section 280 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961⁵: One month's notice re. Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis. (For a fuller list, see App. I to this Report). All these provisions relate to acts done or purported to be done in an official capacity and, except as to the period of notice, are substantially the same as s. 80 of the Code. The discussion below is directed specifically to the problems created by s. 80, but is generally applicable to these and other similar provisions.

HISTORY AND INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 80.

Section 80 is not a new provision for it is substantially a reproduction of s. 424 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882⁶, which itself reproduced s. 424 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1877.⁷ In a sense, when it was first enacted, it was a radical and reformatory provision, for it enabled the citizen in India to sue the State—a right which was not conferred in other countries until very much later.⁸ In modern times, however, the aspect of s. 80 which attracts attention is the fact that it requires every citizen who wishes to commence legal proceedings against the State to give a notice in the manner provided for by the section; such a notice is a necessary pre-condition to the filing of the suit, and if it has not been given, or if it is not in compliance with the section, the suit is bad under O. VII, r. 11(d), of the Code.

Prior to the decision of the Privy Council in *Bhagchand Dagadusa v. Secretary of State for India*⁹ in 1927, the precise effect of s. 80 had not been definitely settled. Several decisions of the High Courts, and particularly those of the Bombay High Court, had attempted to mitigate the harshness of the provision, and construed it so as to avoid grave hardship to the citizen. It would be useful to consider these decisions as they bring out some of the unfortunate consequences of the section which are the subject matter of this report.

In *Shahebzadee Shahunshah Begum v. Fergusson*¹⁰, Mr. Justice Cunningham held that s. 424 had no application to a suit brought against the Official Trustee where the subject-matter was not a wrong committed by him, but the rights of the cestuis que trustent. In *Secretary of State v. Gajanan Krishnarao*¹¹ both Mr. Justice Chandavarkar and Mr. Justice Heaton observed that s. 80 would not prevent a citizen from obtaining an urgent injunction against an imminent public action which would cause irreparable injury. These observations were followed by Mr. Justice Batchelor in *Naginal Chunilal v. The Official Assignee, Bombay*¹² in which he held that the section had no application to a suit to restrain a public officer (other than the Secretary of State) from doing an act, and in Secretary of State for India v. Gulam Rasul,¹³ in which he held that it did not apply where a Mamlatdar threatened to immediately demolish the suit premises. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Batchelor pointed out that (p. 396):

"...it appears to me undesirable to extend the meaning and scope of the section so as to produce this result, that although a private person is empowered to sue the Secretary of State after two months' notice, yet the Secretary of State's agent during the currency of the two months is to be permitted to destroy the material object which is the very subject matter of the suit."

In Bhagchand's case, however, the Privy Council expressly disapproved of the Bombay decisions referred to above in a matter where an injunction was sought, and approved the views of the Allahabad, Calcutta and Madras High Courts that the section must be strictly construed. Viscount Sumner, who delivered the judgment of the Judicial Committee, pointed out that the provision had been law for forty years, and observed (353):

"...How far-reaching such protection ought to be is a matter of policy; how far it actually extends is a question of judicial construction."

This principle was followed by the Privy Council itself in Al. Ar. Vellayan Chettiar v. Government of Madras,¹⁴ in which a suit filed by two plaintiffs was held to be bad as the notice had been given by only one of them, and in Government of the Province of Bombay v. Pestonji Ardeshir Wadia,¹⁵ where in the case of a suit filed by a trust, a notice given by the trustees then in existence was held insufficient to justify a suit later when one of the earlier trustees had died and been replaced by two other trustees.

The Supreme Court first had occasion to consider s. 80 in 1958 in *Dhian Singh Sobha Singh v. The Union of India*¹⁶. In that case Mr. Justice Bhagwati observed that though s. 80 was to be strictly followed, it did not mean that the terms of the notice should be "scrutinised in a pedantic manner or in a manner completely divorced from common sense." Any hopes that this decision marked a beginning of a trend to limit the application of the section were short lived, for in S. N. Dutt v. Union of India,¹⁷ Mr. Justice Wanchoo pointed out that though the observations of Mr. Justice Bhagwati might be relevant in considering whether the notice adequately set out the cause of action or the relief claimed, they could have no application where the question was the name of the plaintiff for in such a case "either the name of the person suing is there in the notice or it is not. No amount of common sense will put the name of the plaintiff there, if it is not there." The facts of the case bring out how strict (or pedantic) was the approach of the Supreme Court. The notice was by "Messers S. N. Dutt & Co.", which the Supreme Court held suggested a partnership firm. It was held that a suit filed subsequently by S. N. Dutt, as sole proprietor of a business carried on under the name and style of "S. N. Dutt & Co." was bad under this section. The latest decision of the Supreme Court on this point is Amar Nath v. Union of India,¹⁸ in which Mr. Justice Ayyangar reaffirms that the section is imperative and must be strictly complied with.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SECTION 80.

The constitutional validity of s. 80 under art. 14 of the Constitution was challenged in a case before the Andhra Pradesh High Court in State v. Venkata Durga.¹⁹ The Court held that the classification was rational and further pointed out that as it had the effect of merely postponing the right of a person to sue the State, it could not be said to be unreasonable.

In view of the decisions of the Supreme Court which have upheld the preferential position of the State for limitation²⁰, and for revenue recoveries²¹, it is probable that the validity of s. 80 would also be upheld by the Supreme Court. That has also been the case in the United States.²²

To sum up the effect of what has been said above :

(1) Section 80 applies to all suits against the State or a public officer in respect of acts done or purported to be done in an official capacity, including suits to obtain injunctions restraining the State or a public official from doing an imminent act which may cause irreparable injury.

(2) There is a conflict of authorities as to whether the section affects suits against public officials regarding ultra vires acts, or mala fide acts.²³ Though the position is not free from doubt, the section may well be held to protect even such acts as they come within the class of acts purportedly done in an official capacity.

(3) The section is express, explicit and mandatory, and admits of no implications; it must be strictly construed. It follows, therefore,

(a) there must be a notice of two months in all such suits;

(b) the notice must set out with substantial accuracy the cause of action and the reliefs claimed;

(c) the notice must be given by all the plaintiffs to the suit; and the description and the designation of the plaintiff(s) must be absolutely accurate.

(4) If no notice has been given, or if the notice failed to comply in all details with s. 80, the suit is bad.

(5) These principles presumably apply in all their rigour to the analogous statutory provision set out above, and similar other statutory provisions.

OBJECTIONS TO SECTION 80.

The first objection to s. 80 is theoretical or abstract, and this is that no case can be made out to-day in any event for the retention of such a statutory protection in favour of the State or public officials. The general approach in all countries devoted to the maintenance of the rule of law is to equate the citizen with the State, to curb bureaucratic excesses, and to enable the citizen to obtain cheaply and expeditiously any reliefs against the State or public agencies or officers that he may be entitled to. This general approach has been followed in India, the most successful examples being arts. 32, 226 and 227 of the Constitution. It necessarily follows that any impediment whatever to the citizen obtaining such a relief, whether procedural or substantive, is most undesirable unless it can be justified on very strong grounds of public policy.²⁴ It will be seen later that there are in fact no valid grounds justifying this impediment, and the purpose of the section, even if it be valid at all, can be achieved by a provision as to costs as in England.

Is it, however, an impediment at all? And if it is, is it a serious impediment?

That the section, particularly as interpreted by the Courts, is an impediment can hardly be disputed. The practical aspects of the impediment, and the grave prejudice caused by it to any person who may have occasion to sue the State or a public officer, are known to almost every legal practitioner. Broadly speaking, the prejudice arises in two ways:

(1) Where the notice is given, but it is held not to comply with the requirements of the section. The non-compliance may be substantial, as in Amar Nath v. Union of India, where in a suit for damages, the notice mentioned the total amount claimed without specifying the various heads under which it was claimed. The Supreme Court found that the failure to specify the various heads of claims with sufficient particularity meant that the authorities had no effective opportunity to consider whether the claim should be admitted or not. Whether this argument has any practical validity or not is besides the point. What is pertinent is that the unfortunate plaintiff who instituted the suit claiming approximately Rs. 75,000 in May 1953, was told in April, 1962, that he could not succeed, not because his case was bad on merits but because the notice he had given even earlier failed to specify the cause of action with sufficient particularity. As it is, it is difficult for most citizens to litigate against the State with its vast resources. To add to those difficulties by such procedural impedimenta is unjust.

The injustice is particularly gross and unjustifiable when the non-compliance is formal, as when the parties named in the notice are not identical with the plaintiffs. This is a field where, as Mr. Justice Wanchoo points out in S. N. Dutt's case, there is no scope for commonsense. If the advocate of the plaintiff commits the mistake of addressing the notice on behalf of "Messrs S. N. Dutt & Co." instead of "S. N. Dutt, Sole Proprietor of a business carried on in the name and style of S. N. Dutt & Co.", or if after a notice is sent naming correctly the then existing trustees, one of them dies and is replaced by two others, and the parties fail to send another notice, (and wait for a further two months),²⁵ the suit is bad. This fatal defect of form is discovered several years later. The unfortunate plaintiff who, it must be remembered, wants something from the State, and (presumably) believes that he is entitled to it, must, of course, pay all the costs of the proceeding, and reflect how wrong Shakespeare was in saying "What's in a name?"

It must also be remembered that these consequences arise merely by reason of s. 80. In none of these cases was it alleged, let alone proved, that any real prejudice was caused to the State by such non-compliance. This is important, for the grave prejudice to the unfortunate plaintiff, which is easy to see, is caused by a formal defect and not because such a defect has caused any prejudice to the State in the facts of the case. Penalising parties to litigation for formal defects was a defect in the Common law which brought it into contempt and disrepute. Extensive reforms in the 19th century corrected most of these evils, and our own Codes adopts the modern, progressive outlook, allowing parties to amend pleadings freely and in general looking at the substance of things, not the form.

Two other aspects merit attention. The drafting of pleadings, and of s. 80 notices, is the work of lawyers. If a lawyer commits a mistake, and that a mistake of a formal nature, the person who suffers directly is the unfortunate plaintiff. To penalise so severely a plaintiff for the formal mistakes of his legal adviser is itself unjust. This situation is aggravated by the fact that the bulk of our population lives outside the major towns and cities. Illiteracy and ignorance of such fine points of law is common not merely among the people but even (it must be admitted) among many lawyers. A provision such as s. 80 would be harsh and unjust in any country; its effect is even worse in a large and relatively backward country such as India.

It is true that it has been held in some cases²⁶ that the period spent in pursuing a suit which is held to offend against s. 80 may be excluded for the purposes of computing limitation. The position cannot, however, be said to be concluded as the point has not been considered by any final Court. But even assuming that this view is correct, it is poor consolation to a litigant who has spent many years in a fruitless litigation that all is not lost; he can start all over again.

²⁵ Government of the Province of Bombay v. Pestonji Ardeshtir Wadia, (1949) 76 I.A. 85.

²⁶ See, for example, G. G. in Council v. Gouri Shankar Mills, [1951] A.I.R. Pat. 382.

(2) The other class of cases where grave prejudice is caused by s. 80 is cases where the very necessity of giving such a notice results in the plaintiff suffering irreparable harm. Instances of such cases are the Bombay cases discussed above where the plaintiff seeks to restrain the commission of an illegal act such as occupation of premises or demolition of property. If the plaintiff has to wait two months before taking legal proceedings, in many cases his right will be lost for the threatened action would already have been taken. It is noteworthy that in England, even when similar provisions existed, they were construed as limited to actions for damages. Otherwise, as the Master of Rolls pointed out in Flower v. Local Board of Low Leyton,²⁷ "it would amount to a licence to every local board to do what injury they pleased while the month's notice was running." In India, however, it is settled that s. 80 applies to any kind of suit.

The injustice of this position is too obvious to require elaboration. Fortunately for the citizen, however, the existence of arts. 32, 226 and 227 of the Constitution (which are not affected by s. 80) has meant that in appropriate cases he can obtain interim relief against imminent official acts. This has proved to be a substantial safeguard for the citizen, but its limitations must be recognised. To begin with, there are well-defined classes of cases where writs are not available at all. No writ would be available, for instance, to restrain a breach of contract, however imminent it may be, and even if the consequences are irreparable. Secondly, it is settled law that the granting of a writ is discretionary, and a writ may be refused on any number of grounds, such as a few months' delay or improper conduct. No such factor would affect the citizen's right to file a suit. Finally, Courts have generally refused to entertain writ petitions where the issues involve questions of fact. In such cases the citizen is deprived of any interim relief for it has been held that it is not proper to admit a writ petition merely to grant interim relief, and thus circumvent the provisions of s. 80.²⁸

It is also important to note that many Judges, faced with the gross injustice of such a provision, have taken to turning a blind eye to the provisions of s. 80, and analogous provisions, at least in order to stave off threatened governmental action by an interim injunction. Such an attitude, though perhaps commendable in spirit and intention, and productive of justice, can hardly be regarded as desirable, and only brings out the unfortunate and onerous nature of the provision.

It would be easy to multiply examples of the hardships and injustice caused in so many cases by the application of s. 80, and analogous provisions, but it is unnecessary to do so.

JUSTIFICATION OF SECTION 80.

The purpose behind s. 80, and analogous provisions, may be stated thus: The State or any public authority or officer would never knowingly or deliberately commit an illegal act or deny a person a relief to which he is entitled. It is only right, therefore, to give the State or public officer concerned a chance to redress the wrong, or grant the relief, before any legal proceedings are commenced. The same idea has been expressed by Mr. Justice Cunningham in a passage which has been repeatedly cited.²⁹ The object of such a provision is to give the public officer an opportunity of setting himself right, making amends, restoring what he has taken, or paying for the damage he has done.

Nobody would dispute the admirable intentions underlying the section. Two questions, however, arise. First, is this admirable object ever realised? If there are many occasions when a s. 80 notice has resulted in relief being granted without the party having to go to Court at all, it could be said that the section serves at least some useful purpose. It is, of course, not possible to be dogmatic in the absence of statistics which only the Governments concerned can supply, but the general experience of most lawyers is that this admirable result is rarely achieved. In fact, it would be true to say that none of us are aware of a single case where this has occurred. Whether this is because the Government is indifferent to the issue or because the prescribed period of two months is too short for any definite action to be taken by the Government is irrelevant. What is relevant is that it is rare for the Government or a public officer to make amends, or grant the relief claimed, without driving the party to litigation.

It is also significant that few Government officers these days are willing to decide on their own an issue which might result in a citizen being awarded a sum of money. This is in part due to a fear of being accused of being corrupt or showing favouritism. The result is an attitude of leaving everything to the Court. Whatever the reason, such an attitude only increases the futility of such a provision.

The object underlying the section is hardly, if ever, realised; what survives is the impediment to the citizen. It follows that the section not only serves no public purpose but is the source of wholly unnecessary hardship to the citizen.

Even if the first question could be answered in the affirmative, the second, and more fundamental question would survive, and that is: even assuming that the object of the section is to give the State or public officers an opportunity to redress the wrong or make amends without driving the party to litigation, is it necessary that the failure of the party to give such notice should be met with such grave consequences to the party? The object of the section is at least in part to assist the aggrieved citizen. It is difficult to reconcile that with the severe prejudice caused to the aggrieved citizen for a failure to comply with the section.

It is true that the question may be approached in another way. It may be said that the section is enacted in furtherance of a public policy to prevent needless litigation and save unnecessary expenses and costs. If this is the correct point of view, it may be desirable to compel parties contemplating litigation against the State to give the State such a notice and such an opportunity. It would, therefore, be necessary to impose some sort of sanction to ensure that such notices are given. Even so, it is unnecessary that the sanction should be so severe. This object could be achieved by providing that where legal proceedings are commenced against the State or public officials without such a notice, and if within two months of the service of notice of such a suit upon the State or public officer concerned, the State or public officer grants the necessary relief, or makes amends, the party shall pay to the State or the public officer all the costs incurred by the latter.

In any event, it is wholly unnecessary to insist upon a strict or technical compliance with the section. The purpose of ensuring accurate notices could equally be achieved by providing that the consequence of a notice being inaccurate or imprecise should be that the party should pay the costs of the State or public officer attributable to such inaccuracy or imprecision.

POSITION IN ENGLAND

The position in England in filing suits against the State (through the relevant department) is now governed by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947.³⁰ Prior to the passing of that Act, the subject had a very limited right to obtain legal redress against the State. Under the Crown Proceedings Act, however, suits can be filed against the State through the relevant department and the procedure governing such suits is substantially the same as that governing ordinary suits. It is also possible to obtain preventive relief by a declaration.³¹

Proceedings against public officers or public authorities are now governed by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.³² It is interesting to trace the history of the law on the subject prior to 1893.³³ Prior to 1842, there were many Acts of Parliament both public and private designed to protect those who exercised public powers or performed public duties against legal proceedings in respect of things done by them in their official capacity. Such Acts provided, inter alia, for the giving of notice before the action was brought.

The first reform in this field was the Limitation of Actions and Costs Act, 1842.³⁴ Section 4 of that Act provided that in all such Acts where notice of action was required, the notice was to be of one calendar month, and that one month's notice was to be sufficient notwithstanding what was provided in any Act passed prior to 1842 to the contrary.

The second reform was the passing of the Act of 1893, which repealed altogether all such protective provisions in some 109 different Acts and substituted instead the following provision :

1. Protection of persons acting in execution of statutory or other public duty. Where any action, prosecution or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority, the following provisions shall have effect :

(a) ...

(c) Where the proceeding is an action for damages, tender of amends before the action was commenced may, in lieu of or in addition to any other plea, be pleaded. If the action was commenced after the tender, or is proceeded with after payment into Court of any money in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and the plaintiff does not recover more than the sum tendered or paid, he shall not recover any costs incurred after the tender or payment, and the defendant shall be entitled to costs, to be taxed as between solicitor and client, as from the time of the tender or payment ; but this provision shall not affect costs on any injunction in the action :

(d) If, in the opinion of the Court, the plaintiff has not given the defendant a sufficient opportunity of tendering amends before the commencement of the proceeding the Court may award to the defendant costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client :

The effect of these provisions may be stated as follows :—

(a) No notice need be given before filing a suit.

(b) If no notice, or other opportunity to tender amends was given before the taking of proceedings, the plaintiff may be penalised by being asked to pay the costs of the defendant. But this can be done only if it is the opinion of the Court that such opportunity was not given.

(c) In actions for damages, the plaintiff is made to pay the costs if he commences or continues legal proceedings after a tender of amount is made, or after an amount is paid into Court, and if he fails to recover a larger amount.

(d) Costs are taxed on the highest scale, viz. as between solicitor and client.

It will be seen that from as far back as 1893 it was found unnecessary in England to provide for the giving of a notice as a condition precedent to the filing of a suit against a public authority. The public policy involved in giving such an authority an opportunity to make amends, and to avoid needless litigation and expense, was satisfactorily achieved by the machinery of costs.

CONCLUSIONS

In our opinion this study shows :—

(1) That there is no justification whatever for the protection conferred by s. 80, and other analogous statutes.

(2) That the purpose that s. 80 is supposed to achieve can be easily achieved, if necessary at all, by some provision similar to that contained in s. 1 (d) of the (English) Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

(3) That s. 80, and analogous provisions, work grave hardship upon the citizen because they expose him to the risk of being non-suited merely because of a defect in the notice served prior to the suit.

(4) That s. 80, and analogous provisions, make it difficult for the citizen to obtain urgent interim relief against threatened governmental action and this causes him grave prejudice.

RECOMMENDATIONS

We would recommend without hesitation the repeal of s. 80, and analogous provisions in other statutes for the reasons discussed above.

If, however, such a repeal is thought undesirable, it is imperative that s. 80 (and other analogous provisions) be amended by adding thereto a proviso in the following terms :

"No suit shall be held to be not maintainable in law by reason only of the fact that this section has not been complied with. If, however, a suit is filed without giving a notice, or if the suit is filed before the expiry of the said period of two months, or if the notice is not in accordance with the provisions of this section, and if the Court is of opinion that the failure to give such notice, or the filing of the suit before the expiry of the said period of two months, or the fact that the notice is not in accordance with the provisions of this section has caused any prejudice to the defendant, the Court may make the plaintiff pay the costs of the defendant."

If s. 80 is repealed, and it is thought desirable to ensure that such notices be given, a provision such as that contained in s. 1 (d) of the (English) Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, may be inserted.

It may be noted that the Law Commission made substantially the same recommendations in its 14th Report on the Reform of Judicial Administration at pages 475-6.

A private member bill being Bill No. 15 of 1965 was introduced in Parliament on April 30, 1965 by Mr. Nath Pai proposing the repeal of s. 80. The Bill has not yet been debated.

GLEANINGS.

INTRUSIVE PHOTOGRAPHS

"Unless a man's photograph...be published in such a context that the publication can be said to be defamatory of him...it cannot be the subject of complaint."

THIS proposition, taken from the report of the well known case Tolley v. J. S. Fry & Sons Ltd. [1931] A.C. 333, is undoubtedly still correct. The picture of Mr. Tolley, the famous amateur golfer, with a carton of chocolate protruding from his pocket and a ridiculous ditty penned beneath was, the House of Lords finally held, capable of being defamatory, and a new trial was ordered. But Mr. Tolley succeeded only because, as he was an amateur golfer, people seeing the advertisements might think he had damaged his amateur status. Had he been a professional he would, apparently, have had no remedy in defamation.

English law gives no general right to privacy and in the age of the telephoto-lens the traditional action for trespass to land may lose some of its potency. An Englishman's home may be his castle but the mass media intrusion into domestic life has increased enormously. Anyone may be the victim of a candid camera or the subject of "This is Your Life," with disturbing effects.

Unless, like Mr. Tolley, he can plead defamation it seems that the victim of the candid camera is obliged to rely on a possible breach of copyright. The Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, first extended copyright to photographs, and in the Copyright Act, 1911, it was made to cover cinematograph film. The Copyright Act, 1956, deals in specific terms with copyright in television and sound broadcasting. When may a plaintiff claim that the publication of a particular photograph involves breach of copyright? Photographs may be taken voluntarily by the photographer—possibly in the hope that if they are satisfactory a client will later be found to buy them—or may be commissioned. The distinction is important. If a photograph (or painting, or drawing) is made for a person "for good and valuable consideration" the copyright in it belongs to the person who commissioned it and not to the photographer, unless the client makes an agreement to the contrary. This, the law since 1862, has recently been affirmed in the 1956 Act which, incidentally, makes it plain that if, for example, a photographer is employed by a newspaper or other periodical and, in the course of employment, takes a photograph for publication in the paper, it is the proprietor of the paper who, for all purposes concerned with publication, is entitled to the copyright.

It has not always been easy to determine when a photographer is working for "valuable consideration" and when he may claim the copyright himself. Generally when a person goes to a photographer and orders a photograph there is an implied contract that he will pay for the original if no copies are ordered. This photograph will therefore be made for valuable consideration and the copyright rests in the client.

Pollard v. Photographic Co., (1888) 40 Ch. D. 345, was a case where a photographer, having, by arrangement, taken and sold the plaintiff some photographs of herself, at a subsequent date, without her knowledge, used the negative to have her likeness inserted in Christmas cards. She applied for an injunction to restrain this. She had not, as was then necessary, registered any copyright in the negative, but contended that there was an implied condition in her contract that the negative should not be used for any other purpose than to supply photographs of herself. The learned judge accepted this submission and held that a photographer was not justified in striking off copies of a photograph for his own use unless, expressly or impliedly, he had authority from his client. He stated:—

"I say expressly or impliedly because a photographer is frequently allowed, on his own request, to take a photograph of a person under circumstances in which a subsequent sale by him must have been in contemplation of both parties though not actually mentioned."

The court considered that an abuse of a confidence—analagous to the misuse of information obtained in confidential employment—arose in this case and granted the injunction prayed for. It was said that, though failure to register the copyright deprived the plaintiff from enforcing a remedy for breach of copyright, she was still entitled to relief on the ground of breach of a contract. Reference was made to Tuck & Sons v. Priester, (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 629, where the plaintiffs, unregistered owners of copyright in a picture, employed the defendant to make copies. He wrongfully made some copies for himself and sold them at low prices. Lord Esher declared:—

“that was a plain breach of contract and I cannot doubt that, quite irrespective of the Act of 1862, a court of equity, would grant an injunction and damages against the defendant.”

In a subsequent case, Stackemann v. Paton [1906] 1 Ch. 774, a firm of photographers were allowed to go to a private school and take photographs. Some were then sold to persons at the school, but the school authorities also sent copies to a journal advertising lists of schools. The photographers then sued this journal for breach of copyright, but the court held that permission to take the school photographs, with the very likely result that some would be sold, was a valuable consideration tendered to the photographic firm. Therefore it was the school which had the copyright and the photographers' action failed.

The importance of photographic copyright was vividly illustrated at Westminster County Court in December, 1959, in a decision in the case of Williams v. Settle, which was later upheld by the Court of Appeal [1960] 1 W. L. R. 1072. The defendant was there found liable for infringing the copyright in a wedding photograph which he had taken and was ordered to pay £1,000 and the costs of the proceedings. He had, the learned county judge found, been commissioned by the bridegroom to take a wedding photograph in 1956 (although it was actually the bridegroom's father-in-law who had later paid for it). In 1958 it happened that the father-in-law was found murdered and, shortly afterwards, the defendant sold, for £15, copies of the wedding photograph to two national newspapers, which then published them so that their readers could gratify their curiosity about the murdered man. “Anything more calculated to wound and hurt bitterly the feelings of all members of the family I can hardly conceive,” declared the learned county judge, referring to the newspapers.

The bridegroom satisfied the court that, since the photographs had been commissioned for valuable consideration, copyright in them vested in him alone and that the photographer was in breach of copyright in disposing of them without leave to others. As well as being ordered to pay damages he was ordered to deliver up the negatives, and an injunction was granted restraining further publication. The damages were heavy, but the Court of Appeal felt that the case called for punitive damages. Sellers, L.J., observed:—

“The power to do so is expressly given in the Copyright Act, 1956, and it was the flagrancy of the infringement which gave the right to heavy damages in this case.”

A defence raised in the proceedings was that it was the deceased himself who had had copyright of the photographs. Even if the evidence had justified such a finding it is still the law that copyright in any work, on the death of the owner, vests in his personal representatives as part of his estate. As well as the automatic transfer of copyright on death it may be assigned, wholly or in part, during the lifetime of whosoever is entitled to it. In such a case, however, the transfer, which must be in writing, must refer to some work which is in existence at the time.

The Right to Privacy Bill, 1961, carried on the second reading in the House of Lords by seventy-four votes to twenty-one, but dropped for lack of Parliamentary time, did not, in terms, refer to intrusive photographs but it is possible that English law could yet develop means of protecting personal privacy without legislation. Other countries have been more ready to protect the individual's intangible interests. Thus in the United States in International News Service v. Associated Press (1918), 248 U.S. 215, "broadcasting rights" were protected as part of a quasi-property created by skill and labour. Again, under the Indian Easements Act, 1882, an easement of privacy may arise upon proof of local custom restricting, e.g., the opening of new windows: and, apart from this Act, a right of privacy can even arise by the customary law of India. It is of interest to note that in a leading case, Gokul Prasad v. Radho (1888), I.L.R. 10 Allahabad 358 the right was upheld to safeguard the seclusion of parda-nashin women.

There are two possible ways in which our courts could extend existing principles of tortious liability. Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q.B. 57, established the rule that whenever a person wilfully does an act to cause physical harm, and harm is caused, then the plaintiff has a remedy. In that case a practical joker wrongly told a woman that her husband had been injured in an accident, with the result that she became ill. She recovered £100 for emotional distress, and the principle under which she recovered does seem logically capable of extension.

Secondly, the law of negligence generally provides that if I do an act which a reasonable man could foresee might injure another, and it does so, then an action will lie. If a photograph is published in circumstances where a reasonable man would know that much distress must be caused, it would only seem necessary for the courts to jump the barrier from actual harm to serious mental distress in order to provide a remedy.

Meanwhile, plaintiffs must rely on defamation or breach of photographic copyright, and, although, in Williams v. Settle, supra, the plaintiff could show that copyright belonged to him, if his wife had tried to sue the photographer she would, presumably, have been denied a remedy.—(A.P.) S.J.

RE MOTENESS AND PRECEDENT

ANOTHER decision on remoteness of damage in tort (Doughty v. Turner Manufacturing Co., Ltd. [1964] 1 Q.B. 518) occasions a re-examination of the main cases on remoteness since the Court of Appeal's decision in Re Polemis and Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd. [1921] 3 K.B. 560. Can these decisions be reconciled with the rules of precedent in English law? The case which laid down the relevant rules is Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. [1944] K.B. 718, where it was said that the Court of Appeal were bound by their own decisions except (1) where previous decisions were given per incuriam; (2) where previous decisions were opposed to general principles subsequently laid down by the House of Lords; and (3) where there were previous conflicting decisions of the Court of Appeal. The difficulty has really been created because one of the principal decisions, Overseas Tankship (U.K.), Ltd. v. Morts Dock and Engineering Co., Ltd. (The Wagon Mound) [1961] A.C. 388, was decided in the Privy Council. The decisions of the Privy Council are persuasive authority, and there is no case laying down that English courts must follow their decisions. However, it is well established that courts of first instance will only decline to follow the Privy Council when their decision is inconsistent with the English authorities.

In Re Polemis the Court of Appeal decided that the test of liability for damage caused negligently was whether that damage was a direct consequence of the negligent act. Such a test is clearly beneficial to a plaintiff, as is illustrated by Polemis itself. There, shipowners were held entitled to recover for the loss of a ship after stevedores, the servants of the charterers, negligently knocked a plank into the hold in which petrol was stored, resulting in the destruction of the ship by fire. In The Wagon Mound, where the damage was equally remote from the negligent act, the Privy Council preferred the test that there is liability only for the foreseeable consequences of a negligent act. Strict application of this rule will favour a defendant. The Privy Council considered that the Court of Appeal, in formulating the direct consequences rule, had misunderstood the old authorities. Lord Parker, C.J., was faced, in Smith v. Leech Brain & Co., Ltd. [1962] 2 Q.B. 405, with the problem of following either Polemis, which counsel for the plaintiff submitted he was bound to do, or The Wagon Mound, which he in fact preferred. Lord Parker neatly avoided the apparent conflict by saying (at p. 414):—

"I am quite satisfied that the Privy Council did not have what I may call, loosely, the thin skull cases in mind."

He continued (at p. 415):—

"I would follow, sitting as a trial judge, the decision in The Wagon Mound case; or rather, more accurately, I would treat myself... able to follow other decisions of the Court of Appeal prior to the Polemis case, rather than the Polemis case itself."

In spite of academic and judicial criticism of Polemis, was the Lord Chief Justice not bound by that decision? Bankes, Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ., who decided Polemis, hardly constitute a weak court, especially when supported by Cohen, Asquith and Birkett, L.JJ., in Thurogood v. Van Den Berghs & Jurgens, Ltd. [1951] 2 K. B. 537. Smith v. Leech Brain & Co., Ltd., did not go to the Court of Appeal, and one can only guess whether that court would have been able to reiterate the words of the Lord Chief Justice quoted above, or whether they would have held themselves bound by their distinguished predecessors.

Hughes v. Lord Advocate [1963] A. C. 837, was an appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session to the House of Lords. A manhole in an Edinburgh street was covered with a tent and left unguarded by workmen, but surrounded by paraffin warning lamps. On entering the tent, an eight-year-old boy knocked one of the lamps into the hole, causing an explosion, as a result of which the boy fell into the hole and was severely burned. Their lordships held that the accident to the appellant was reasonably foreseeable although the particular source of danger which caused the injury acted in an unpredictable way. The Wagon Mound test was clearly applied, although application of the Polemis test of direct consequences would have achieved a similar result. The difference between the two tests is not so striking once it is agreed that "it is particularly hard to foresee with precision the exact shape of the disaster that will arise," per Lord Pearce, at pp. 857-8, and still allow the plaintiff to recover damage. From dicta in Hughes's case, one might have been led to believe that penumbral situations, i.e., damage which falls somewhere between a direct and a foreseeable consequence, would be decided in favour of the plaintiff, also bearing in mind that behind the defendant there is most often an insurance company.

In the most recent case, Doughty v. Turner Manufacturing Co., Ltd., supra, the Court of Appeal, alas, did not adopt this attitude. The facts were that a cover made of asbestos and cement fell into a cauldron of molten liquid cyanide. After about two minutes an explosion occurred, as a result of which the plaintiff was splashed by the molten liquid. It must be appreciated that the plaintiff was injured after the explosion and not after the immersion of the cover in the liquid. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Stale, J., whose sympathies were with the plaintiff. They held that, even if the inadvertent immersion of the cover into the cauldron was a negligent act, the defendants were not liable for the damage resulting from the explosion because it was not damage of such a kind as could reasonably have been foreseen, and was altogether different from a foreseeable splash of the liquid in the cauldron. Again, presuming the original immersion to have been negligent, if the Polemis test had been applied, the plaintiff, it is submitted, would have been able to recover damages. At last, however, the Court of Appeal have dealt with the problem of remoteness without expressly denying the existence of a duty of care. It might be thought that the defendants could have been held liable on the same basis as the defendants in Hughes v. Lord Advocate were held liable, where Lord Reid said that the type of accident and the injuries, "though perhaps different in degree, did not differ in kind from injuries which might have resulted from an accident of a foreseeable nature" (at p. 845). In Doughty's case, however, their lordships came to the conclusion that "it would be quite unrealistic to describe this accident as a variant of the perils from splashing" per Lord Pearce, at p. 527.

Any misgivings about the correctness of Harman, L.J.'s dictum that "whether [The Wagon Mound] is or is not binding on this court, we ought to treat it as the law" can be dispelled. The rules laid down in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., supra, can be considered rules of practice rather than rules of law, and Polemis can clearly be said to be opposed to the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Hughes v. Lord Advocate. But can Smith v. Leech Brain & Co., Ltd., supra, be disposed of quite so easily, since it was decided before Hughes v. Lord Advocate? To answer this, one has to consider the nature of the rules of precedent. It is submitted that the rules are sufficiently flexible to allow decisions to be departed from which have been consistently criticised as out of tune with modern principles of imposing liability. To adopt this attitude, as Lord Parker, C.J., impliedly did in Smith v. Leech Brain & Co., Ltd., is surely correct.—(Anthony Glass.) S.J.

POLICE LIABILITY IN TORT

WHAT was stated to be the first claim in tort under the new Police Act, was reported in the Press on August 21, 1964. Four men, whose convictions had been quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal in one of the so-called Challenor cases, were said to have made claims against the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolitan Police based on the grounds of conspiracy, false imprisonment, trespass and malicious prosecution. The men's cases were referred to the Court of Criminal Appeal by the Home Secretary after Detective-sergeant Challenor had been declared insane and unfit to plead to a charge of conspiracy to prevent the course of justice (Hansard, House of Commons, July 2, 1964, col. 1547). Thus s. 48 of the Police Act 1964 has not had long to wait before being called in aid, for it came into operation only on August 1, last. It provides that the chief officer of police for a police area is liable in respect of torts committed by constables under his direction and control in the purported performance of their functions, in the same way as a master is liable in respect of the torts committed by his servants in the course of their employment, and the chief officer of police is by the statute declared to be a joint tortfeasor. If damages are recovered against him, the damages come out of the police fund; so do his costs, unless recovered by him in the proceedings. Any damages and costs awarded against the police constable may be paid out of the police fund, if the police authority think fit. The reason for expressly assimilating, for the purpose, the relationship of chief officer and constable to that of master and servant is, of course, that the relationship of master and servant does not prevail throughout the police hierarchy. A constable is the holder of a public office; he and his superiors alike may be regarded as servants of the State, but his superior officers are not in the position of master nor he in that of a servant (see, e.g., A.-G. for New South Wales v. Perpetual Trustee Co. Ltd. ([1955] 1 All E.R. at p. 852).—L.J.

TRADE UNIONS AND ROOKES v. BERNARD

SINCE the time of the decision of Rookes v. Barnard ([1964] 1 All E.R. 367) the trade union attitude has begun to crystallize. They say that they ask a "simple act of justice", to quote the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress as reported in The Times of August 25, 1964, last, to put them back where they were before. The simple act of justice is, it seems, the passing of immediate legislation to restore the position "as it was thought to be before the judgment". The first difficulty, of course, is to understand exactly what Rookes v. Barnard did decide. On that the trade unions have taken advice. One does not know what they were advised. The general secretary is reported as having said, "so far as I can see any threat to strike is actionable". If that is the effect of the advice which they received, it seems to represent a remarkable reading of the case. Not long ago Rookes v. Barnard was considered by the House of Lords in J. T. Stratford & Son, Ltd. v. Lindley. It is worth looking at what Lord Pearce said ([1964] 3 All E.R. at p. 114). Speaking of Rookes v. Barnard he said that it was suggested that it withdrew the protection of s. 3 of the Trade Disputes Act 1906 from threats by a trade union official to an employer to call a strike in breach of the contract of employment. This suggestion seems to be in accord with the trade union view. Lord Pearce went on: "It certainly does not do that". A trade union official is not liable to an employer for inducing a breach of the contract of employment with the employer. Neither is he liable for threatening to induce such a breach. The distinction comes in when a third party (not the employers) is deliberately injured by the making of unlawful threats to the employer. The liability is to the third party not the employer, and the justice of the liability lies in the union's having used its power and having used unlawful means (i.e., threats of breaches of contract by employees acting in concert) to compel someone, the employer, to act so as to injure a third person. That was the position in Rookes v. Barnard.—L.J.

Magna Carta. By J. C. HOLT. BOMBAY 1: Macmillan & Co. Ltd., 276, Dr. Dadabhai Naoroji Road. LONDON, N. W. 1: Cambridge University Press, Bentley House, 200 Euston Road. 1965. Demi 8vo. Pages 378. Price 60s. net (Rs. 48).

To those who are familiar with the dramatic picture of King John at Runnymede on a fateful day in June 1215 sealing or signing the Magna Carta, it will come as a surprise to be told by the author of this fascinating book that,

"King John did not sign Magna Carta; there is no evidence that he could write. He did not even seal it; sealing charters was the task of the spigurnel, a member of the Chancery staff. Furthermore, there is no evidence at all that the Charter figured in the ceremonies at Runnymede either on 19 June or on any other day."

This book which was timed to appear on the 750th anniversary of Magna Carta presents the Charter of 1215 in the context of political thought of England and Europe in the 12th and 13th centuries. The author's approach is historical and he has traced the various factors which led to the formation of the Charter and its later history. The book opens with a detailed study of the interpretations which Magna Carta received within a generation of its sealing, down to the 17th century interpretation which Sir Edward Coke typified, for whom it was an affirmation of fundamental law and liberty of the subject. The origins of Magna Carta are then traced in the history of the English kingdom in the 12th century and this leads to a consideration of the politico-social currents and cross-currents culminating in the Articles of the Barons which were the basis of Magna Carta. Of particular interest to the lawyer will be the discussion of the Charter's claim to permanent legal stature, a problem which is still occupying the minds of modern jurists like Vinogradoff and Powicke. This brings us to the final assessment of the Charter thus expressed by the author:

"The assumption of 1215 is not dissolved by demonstrating that the Charter was conceived in baronial interests or that it reflected particular social conditions which changed with the passage of time. Later generations may have differed on what the community was and on who was entitled to represent it, but they were rarely in any doubt that authority should be subject to law which the community itself defined. Magna Carta could not ensure this would always be so, but it endured as an example. It set no mean standard."

This well documented and scholarly treatise will fill a gap in the study of English history and will be of much practical help to those concerned with the development of English law and administration.

The Law of Taxes on Wealth, Gift & Expenditure. By KHARAG RAM CHARTURVEDI, B. L., Advocate. CALCUTTA-12: The Eastern Law House Private Limited, 54 Ganesh Chandra Avenue. Roy 8vo. Pages 610 + 176. Price Rs. 25.

THE author of this book who has already published two very useful studies dealing with Sales Tax laws now, in this single volume, presents the tax laws relating to wealth, gift and expenditure. In an out-spoken preface he sums up the incidence of direct taxes thus:

"As the rupee comes in, it constitutes somebody's 'income' and the income-tax grabs a sizable portion therefrom. The saved bits constitute the 'wealth' of the one who thoughtfully tightened his belt and lived much below his means and standard to save it; but there is a wealth-tax awaiting. If the rupee tries to go out by way of expenditure, there is an expenditure-tax threatening. If given gratis—even to the nearest and dearest ones—there is a gift-tax glaring with its much too high incidence. And when at last the inevitable happens to the mortal coil of the human individual, it becomes his 'estate', leviable in the hands of the accountable person with an estate-duty."

The book is divided into four parts. The first three parts deal with the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, the Gift-tax Act, 1958 and the Expenditure-tax Act, 1957, respectively. The Rules and Notifications issued under the three Acts are also included in the different parts and wherever necessary Administrative Circulars issued by the Central Board of Revenue are also reproduced. The last section of the book is devoted to a consideration of the law of Annuity Deposits as contained in Chapter XXII A of the Income-tax Act, 1961 and the Annuity Deposit Scheme, 1964. A very useful feature of the book is the Direct Tax Reckoner (1965-66) which gives rates, rebates and tables of taxes payable under the direct taxes. The various provisions of the Acts are critically analysed and examined in the light of decided cases and legislative changes effected therein. The book is a veritable mine of information relating to the three important fiscal statutes and will be invaluable not only to lawyers but also to income-tax practitioners as a handy and up-to-date statement of the law,

The Law Relating to Foreign Exchange. By SHIAVAX R. VAKIL, B.A., LL.B., Attorney-at-Law, High Court, Bombay. Third Edition. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. Roy 8vo. Pages 486. Price Rs. 25.

SINCE the last edition of this book was published in 1958 among the important changes effected in the substantive law relating to foreign exchange were those made by the Amending Act 55 of 1964. Apart from this there have been periodic issuance of Rules and Notifications which have an important bearing on the administration of the law. All this has necessitated a revision of the book which the author has carried out with commendable thoroughness. All the relevant case law has been extensively referred to and analysed, including some unreported decisions. The commentaries under the different sections of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, contain the appropriate Notifications and Orders and deal exhaustively with the provisions of the Act which are examined vis-a-vis the provisions of statutes which impinge on the Act. An appendix contains much useful material, e.g. the Foreign Exchange Regulation Rules, 1952, Adjudication Proceedings and Appeal Rules, 1957, the Imports and Exports Control Act, 1947 and the Imports (Control) and Exports (Control) Orders and the Customs Act, 1962. A table of cases would have further enhanced the utility of the book. In his general discussion on the law relating to territorial waters the author seems to be unaware of the President's Proclamation of March 22, 1956, wherein for purposes other than those mentioned in the Proclamation quoted by him, the territorial waters of India were declared to extend to a distance of six nautical miles into the sea. Altogether this pioneering effort to comprehensively present the entire law on a subject of much complexity will not only be welcome to the profession but will provide a reliable guide to the laymen, especially the business community, through its mazes.

Review of Contemporary Law. Managing Editor: Pierre Cot. Brussels 19 (Belgium): 49, Avenue Jupiter. Roy 8vo. Pages 175. Price 100 Belgian francs or $ 2.00.

THIS biannual is published by the International Association of Democratic Lawyers. This No. 1/1964 contains a number of articles on "peaceful co-existence" contributed by professors of the Universities of Paris, Dijon (France), Japan and Prague and the Director of International Law Section of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences and the Professor of International Law, U.S.S.R. The editor feels that the actual concept of co-existence needs considerable investigation and study if any agreement is to be reached on its character and content and, therefore, lawyers from all parts of the world are invited to participate in the discussion with a view to "contribute to the development of international law, functioning without stop in the service of peace, the peoples of the world, and human progress." A laudable venture but in the present zeitgeist of doubtful utility.

Executive Action and the Rule of Law. International Commission of Jurists. 2, Quai Du Cheval-Balnc, Geneva, Switzerland.

THIS is a report on the proceedings of the International Congress of Jurists held at Rio De Janeiro (Brazil) in December 1962. One of the principal objects of the Congress was the examination of the role of judges, lawyers and teachers of law in striking a correct balance between the freedom of the Executive to act effectively under modern conditions on the one hand and the protection of the individual and of the community on the other and thus adjusting the Rule of Law to the needs of social and economic development. The first part of this Report deals with the concept of the Rule of Law in modern society as developed at the various Congresses and Conferences held under the aegis of the International Commission of Jurists. The second part deals with the proceedings of the Rio de Janeiro Congress in which some three hundred jurists from seventy-five countries participated. The pace was set by Vivian Bose, President of the Commission, who in his inaugural address, exhorting the establishment of the Rule of Law, observed :

"Old values are crumbling and are being forgotten, hallowed traditions are toppling down. Petty colloquialism and narrow regionalism are raising their ugly heads internally within nations and externally between nation and nation. Freedoms are being trampled on, dictators are rising again, human worth and human dignity are being destroyed. These evil things must be fought and conquered, not with bullets and machine-guns but with the forces of the spirit, with the armour of righteousness, for ideas will penetrate into the hearts and minds of men, they will go where bullets never can, they will bring life where bullets only bring death and destruction."

This report makes very interesting and instructive reading.

This conference was attended by one hundred and five jurists from sixteen countries and its conclusions are embodied in what is known as the Declaration of Bangkok.

SUMMARY SUITS UNDER THE BOMBAY RENT ACT—RECENT JUDGMENT OF THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA*.

UNDER r. 8 of the Rules made by the Government of Bombay in exercise of the powers conferred on it by s. 49 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947 (Bom. LVII of 1947), the suits and proceedings other than those referred to in rr. 5 and 7 are governed as far as may be and with the necessary modification by the procedure prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure for the Court of first instance including O.XXXVII as modified in its application to the State of Bombay. Rule 5 prescribes procedure for suits, the value of the subject matter of which does not exceed Rs. 3,000 and r. 7 prescribes procedure for applications for fixation of standard rent. Accordingly, O.XXXVII of the Civil Procedure Code has been made applicable to all suits for ejectment the value of which exceeds Rs. 3,000, the same being not governed by rr. 5 and 7. The validity and appropriateness of summary procedure to the suits for possession under the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act was challenged before the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court held in its recent judgment in *Ramkarandas v. Bhagwandas*¹ that the said rule was intra vires the Act and was valid.

With the greatest respect to the highest Court of the country, it may be stated that the decision requires reconsideration or the law requires complete amendment in the said connection. The anomaly of the said decision and the anomaly arising from the applicability of the summary procedure to such suits is explained and discussed hereinbelow :

Under O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil Procedure, a defendant has no right to defend the suit unless he obtains leave to defend the suit. If the leave to defend the suit is refused to the defendant or such leave is granted conditionally and the defendant is not able to comply with the conditions, the allegations in the plaint are deemed to be admitted and the Court proceeds to pass a decree or consider the claim made in the plaint on the basis of such constructive admission. Such procedure is ordinarily applied to the suits of negotiable instruments or other admitted claims where prima facie there is an actual admission of the claim on the part of the defendant. Under s. 13 of the Bombay Rent Act, a landlord is entitled to recover possession of the premises only if the Court is satisfied that any of the grounds mentioned in s. 13 exists. The satisfaction of the Court must depend upon actual evidence and legal proof and not on constructive admission. In a tenancy suit, the notice to quit has to be proved as a condition precedent to the grant of any relief and in the summary procedure, in the absence of the defendant being able to obtain leave to defend the suit, it shall be presumed that the notice was duly served.

Section 12 (3) (b) of the said Act confers discretion on the Court not to pass a decree for ejectment against a tenant on the ground of arrears of rent for less than six months on the day of the statutory notice under s. 12 (2) of the Act even if the said arrears are paid at any time before the judgment along with the costs if circumstances justify exercise of discretion. Assume that a defendant is not able to pay the arrears as a condition of leave to defend the suit but is able to pay the same before delivery of judgment and offers satisfactory explanation for the delay, will it be possible for the Court to allow the defendant even to appear at the hearing of the suit when the leave to defend the suit has been refused to the defendant or the same is granted conditionally and the condition has not been complied with?

*By D. R. Dhanuka, Advocate, Supreme Court. 1 [1965] A.I.R. S.C. 1144.

Section 13(hh) of the Bombay Rent Act allows eviction on the ground that the premises are required reasonably and bona fide for the purpose of demolition and such demolition is to be made for the purpose of erecting new building. Reasonableness and bona fides are not matters of averment in the plaint but matter of opinion to be based on evidence.

Section 13 (g) of the Rent Act permits eviction on the ground of reasonable and bona fide requirements of the landlord for occupation of the premises by himself or by any person for whose benefit the premises are held. Section 13 (2) of the Rent Act imposes a mandatory duty on the Court not to pass a decree for eviction on this ground if the Court is satisfied that having regard to all the circumstances of the case including the question whether other reasonable accommodation is available for the landlord or the tenant greater hardship would be caused by passing a decree than by refusing to pass it. Assume that in a given case the tenant is not permitted to defend the suit, how the Court is going to perform its duty of deciding the questions of rival hardships without evidence on the side of the defendant which evidence the defendant is not permitted to lead? In any event a rule of procedure precluding the defendant to appear at the hearing of a suit involving such issues as a matter of right is hardly fair and consistent with the scheme of the Act. Similarly, there are various grounds under s. 13 which require clear evidence and the satisfaction of the Court on evidence is the condition precedent to the passing of the decree.

It has been held in *Middleton v. Baldock (T.W.) : Same v. Baldock (G.B.)*², while construing similar provisions, that the Court ought not to make the order for possession of the premises even by consent without enquiry or investigation in such matters.

It is vehemently argued by some lawyers that the Court is bound to grant unconditional leave to defend the suit in the cases of the type mentioned hereinabove, and if such leave is wrongfully refused, that is no ground to hold that the summary procedure prescribed by O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil Procedure is inappropriate for the matters governed by the Rent Act. To that argument, the answer is very simple—if it is unreasonable to apply summary procedure, it is incorrect to conclude that the summary procedure is a procedure consistent with the scheme and object of the Rent Act merely on the expectation that unconditional leave to defend the suit shall be granted in such cases. Such a question was mooted for consideration before the High Court of Bombay in a suit governed by provisions of Bombay Money-lenders Act reported in *Damji Deraaj v. Megraj B & Co.*³ Under s. 21 of the Bombay Money-lenders Act of 1946, the Court is enjoined with a duty to decide the issue in a suit to which the said Act applies as to whether the money-lender has complied with the provisions of keeping accounts etc. under ss. 18 and 19 of the Act before deciding the claim on merits. The question before the Court was as to whether the summary procedure in terms of O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil Procedure was appropriate to a suit to which the said Act applied, particularly in view of the mandatory duty of the Court to decide the issue regarding compliance with ss. 18 and 19 of the said Act in light of the argument that the said issues should be decided in presence of the defendant and the said presence would not be available if the defendant was refused leave to defend the suit. The learned Chief Justice Shri M. C. Chagla observed that the effect of refusal of leave to defend the suit or non-compliance with the conditions subject to which the leave was granted was that the mouth of the defendant was shut and the plaintiff was entitled to proceed as if the averments in the plaint were proved or admitted and to get a decree as prayed for in the plaint. In this context it must be kept in mind that there is a substantial distinction between the proof based on evidence and proof on basis of presumption arising from legal fiction. It was also observed by the learned Chief Justice that s. 29 of the Bombay Money-lenders Act could not possibly contemplate the compulsory absence of the defendant which O. XXXVII brings about on the failure of the defendant to get leave from the Court or to comply with the conditions on which leave was granted. It was also observed by the learned Judge as under (p. 1368) :

"... Therefore, it is clear to my mind that in a suit to which the Money-lenders Act applies it is difficult, if not impossible, to apply the procedure of O. XXXVII. It is possible to take the view that in every suit to which the Money-lenders Act applied and which is filed under O.XXXVII, unconditional leave should be granted. If that were done, undoubtedly the provisions of the Money-lenders Act may be given effect to. The other view is that the procedure under O.XXXVII does not and cannot apply to a suit to which the Bombay Money-lenders Act applies."

Similarly, the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act does not contemplate the compulsory absence of the defendant which might be occasioned by reason of the procedure followed under O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil procedure. If one of the possible views is that in any event the determination of these issues requires granting of unconditional leave to defend the suit, the better view is that the suit should not be allowed to be filed as a summary suit at all and that the summary procedure is in conflict with the provisions of substantive law enjoining determination of issues like that of comparative hardships in a suit for eviction on ground of reasonable and bona fide personal requirement of the premises by the landlord. It is submitted that there is no question of such issues being decided on basis of constructive admission of averments in the plaint.

The Supreme Court in Ramkarandas v. Bhagwandas decided that the appellant was not entitled to raise the contention about the inappropriateness of summary procedure or invalidity of r. 8 in the said appeal inasmuch as the appellant himself had made application to the Court of Small Causes at Bombay for setting aside the decree under O. XXXVII, r. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure and the appeal before the Supreme Court arose from the order on the said application. On merits of the contention, the Supreme Court observed that while passing a decree, the Court could exercise a discretion on the facts deemed to be admitted and exercise of discretion does not mean that in every case the defendant should have a right to place his side of the case for assisting the Court in exercise of that discretion.

A Court shall not be able to exercise its discretion in questions relating to hardship on the ground of personal requirement in absence of the defendant on the footing that the allegations in the plaint are deemed to be admitted. In such a situation, the obligation imposed upon the Court under s. 13 (2) of weighing the hardship of the landlord and the tenant can never be properly discharged in absence of the defendant. If such absence is voluntary, the defendant has to thank himself. There is no justification to regulate the right of appearance of the defendant and to prevent him from appearing before the Court to point out the hardship to be caused by passing the eviction order in terms of s. 13 (2) of the Rent Act merely by enacting a rule of procedure.

In the same connection, it is pertinent to point out the observations of his Lordship Mr. Justice Bose of the Supreme Court in *Santosh Kumar v. Mool Singh*⁴ quoting from *Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal, Kotah, Bhurey Lal Baya*⁵ to the following effect (p. 323) :

"[Rules relating to procedure are] designed to facilitate justice and further its ends; ... our laws of procedure are grounded on a principle of natural justice which requires that men should not be condemned unheard, that decisions should not be reached behind their backs, that proceedings that affect their lives and property should not continue in their absence and that they should not be precluded from participating in them."

It is, therefore, suggested that in the interest of justice the said rule be suitably amended by deleting the applicability of procedure prescribed by O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil Procedure to the matters covered by the provisions of the Bombay Rent Act.

OCCUPIER'S LIABILITY TOWARDS TRESPASSERS

THE decision of the Privy Council in Commissioner for Railways (New South Wales) v. Quinlan ([1964] 1 All E.R. 897) gives guidance on the duty, such as it is, of the occupier of land towards a trespasser. The basic rule, as everyone knows, is that the trespasser must take the state of the premises, and the activities being pursued thereon, as he finds them; and is without any remedy for any injury sustained on the premises, whether due to the state of the premises or activities going on at the time of the trespass. The trespasser has committed a wrongful act in disturbing the possession by unlawfully entering upon the land against the occupier's will. That is the general rule; but the occupier could in certain circumstances be held liable to a trespasser.

Actually in Quinlan's case the occupier was held not to be liable. It arose out of a collision between a train and a lorry on a level-crossing, and the facts must be stated at length. The Commissioner for Railways owned a stretch of railway-line over which a crossing gave access from the highway to a farm on the other side of the line. The line was fenced on both sides and the crossing had two gates, one giving access to the highway, the other to the farm. At the crossing the line ran north and south; fifty yards above the crossing there was a marked bend and a train coming round it would be obscured by a belt of trees from the sight of anyone on the crossing; vice versa, the engine driver could not see anyone on the crossing. Until 1955 the crossing was used only by the occupier of the farm and those having business with him. But in November 1955 the land on the farm side became the subject of housing development; building operations were put in hand, and a number of loads of materials were driven over the crossing. Witnesses for the Commissioner denied having seen any person or vehicle going over the crossing, or the gates open. A building contractor, by letter dated December 1, 1955, asked permission to use the crossing but was refused. On the same date the secretary of the Housing Commission also wrote asking for a like permission, but received no reply. The accident took place early in the morning of January 5, 1956, when both the gates of the crossing were open. The respondent Quinlan was driving a lorry over it, but before he got clear he was run into by a train and injured. The line before the crossing was on a down gradient and the train, with steam cut off, approached the crossing quickly and silently. Owing to the trees neither the engine driver nor his fireman could see Quinlan's truck before the train was coming round the bend when there was insufficient time to pull up before the crossing.

Quinlan had succeeded before the New South Wales trial Judge and a jury—probably, the Privy Council thought, because the jury misunderstood the relevant law. It seems to have decided on the basis that there was a likelihood of people coming to the crossing, that the appellant was aware of such likelihood, and therefore owed a duty to Quinlan as a member of the public to take reasonable precautions for his safety, notwithstanding that he was a trespasser. The full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales ordered a re-trial on the ground that the case might show that Quinlan could claim from the railway a breach of the general duty of care laid down in Donoghue v. Stevenson ([1932] All E.R. Rep. 1). The Privy Council was emphatic that Donoghue v. Stevenson cast no light on the rights and duties arising where a person injured on a railway crossing was a trespasser. Having pointed out that there was no general principle to be deduced from that decision as regards the legal rights and duties of a trespasser on a railway line, Viscount Radcliffe continued (at p. 902): "...it is not correct on principle to suppose that the mere fact that there was a likelihood, apparent to the occupier, of a trespasser being present on the crossing at some time or another is sufficient to impose on the occupier any general duty of care towards such a trespasser. The consequences of such a supposition would be far reaching indeed..."

The statement of the law applicable, which the Privy Council approved, was that of Hamilton, L.J., in Latham v. Richard Johnson and Nephew, Ltd. ([1911-13] All E.R. Rep., at pp. 124, 125): "The owner of the property is under a duty not to injure the trespasser wilfully; not to do a wilful act in reckless disregard of ordinary humanity towards him; but otherwise a man trespasses at his own risk".

This duty was further explained in 1935 by Lord Atkin who sometime before had delivered what is generally recognised as the speech in Donoghue v. Stevenson containing the kernel of the decision. In Hillen and Pettigrew v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd. ([1935] All E.R. Rep., at p. 558), Lord Atkin said: "I know of no duty to a trespasser owed by the occupier of land other than when the trespasser is known to be present, abstaining from doing an act which, if done carelessly, must reasonably be contemplated as likely to injure him and, of course, abstaining from doing acts which are intended to injure him".

It is the occupier's knowledge of the presence of the trespasser that matters. The trespasser known to be present must not be injured intentionally or recklessly. Thus, the occupier was held liable in Excelsior Wire Rope Co., Ltd. v. Callan ([1930] All E.R. Rep. 1). Again, in Addie v. Dumbreck ([1929] 4 All E.R. Rep. 1) there was an endless wire cable in a field belonging to a colliery. Colliery officials knew children used the field as a playground but never consented to this use and sometimes warned children off. A boy of four was killed by being drawn into the machinery when set in motion by colliery employees who could not see the boy. Held, the colliery was not liable; in cases of trespass there can be no difference between the case of a child and that of an adult. By contrast, in Haughton v. North British Ry. Co. (1892) 20 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 113 the railway was held liable to a child known to be in the path of a truck moving during a shunting operation.

Wanton or reckless conduct is, therefore, actionable. That does not mean that a duty of reasonable care and foresight is owed to a trespasser; he has not been promoted to the rank of "neighbour" in the Donoghue v. Stevenson sense. So the Commissioner for Railways would not be liable to the lorry driver trespassing on the level crossing unless his engine driver deliberately drove his engine at the lorry when he saw it. Even if the Commissioner was aware that the presence of a trespasser on the line at a given time was likely or possible, he still owed no duty to foresee the trespasser's presence and take care accordingly. In short, the occupier is not liable for his actions, even if dangerous, unless he knows of the trespasser's presence or it is extremely likely or very probable that the trespasser will be present. That certainly was not so in Quinlan's case.—S. J.

EMPLOYER'S DUTY TO DISCIPLINE

THE case of Veness v. Dyson, Bell & Co., which came before Widgery, J., for determination of a preliminary point of law, presented two novel problems in the law of employment. Does an employer owe a duty to prevent fellow employees, from hampering, annoying and upsetting an employee, without actually inflicting personal injury on him or her? Does an employer owe a duty not to treat an employee with discourtesy, subjecting him or her to irritation, insult and humiliation, and making him or her overwork? The plaintiff, who complained of a campaign of abuse, insult and obstruction, based her action upon the well-known principle that an employer is under a duty, both contractual and tortious, to take reasonable care for the safety of his employees, so far as reasonably foreseeable injury is concerned. There is no doubt that if, in such circumstances, physical injury is inflicted on an employee by the misconduct of fellow employees, the employer will be liable to the employee who is injured (Hudson v. Ridge Manufacturing Co., Ltd. [1957] 2 All E.R. 229). Can this apply where the employee complains of what might be termed "mental injury" by analogy with the "mental cruelty" that is often the basis of a divorce petition? From what was said by Widgery, J., it would seem that, provided such injury is reasonably foreseeable by the employer, on the basis of his knowledge, through complaints or otherwise, of what is going on in his place of employment, a breach of the employer's duty of care can occur in this, as well as in the more usual way. It would seem to be a matter of degree, dependent upon whether the employer acted reasonably or not in continuing to expose his employee to the rudeness or discourtesy of fellow-employees with knowledge of the likely result of such exposure upon the health of the employee complaining of injury. The fact that the employee concerned was sensitive to the conduct of the other employees will not of itself involve the employer in liability. The complaining employee can always choose between leaving the employment and, by remaining, continuing to accept the risks involved. There is a distinction between conduct by fellow employees that is physically dangerous and conduct that is emotionally upsetting. To be rude or discourteous, as Widgery, J., said, is not an actionable wrong, and in ordinary life the victim must either put up with it or take himself elsewhere. In some situations, however, it would seem that an employer would be obliged, contractually or otherwise, to put a stop to the kind of persecution and bullying of which the plaintiff in this action complained.

On the second point, relating to the alleged discourtesy of the employer, Widgery, J., took the view that, unless by such conduct severe emotional distress is deliberately or recklessly caused, as occurred in Wilkinson v. Downton [1895-9] All E.R. Rep. 267, no liability could ensue. Wilkinson v. Downton (supra) was the famous nervous shock case in which the defendant told the plaintiff an untrue story about her husband. A servant who is dissatisfied with her employer's personal attitude towards her or her hours of work or remuneration must put up with it or leave. Excessive hours or inadequate pay are not breaches of contract, nor torts for which there is liability. An employee can refuse to work long hours, or can leave the employment if the wages or salary are not deemed sufficient. But no complaint of personal injury can be based upon discourtesy on the part of an employer. This type of misbehaviour, if such it may be termed, cannot be brought under the rubric of the employer's duty to take reasonable care to prevent an employee from being exposed to unnecessary risks of injury. In other words, an employee may be said to have no legal right to courtesy. As regards these allegations, therefore, the learned Judge struck out the relevant paragraphs in the pleadings, permitting the action to go forward only on the ground that has been discussed above. It will be instructive to see whether, if the case comes to trial, there will be a finding in the plaintiff's favour. Though this would seem now, as a result of the judgment of Widgery, J., to be largely a question of fact, there is certainly an interesting element of law involved.—L.J.

NEGLIGENCE AND FORESEEABILITY

In Doughty v. Turner Manufacturing Company Limited, 235 L.T. 39, the plaintiff workman was injured at the factory where he worked when another workman inadvertently knocked a loose asbestos cement cover and caused it to fall four to six inches into a cauldron of extremely hot molten liquid. The extreme heat caused the asbestos cement to undergo a chemical change creating or releasing water, which turned to steam which one or two minutes later caused an eruption of the molten liquid from the cauldron. The plaintiff was injured by some of this erupted liquid. Until the accident had been investigated no one knew or suspected that heat would cause this chemical change in asbestos cement, but (as the trial judge found) the plaintiff's employers should have realised that dropping the cover into the liquid might cause a dangerous splash: the plaintiff, however, was not injured by any splash, and at the time when he was injured any danger from splashing had ceased. In an action by the plaintiff against his employers in negligence:

Held, the employers were not liable because the eruption which injured the plaintiff was unforeseeable by a reasonable man at the time when the accident happened, and because, although risk by splashing was foreseeable, this was an accident of an entirely different kind, its cause being the intrusion of a new and unexpected factor, viz. the chemical change of the compound asbestos cement at high temperatures. *Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Limited v. BEQUEST FOR FINDING THE BACON-SHAKESPEARE MANUSCRIPTS.

By her will the testatrix bequeathed one-third of her residuary estate to the Francis Bacon Society "towards finding the Bacon-Shakespeare manuscripts and, in the event of the same being discovered by the date of my death, then for the general purposes of work and propaganda of the society." The testatrix died on 7th April, 1961, and the sum in question was £6,500. The society was formed in 1903 and the testatrix had been a member of it for many years. Its main objects as at the date of the will and the date of the testatrix's death were "to encourage the study of the works of Francis Bacon, also his character, genius, and life; his influence on his own and succeeding times and the tendencies and results of his writings; and to encourage the general study of the evidence in favour of Francis Bacon's authorship of the plays commonly ascribed to Shakespeare, and to investigate his connection with other works of the Elizabethan period." The society was registered as a charity under the Charities Act, 1960. Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the gift, since it was not a gift to the society absolutely but upon a stated trust, the trustees took out a summons to determine whether the gift was a valid charitable trust. Wilberforce, J., said that the search for the Bacon-Shakespeare manuscripts was not so manifestly futile that the court should not allow the bequest to be spent upon it as upon an object devoid of the possibility of any result. A bequest for the purpose of search or research for the original manuscripts of England's greatest dramatist, whoever he was, would be well within the law's conception of charitable purposes because it was for improvement of our literary heritage. He would declare that the gift was a valid charitable trust. (In re Hopkins's Will Trusts).—(A.R.) S.J.

REVIEWS.

Principles and Precedents of Pleadings. By V. M. SHUKLA, LL.M., Advocate. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, 34, Lalbagh. 1965. Roy. 8vo. Pages 1022. Price Rs. 27.50.

THIS is a welcome addition to the literature on a subject which is of paramount importance to every practising lawyer. The book opens with a section which deals with general rules of pleading and deals with such topics as alternative pleas, cause of action, jurisdiction, interrogatories and affidavits. The next section contains precedents and forms of pleadings relating to suits, particulars to be given in actions on contract and tort and defences to such actions. The last section gives precedents and forms of pleadings relating to petitions under the Civil Procedure Code and various other enactments like the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, the Arbitration Act, 1940, the Companies Act, 1956 and the Indian Succession Act, 1925. This exhaustive compendium of forms and precedents considered against the background of their underlying principles will be of much use not only to the busy practitioner but also to the neophyte in the profession.

Commentaries on the U. P. Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. By KIRPA DAYAL SHRIVASTAVA. Second Edition, 1965. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, 34 Lalbagh. Roy. 8vo. Pages 545. Price Rs. 25.

THIS Act which was passed to meet the special circumstances of industrial peace in Uttar Pradesh was brought into force on February 1, 1948, and since then has been amended a number of times till its amendment in 1957 has made the Act very comprehensive. Since the publication of the first edition of this book some far-reaching changes have been effected in the Central Industrial Disputes Act of 1947. All this has necessitated revision which has been carried out now and the case law bearing on the subject has been brought up to date. The various provisions of the Act are lucidly explained and are examined in the broader context of an industrial legislation which is aimed at maintaining industrial peace and the voluntary settlement of industrial disputes. The appendices contain useful material including the various Rules and Orders made under the Act. In a work of this nature a table of cases could well have been included. The book should prove useful to all those who have to deal with this piece of labour legislation.

Hindu Law. By PREM NATH CHADHA, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, Supreme Court of India. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. Demi 8vo. Pages 486. Price Rs. 12.

THIS brief survey of Hindu Law which first appeared some seven years ago, in its present third edition has been revised and enlarged, in the light of recent decisions of the various High Courts and the Supreme Court, reference to which has been brought down to the end of January 1965. The appendices contain the full texts of the four Acts relating to Hindu succession, marriage, adoption and maintenance and guardianship. These also give Rules framed by the different High Courts under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. This being pre-eminently a student's book the author has surveyed the entire law on the subject with commendable brevity and lucidity. The old Hindu law as well as what Dr. Derrett rightly calls the anglo-Hindu law as affected by legislative enactments are clearly explained. The ease law is judiciously chosen and the principles deduced therefrom are succinctly set forth. An excellent vade-mecum for students on this branch of law.

Principles of Equity. By G. P. SINGH, B.SC., LL.M. Advocate. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh. Demi 8vo. Pages 438. Price Rs. 10.

THIS book which is prepared as a text-book for law students explains the principles of English equity and its bearings on the Indian legal system as envisaged in the Specific Relief Act and the Indian Trusts Act. The re-enactment of the law of specific relief in 1963 necessitated major changes in this third edition of the book which also incorporates recent statute and case law on the subject. The topics dealt with are the nature and scope of equity, the maxims of equity, equitable rights, trusts and equitable remedies or specific reliefs, the latter two considered at great length as being branches of equitable jurisdiction common to both English and Indian law. The author has clearly explained the principles underlying the equity jurisdiction not only with the help of select English and Indian decisions but has liberally drawn upon English authorities. This is an eminently suitable book for students going up for their law examinations.

Domestic Tribunals and Administrative Jurisdictions. By SURANJAN CHAKRAVERTI, M.A., B.L. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. Demi 8vo. Pages 100. Price Rs. 5.

DOMESTIC Tribunals are defined by the author as non-judicial bodies when they act judicially and in this brochure he examines the law applicable to these bodies and the constitution and powers of some of the more important ones. In this exposition of the rules of natural justice the author has extensively referred to judicial pronouncements. The book is addressed to persons who are called upon to preside over such tribunals and they will find here much to interest and instruct them.

JOURNAL

HON'BLE MR. H. K. CHAINANI.

TO the many tributes which were paid to the memory of the Hon'ble Mr. Chainani, who died on November 28, 1965, we may add our humble tribute and our sense of personal loss. Notwithstanding his heavy judicial and administrative duties, he could always spare some time for our Journal and he made it a point to meticulously go through the reports of the judgments submitted for approval and to make corrections in his neat and clear handwriting. Persons who knew him and came in daily touch with him, either in Court or outside it, are better qualified to appreciate the qualities of a man who was a great gentleman and an urbane Judge. We were more concerned with the finished product of his mind, namely, the judgments which he delivered during his tenure on the Bench.

One outstanding merit of his judgments was the clarity of expression reflecting the working of a clear and incisive mind which through a tangled mass of facts and law arrived at the heart of the problem involved. His approach was logical, which started with a consideration of the relevant provisions of the statute, followed by a discussion of the case law cited in Court, and ended with a lucid interpretation of the law, stated with conciseness and precision. To some his approach may have seemed impersonal and jejune, but his aim was not to excel in the niceties of style or elaboration of legal subtleties but, in the words of an eminent jurist, to do justice between citizens on concrete issues. He administered law as he found it without losing sight of the broader concepts of justice and humanity. Some of the memorable judgments he delivered during his Chief Justiceship may be recalled here: Bombay Municipal Corp. v. Ramchandra (61 Bom. L.R. 1129) where whether a resolution passed by the Corporation to express regret at the execution of a former Prime Minister of Hungary was ultra vires the Corporation was considered; The State of Bombay v. K. M. Nanavati (62 Bom. L.R. 383) where the constitutional question involving the powers of the Governor of a State vis-a-vis art. 161 of the Constitution was discussed; Manohar v. Konkan Co.-op. Housing Socy. (63 Bom. L.R. 1001) and I. R. Hingorani v. Pravinchandra (67 Bom. L.R. 306) which dealt with the law relating to co-operative societies and State v. Bennett Coleman Co. Ltd. (66 Bom. L.R. 147) where the applicability of the Prize Competitions Act, 1955, to competitions was considered. Besides these he had delivered many far-reaching judgments dealing with Tenancy and Industrial laws which will be found enshrined in the law reports.

His activities were however not merely confined to his judicial duties but he took a keen interest in education to which he devoted his spare time. Our association with him after nearly two decades, during which he rendered all possible help to us, has now ended with his tragic passing away and the least that we can do is to offer our heartfelt condolences to Mrs. Chainani and the members of his family for the irreparable loss they have suffered.

Requiescat in pace.

On November 30, 1965, all the Judges of the High Court, members of the Bar, Attorneys and the staff of the High Court gathered in the Central Court Room at 10.30 A.M. when the Hon'ble Mr. Y. S. Tambe, Acting Chief Justice, made a reference to the late Hon'ble Mr. Chainani.

The Hon'ble Mr. Y. S. Tambe, Acting Chief Justice, said.—

Mr. Advocate General, Mr. Government Pleader, Mr. President of the Western India Advocates' Association, Mr. President of the Incorporated Law Society, Members of the Bar, and friends:

We assemble here to mourn the premature and tragic death of Mr. Hashmathrai Khubchand Chainani, our highly esteemed Chief Justice.

Chief was born on February 29, 1904. He had his early education in Hyderabad (Sind), and had passed the Matriculation examination at the age of 16. After prosecuting further studies in D. J. Sind College at Karachi, he proceeded to England and joined the Magdalene College at Cambridge. In 1925 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In the next year, he competed for the Indian Civil Service and stood first. In the year 1927, he joined duties in India. For the first 5 or 6 years, he served on the Executive side, but in 1933 he came to the Judiciary, and in 1933 he acted as the Assistant Judge at Poona. Soon thereafter he was appointed as a District Judge at Sholapur. In 1935 he was appointed the Secretary of the Legislative Council and Assistant Legal Remembrancer, and the Legislative Council later became the Legislative Assembly of the State, of which also he acted as the Secretary. In his Secretaryship of the Legislative Assembly, he was associated with and was responsible for drafting many legislative measures including the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, a fore-runner of industrial legislation in India. Again, in the year 1944, he acted as the Joint Secretary of the Government of Bombay, Home Department. Subsequently, he was transferred as the Deputy Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department. Later, he was posted at Surat as the District and Sessions Judge, and thereafter he was transferred to Ahmedabad as District and Sessions Judge. In the years 1947-48, he held the post of Commissioner, Central Division, and on August 28, 1948, he was appointed a Puisne Judge of this High Court.

It would be seen that he came to the Bench equipped with a very wide and varied experience in administrative, legislative and judicial spheres. In September 1958, he was appointed to perform the duties of the Chief Justice of this High Court, during the absence of the then Chief Justice M. C. Chagla. Three months later, he was made permanent in this post. He was the first Indian Civil Servant to occupy the post of the Chief Justice of this Court.

During his term as Chief Justice, he was twice appointed to act as Governor of Maharashtra—in October 1962, on the sudden death of the then Governor Dr. Subbarayan, and in September 1963 when the then Governor Mrs. Vijayalaxmi Pandit led the Indian Delegation to the United Nations.

On 14th of this month, at about 8.30 p.m., he was hit by a motor car, received severe injuries including concussion of brain, and in an unconscious condition was removed to the hospital. After a grim fight for 14 days, and in spite of the best efforts on the part of the doctors, his near relations and friends, he breathed his last, last Sunday at about 8.30 p.m. plunging all of us in grief. His accidental death has rudely shocked not only his colleagues, members of the bar and the staff of the High Court, but also the citizens of Bombay; and the manner in which he met his death is a matter of concern to all of us.

All the 38 years of his service are characterised by three principles: He thought, acted and behaved as an Indian and not as a person belonging to any caste, creed or community, province or State. Secondly, he was civil to every one with whom he came in contact; and lastly, he tried his utmost to be of service to others. In its true sense, he thought and behaved as an Indian Civil Servant.

Friends, we all know that he held this high office of tradition for the last seven years with distinction and credit. He possessed qualities necessary for an ideal Judge. He heard patiently, he interfered very little with the arguments of counsel, and decided cases without fear or favour. He possessed a keen legal acumen which was accompanied by profound study of law. His mind was never closed to arguments, and he was always open to persuasion. As an administrator, he was very thorough, and had passion for details. There is no file which he has not studied carefully and wholly. He tried to secure speedy disposal of cases. In his behaviour both towards his colleagues, staff and members of the Bar, he was very polite. I have not heard during the last eight years I am associated with him a single harsh word uttered by the Chief Justice to any one. Truly, the Governor has described him as a "urbane gentleman". Work in Court was not the be all and end all of his activities. He had kept himself busy with social work also, and his principal passion was the field of education. Yesterday, at the Crematorium, a considerable number of students had assembled to pay their homage to the departed soul. Some of them asked me to whom they should express the grief and offer condolences.

Friends, the Judiciary has lost a distinguished Judge, the State has also lost an able Administrator, the City of Bombay has lost a silent but very devoted social worker, and we have lost an esteemed friend and our leader. The loss would not be easily repaired.

On behalf of Brother Judges and on behalf of myself, we place on record our deep sense of sorrow and grief at the tragic death of our Chief, and convey to Mrs. Chainani, his son, his daughter and his relations, our profound sense of sorrow and convey to them our deepest condolences and sympathies. We share their grief and are with them in their bereavement.

May his soul rest in peace.

I request you all to observe two minutes' silence as a mark of respect to the departed soul, after the reference is over.

Mr. H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, said.—

My Lords, yesterday, with every mark of public esteem and private sorrow we laid to rest our late Chief Justice. Tributes have been paid to him from the highest in the land—the President of India, the Governor of Maharashtra—to the humblest citizen who filed past his bier yesterday. But he belonged to this Court in a manner in which he belonged to no one else. The best years of his life were spent here and we members of the Bar join Your Lordships in mourning what is a common sorrow. The question keeps recurring to us: "Surely this was unnecessary". But the ways of Providence are inscrutable and we have to bow to the inevitable.

This is not the time to assess the work which he did as a Judge. That will be done by the historian of the future. But we would like to recall some of the things which endeared him to us, things which the historian would like to know as coming from men who practised in his Court. He came to us in 1948 with the wide and varied experience to which my Lord the Acting Chief Justice has referred. As a civil servant familiar with the districts, as a Secretary of the Legislature familiar with the working of the constitutional machinery, as a Remembrancer of Legal Affairs familiar with the legal affairs of the State and as a Secretary in the Home Department familiar with the problems of law and order, he brought to his work an experience which is not to be gathered from books and which was reflected in his judgments, particularly in matters of constitutional law.

I would like today for a while to dwell on some of the things which linger in my memory. He came to us in 1948 and I remember he was a vacation Judge. My learned friend Mr. Vachha and I had a complicated interim matter before him. We were resigned to an hour and a half of argument. We wondered how the Judge would deal with a commercial matter. We went to his Chamber. He said to me: "Isn't this order enough to protect you?" I said "Yes". He passed the order and said "I do not want to hear the case hereafter because the father of the plaintiff was a very great friend of mine." We came out delighted with the speed, thoroughness and impartiality with which the Judge had decided the matter.

Another case lingers in my memory. It was a party in person arguing before a Division Bench consisting of Mr. Justice Rajadhyaksha and Mr. Justice Chainani. The conduct of the petitioner to his father was so disgraceful that Mr. Justice Rajadhyaksha got angry and excited and would have dismissed the petition on a ground which would have been wholly untenable. Quietly, firmly but persuasively he dislodged his brother Judge from that position and the petition was dismissed on a ground which was unassailable.

These were the judicial qualities which were brought to his work and I would like for a while to dwell on the qualities which we at the Bar noticed in him. He was a Puisne Judge for ten years and we noticed that he was careful and meticulous and paid attention to details and facts. He disliked, or it would be more accurate to say, he distrusted rhetoric, although he was not insensitive to its charms, and although, as his speech on the death of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, shows he was capable of emotional oratory if he chose to adopt it. But he looked upon a purple passage in a judgment as a poor substitute for clear thinking, and he resisted the fatal temptation to dictate a judgment on the spot in important matters, with the result that his judgments on important questions are well arranged, well argued, business like and workmanlike performances. He may be right or he may be wrong, but in clear lucid language he left you in no doubt about what he wanted to decide and what he had decided.

As to his courtesy to the Bar, that was proverbial and he had engaging and winning ways and a smile for all. When he assumed the high office of the Chief Justice on December 8, 1958, my learned friend, the then Government Pleader, now a member of your Lordship's Bench, voiced his fear by expressing the hope that the immense administrative duties of the Chief Justice would not deprive him of that smile which was always his. He expressed that fear because when the great cricketer Don Bradman became the skipper of the Australian team he lost his smile and it may be that in skippering the High Court Bench the same thing might happen to the Chief Justice. The learned Chief Justice in his modest manner assured the Government Pleader that he would be what he had always been, and no promise was more accurately fulfilled. The smile that was his never left him. His courtesy was uniform, though no doubt apart from purely judicial work heavy demands were made on his time by his administrative duties. My Lords, in matters of administration and policy differences are bound to arise, but he never allowed them to cloud personal friendship or courtesy and never allowed them to deflect him from the course of judicial conduct.

We mourn today a distinguished Judge and a public servant who has served his day and his generation to the best of his capacity. It is true that he drove others hard, but he drove himself much harder.

On this sad occasion our thoughts go out to the members of his family, particularly to his wife who has borne during these fourteen days the pain and suffering from which he was mercifully spared. I would, My Lords, on behalf of the Bar request your Lordships to convey not only your deepest sympathy and sorrow but ours to his wife and all the members of his family in their grave and irreparable loss.

Mr. R. B. Kotwal, Government Pleader, said.—

My Lords, I associate myself with all that has been said by my Lord the Chief Justice and by the learned Advocate General. We are meeting this morning under circumstances which are tragic in the extreme. The Chief Justice of Maharashtra has died as a result of a motor accident. It is indeed an irony of fate that a Judge who always took a compassionate view of the guilt of the accused in motor accident cases should himself have fallen a prey to a motor accident.

Chief Justice Chainani was born in 1904. He was educated at Karachi and Cambridge and he joined the Indian Civil Service in 1927. He was first appointed in the Revenue Department as Assistant Collector. But the judicial bent of his mind soon induced him to opt for the judicial line. He served first as Assistant Judge and then as District Judge in various districts. He was Revenue Commissioner in 1948 when he was elevated to the Bench and in 1958 he became Chief Justice of this Court.

Chief Justice Chainani had a passion for justice and the justice he meted out was always tempered with mercy. Even though he never hesitated to be stern when justice demanded it, his decisions had always a soft inner lining of kind-heartedness. Towards Government his attitude was equally balanced. He never allowed the State to commit an aggression on the rights of the citizens, but at the same time he fully appreciated the difficulties of those who had to run the Government, and never hastily criticized the Government. Chief Justice Chainani presided over the Bench of seven Judges specially constituted to examine the legality of the Governor's order passed in the famous Nanavaty Case. He had the privilege of being the Chief Justice of this Court when it completed a hundred years of its useful existence and celebrated the centenary in 1962. He was twice appointed Governor of this State for short periods and during one of these periods he presided over the centenary celebrations of the Western India Advocates' Association. The speech which he then made and the manner in which he took part freely in all the functions during those celebrations show how great was his love and respect for the Bar. No wonder the Bar reciprocated with an equal amount of love and respect for their Chief Justice.

Chief Justice Chainani after a life dedicated to hard and sincere work was about to retire from service very soon and to start enjoying the well earned rest of his life. But the rest which he was destined to enjoy was not the earthly rest in life but the divine rest in death.

My Lords, my heart aches within me when I think of the terrible disaster that has fallen on Mrs. Chainani and the whole family. God and time alone can heal their broken hearts. All that we humans at the present moment can do is to send out our heart-felt sympathies to this unfortunate family. May the departed soul rest in peace.

Mr. K. B. Sukthankar, President, Western India Advocates' Association, said.—

On behalf of the Advocates' Association of Western India I associate myself in paying homage to the memory of the late Chief Justice and with all that has been said by your Lordship, the Advocate General and the Government Pleader. But for the poignant tragedy that overtook Chief Justice Chainani a fortnight ago, we would have met here exactly three months hence to give an affectionate farewell to the Chief Justice. Chief Justice Chainani had made great efforts to minimise the proverbial law's delays. He used to say that those persons who felt irritated at being hustled subsequently came to thank him for taking away the burden of arrears in Courts of law. Chief Justice Chainani had a penchant for bringing about amicable settlement between litigants and there are innumerable agriculturists both landlords and tenants in the districts of Maharashtra who bless him for bringing about an end to the bitter feelings between landlord and tenant throughout Maharashtra. Bernard Shaw has given the definition of a gentleman. He says that a gentleman is a person who gives back to society a little more than what he has received from it. Chief Justice Chainani has given to society much more than what he has received from it. He was connected with at least three educational institutions and took active interest in the affairs of the societies with which he was connected. There have been great Judges, there have been good Judges. Chief Justice Chainani was a great Judge and a good Judge, but above all he was a humane Judge. May his soul rest in peace.

Mr. R. A. Gagrath, President, Incorporated Law Society, said.—

My Lords, on behalf of the Bombay Incorporated Law Society and myself I join my Lord the Acting Chief Justice and my learned friends who have addressed before me, in the sentiments of sorrow that they have expressed on the sad and untimely death of our late Chief Justice. Death takes the toll of anyone of us at any time, but we deeply regret the manner in which and the circumstances under which his Lordship met his untimely death. Throughout the period when I had the privilege to meet his Lordship in connection with the affairs of our Society we always found him courteous and considerate and he dealt with us with the utmost understanding and consideration. Although his Lordship occupied the high office of the Chief Justice, he never made a show of himself and his simple style and graces were carried by him throughout the end of his life. I have no further words to add than what has been already spoken by the previous speakers and I convey to your Lordships on behalf of the Society and myself our sincere condolence on the death of a valued colleague and to Mrs. Chainani and the members of his family our sincere sympathy on the sad loss they have suffered as a result of the death of a beloved head of their family. May his soul rest in eternal peace.

After the reference was over, two-minutes' silence was observed.

RENUNCIATION : AN ESSAY IN ANGLO-HINDU LAW.*

In a review of a European author's book on Hindu law an Indian law teacher asked, "What is Anglo-Hindu law?" This paper will throw light on that question. The expression "Hindu law" is merely the label by which the personal law is identified. The various sources, or components of it, have to be detailed separately. If the problem arises in India in the law of nullity of marriage or succession to the property of a Hindu dying after the commencement of the Hindu Succession Act, the source is naturally the relevant part of the Hindu Code. We are then in the realm of Modern Hindu Law. But if the problem arises in the field of the joint Hindu family the source is not the Code but that strange amalgam of ancient commentatorial opinion and judicial construction and adaptation which is called "Anglo-Hindu law" to distinguish it from the true Hindu law, the sastric law which continued its own existence outside the Courts and irrespective of governmental agencies. The India of the British period had its Anglo-Indian aspects: it was neither truly Indian nor truly British. The law of British India was Anglo-Indian, neither truly English nor truly Indian. It became however, sub modo, part of modern India's heritage, and the surviving portions of Anglo-Hindu law, like Anglo-Muhammadan law, are features of the current (but hardly "modern") Indian scene. Anglo-Hindu law is not Modern Hindu law, though for the time being it is still part of the current Hindu law for India, as it is for a number of other jurisdictions as well.

This paper will study a very curious case which entirely exemplifies the condition and nature of Anglo-Hindu law, and especially its uneasy relationship to sastric law. The case of *Anjaneyulu v Ramayya*¹ was decided by a full bench of five judges in the Andhra Pradesh High Court, P. Chandra Reddy, C. J., Manohar Pershad, Chandrasekhara Sastry, Narasimham, and Gopal Rao Ekbote, JJ. Such a large bench was needed because the question at issue involved considering the correctness of a Madras full bench answer, namely that in *Ramayya v. Venkataraju*², which was not only in the same field but actually with reference to the same family and the identical set of facts, though the parties and ultimate issues differed. It is a quite extraordinary thing for one full bench to hold that another full bench was wrong on facts and possibly in law in dealing with problems of one and the same family. It adds piquancy to the situation that the Andhra Pradesh High Court was sitting in judgment, virtually, on the learning and ability of the Madras High Court, which remains in every sense its elder brother. For students of Hindu law the result should be welcome, since every full bench answer is to be treated seriously, and to have one on top of another should give us well considered and matured learning. Readers in Maharashtra cannot afford to smile indulgently at the errors now purported to have been discovered in a Madras judgment: if the Andhra Pradesh decision is correct law for Andhra Pradesh it is bound to be considered in Madras itself, and will be a strong candidate to be followed in Maharashtra. The present writer believes that Anjaneyulu, for all its five Judges, was wrong, because it does not represent what the Anglo-Hindu law truly is on this admittedly difficult subject. This does not mean that Madras was literally right either. As we wend our way through the intricate maze of this legal conundrum, we shall inevitably reach the conclusion that the subject in issue, namely renunciation, is as yet imperfectly understood. It would always be better to start with the sastric law on the subject: yet this is something which advocates seem hardly ever to do, and naturally most Judges follow their customary technique, and approach the sastra through the eyes of early English Judges, which cannot help, sometimes, being a distorted point of view.

*By Prof. J. Duncan M. Derrett, University of London.

Let us first review the facts. The law is apt to confuse if one approaches it from the back end, as it were, and even if we shall, on the contrary, start from the beginning: but the facts of the case in themselves are, fortunately, very simple. A family consisted of F, the father (called Ramaiah), his son, S (called Nageswara), and S's son SSI (called Pedda Anjaneyulu). They were an undivided Mitakshara family. S was improvident and incurred debts indiscriminately, and was pressed by creditors. He was induced to execute a document the operative portion of which reads as follows:

"I have for the benefit of you the members of our joint family and the male issue that may be born to me hereafter, relinquished the entire right, title and interest possessed by me in the moveable and immoveable properties as well as assets and liabilities of our joint family, and executed and delivered this release deed in your favour creating in your favour all absolute right, title, possession and interest. I have hereby relinquished the right, title and interest possessed by me in the entire moveable and immoveable properties as well as the assets and liabilities of our family. The male issue that may be born to us hereafter shall, according to Hindu law, enjoy the same with all absolute rights of gift, transfer, exchange and sale, bearing all the liabilities in respect thereof."

In a suit brought later by a creditor of S against all three persons a personal decree was passed against S. In execution the decree-holder proceeded against the family properties (naturally on the footing that the judgment-debtor was joint at the time of the decree). F and SSI protested. The execution Court sustained attachment against the shares of SSI on the footing that the debts were pre-partition debts binding on SSI under the pious obligation, and assuming the renunciation to have left SSI with one half of the joint estate, that half was liable for his father's debts. The full bench of the Madras High Court, before whom the problem at length came, held that the decree against the father alone could not be executed without more ado against properties allotted to the son. The basis of this decision in point of fact was that S, by executing that document, severed himself from the family, taking no share, whereupon SSI became separated from his father, so that a separate suit must be filed (in the traditional Madras view) against SSI before his liability under the pious obligation could be established.

SSI later died, leaving F the sole surviving coparcener. A few years later a creditor of the family obtained decrees against F. Certain properties were attached. SS2, a son born to S after S executed that release deed, petitioned for the release of the attachment quoad his half share in the family properties, on the footing that by birth and irrespective of his father's renunciation he had acquired title to the estate. This was a failure. Family property passed into the hands of third parties. In order to recover part of this property SS2, evidently with the connivance of F, instituted a suit for partition against F and the alienees, alleging a former partition between F and SS2, and claiming a half share on the footing that S released his interest in favour of S's sons to be born in the future also. Quite how one can release in favour of persons not in existence was naturally a point left in the air, but the fundamental Mitakshara law must have served, somehow, as basis for his contention.

S executed the release deed in 1946. SS2 was born in 1950. The alienees claimed that SS2 acquired by birth no interest in the properties which had vested solely in F after SS1 had died in 1949. The issue was contested whether the lives of SS1 and SS2 overlapped. But since SS1 died on October 12, 1949 and SS2 was born on July 29, 1950, it would be difficult to prove that the lives overlapped. Yet another son was born to S, and SS3 was thus added as co-plaintiff in this partition action. The trial Court held that there had not been a partition between F and SS1, that the two lives had not overlapped, and that SS2 acquired an interest in the properties of F. It was against this decision that the appeal eventually came to the Andhra High Court. The position adopted was that S had separated from his father and son in 1946 (the view, as we have seen, taken by the Madras High Court), but that he had separated without taking any share for himself. His afterborn sons could therefore reopen that partition. Alternatively if it was a relinquishment in favour of children to be born subsequently they could succeed on that footing. Since the deed had already been construed by a full bench, the question, if the first and second pleas were both to be considered had to be referred to a fuller bench.

The Andhra Pradesh full bench were pressed hard to treat the Madras construction as res judicata, whereupon reliance could be placed on the case of Athilinga (to which we return). But it was discovered, as his Lordship, Chandra Reddy C.J., points out at p. 181, that the Madras Courts had assumed, without proving, that the release deed operated as a partition, and that property had somehow been allotted to SS1. Since the construction was not so much a matter of judgment as of assumption, the Andhra Court had no difficulty in proceeding to construe the document for itself.

The result is shortly stated (p. 181) :

"...We feel that the relinquishment of a share by one of the co-parceners in favour of the other members does not alter the status of the joint family. The releasor alone separates himself from the family...."

For the general proposition there was indeed abundant authority. *Venkatapathi v. Venkatanarasimha*³ illustrated the rule that the relinquishment of one member had no effect on the status of the others. The Privy Council said (p. 267) :

"...The only effect of renunciation is to reduce the number of the persons to whom shares would be allotted, if, and when, a division of the estate takes place."

The same point is made by the Supreme Court in Rukhmabai v. Laxminarayan.⁴ One could go further and refine the statement : in fact a renunciation of his share at a particular partition does not automatically or necessarily preclude the renouncing member's remaining joint, so that he can participate later (see *Krishnan v. C. Kesavan*⁵); but such considerations did not arise in this case. As a result it was concluded that S separated himself from his family, leaving F and SS1 as coparceners, so that when SS1 died (SS2 not yet being in the womb), F became sole coparcener.

The question now remained, whether SS2 and SS3 obtained any interest in F's property by birth. Let us first look into the sastric position. Their Lordships did so after the usual fashion, i.e. after first consulting Anglo-Hindu cases, including obiter dicta in cases not closely resembling this one, and then turned to sastric texts on partition selected from a point of view already established by the trend of the (inconclusive) case-law. They also paid attention to the point of view of the editor of Mayne's eleventh edition, p. 522, a point of view not based on an unprejudiced re-examination of the sastric material, as we shall see.

The fundamental question is not so much what S did, as what SS2 and SS3 gained by their birth. The Mitakshara doctrine, as everyone knows, is that by birth alone a grandson acquires proprietary right of an "unobstructed" character in his grandfather's property, whether the grandfather be alive or dead⁶. They obtain their rights through their fathers, but "through" means only for purposes of calculation, and not on condition that their fathers should be alive at the date of their birth, provided, that is to say, (i) their fathers did not separate taking a share or renouncing their share, and (ii) if such a separation did not take place the father was not disqualified by a disqualification such as automatically disqualified his immediate issue.⁷ At pure sastric law a father can separate taking his son with him, and this writer suspects (though he is not certain) that this power extended to the major son as well as the minor son (the latter only can be separated at Anglo-Hindu law). At pure sastric law, again, a father could renounce his share, taking a trifle for evidential purposes, and thereby terminate all his sons' interests in the ancestral property, subject to a definite condition, namely, that the father anticipates no need, on the part of his branch, of his branch's share of the ancestral assets.

Yajnavalkya II. 116 (Colebrooke numbered it 117) :

"The separation of one, who is able to support himself and is not desirous of participation, may be completed by giving him some trifle."

Mitakshara on this⁸ :

"To one who is himself able to earn wealth, and who is not desirous of sharing his father's goods, any thing whatsoever, though not valuable, may be given, and the separation or division may be thus completed by the father; so that the children, or other heirs, of that son, may have no future claim of inheritance."

To confirm that this does indeed represent the sastric law we need do nothing more elaborate than look up Yajn. II. 116 in the Dharma-kosha of L.S. Joshi published at Wai, to which this writer has already referred often in the pages of this journal. There at Vyavahara-kanda, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 1169, we have besides the commentary of Vijnanesvara those of Visvarupa and Apararka. The first says that the renouncer must be able to support his family and attend to all religious duties without the aid of the father's assets. The basis of the rule is the fundamental power of the father to make (at that time) unequal distribution (as Yajn. II. 116 goes on to say in fact), so that if the renouncer accepts knowingly and subject to the conditions stated a share very much less than he was entitled to, he cannot subsequently come back and demand a full share, or demand enough to make up the trifle he has taken into a full share. The comment of Apararka is extraordinarily interesting for our purposes, as it incidentally applies to exactly such cases as our present case and that in *Abhiram Sabal v. Shyamsundar*⁹. Apararka says that these gifts of trifles for the purpose of separating sons may be made by their fathers either when the sons do not want to participate because they are able to acquire wealth for themselves, or when "though able to earn wealth they make no effort tending towards acquisition and preservation of assets by reason of natural depravity." Thus the father has power to force on his son a separation in the nature of what we should call renunciation, giving him a token, as a punishment for his non-cooperative outlook and a neutralisation of the latter so far as the family's interests are concerned. Apararka confines this discretion on the part of the father to joint acquisitions by father and sons : in ancestral property however the erring son is entitled to his full share, should he insist upon it.

The result is that at pure sastric law grandsons could be excluded from their interests in ancestral and joint-family property if their fathers had renounced by separating themselves and taking, for evidential purposes, a token share, a 'trifle'. Let us suppose, in the pre-British period, a father consisting of F, his son S, and S's son, SSI. S is a wastrel and is induced to leave the family, leaving SSI behind. S would normally be given one half of the property; but in the circumstances he takes a minute fraction, a trifle. What effect did this have on SSI? If S was capable of maintaining himself and his family naturally SSI would be excluded. It would be up to F to make gifts of affection to him as and when appropriate. But if the renunciation were the result of S's misconduct, and a kind of punishment (as in our case), the debarring of his issue could not take place merely by S's 'renunciation'. In other words, SSI's one-quarter (one-half of the normal one-half), belonging to him by virtue of his birthright, would remain unaffected by the transaction with S. S would have the right to take it away with him, and he might waste it, if SSI could not prevent it or F did not take steps to keep SSI's share with him. If SSI were a major he could insist upon a partition at the same time as his father's renunciation, and thus secure his share.

What if SS2 were conceived to S and born after the renunciation? His birthright would not extend to any part of F's property, because he would be conceived and born to one separated. His situation would be quite different from that of his brother SSI, who was born before separation and whose rights would in one way or another be protected.

Has the Anglo-Hindu law departed from this, and if so with what effects? Firstly, the Anglo-Hindu case-law did not admit that a father could renounce any interest except his own.¹⁰ The importance of this departure is fundamental. The renunciation can never be in favour of anyone individually and must operate, if at all, for the benefit of the entire coparcenary body. The 'trifle' is no longer necessary, because renunciation can be evidenced otherwise and perhaps more effectively. A member who renounces will not cut off the birthright of any of his sons. But it may be objected that sons conceived and born subsequently to his renunciation must be effected by the separation which that renunciation effects so far as he himself is concerned. They are born to a separated father, and must suffer the consequences, taking him and his property as they find it. This would seem to agree with the sastric position. Yet there is something unsatisfactory about such a situation. Let us compare it with the position of sons conceived and born after a partition in the ordinary way. F has two sons, S1 and S2, and separates from them, giving each a one-third share. Afterwards another son S3 is conceived. S3 must rest content with F's share and at partition would take one-sixth. This is clear on the texts and the law does not deviate from it.¹¹ The clue is simple. The father's rights were satisfied at the partition, and the subsequently conceived son cannot complain. The position is quite different if the father's rights were not satisfied, as if he were unjustly deprived of a share, or, as in the renunciation cases, the condition had not been observed, namely that he had sufficient assets for the maintenance of himself and his family. What S did in our instant case was to reserve for himself a right of maintenance. He did not take any share, and he did nothing to provide for his future issue. The statement that he renounced in favour of all members including those to be born subsequently was of no value, as the decision of the Andhra High Court shows. Only the law could protect SS2 and SS3, and in this case it failed to do so.

We must now examine the valuable case of *Athilinga v. Ramaswami*¹² which jurists have sought to limit in its application with a curious and quite unwarranted unanimity. The case is an instance (contrary to what their Lordships of the Andhra High Court suggest) of judicial legislation, by drawing out of the former incompleted law what in essence it potentially contained for the solution of a new problem. It is evidence that during the British period the Hindu law was not stagnant, as is so often said; and it should therefore be cherished. The facts were these, that a Hindu had two wives, and one son by one of them and two by the other, all being at the relevant time minors. He partitioned the family property alloting one share to the senior wife and her son and two shares to the junior wife and her sons. He retained property for his own maintenance without power of alienation, and retained no share for himself otherwise. He provided that sons to be born subsequently should share in the shares already allotted, according to mothers. A son born to the senior wife one year afterwards claimed to reopen the partition, on the footing that the father had reserved no share for himself at the partition. It was held that the provision in the deed did not take away the right of the after-born son to share as if the partition had not taken place.

The reasoning by which the learned judges, Mockett and Krishnaawami Ayyangar, JJ., arrived at this decision was as follows: Mulla's Hindu Law (p. 381 of the relevant edition) had the following statement¹³:

"Where the father has not reserved a share for himself at a partition with his sons, a son who is born as well as begotten after the partition is entitled to have the partition reopened and to have a share allotted to him not only in the property as it stood at the time of the original partition, but in the accumulations made with the help of that property."

This was based on Chengama Nayudu v. Munisami Nayudu.¹⁴ The correctness of that case was not challenged, and the case of *Ganpat v. Gopalarao*¹⁵ was distinguishable on the point that the father there had actually retained a share, upon which the after-born son could rely. When we turn to Chengama's case, an old case with a very short judgment, we find an extraordinary discrepancy. From the judgment of the Subordinate Judge we find that the plaintiff was a son born, but not also conceived, after the partition. The attention of all the Courts was directed to the question whether, assuming he was entitled to a share, he was entitled to share in acquisitions made out of the shares of his brothers, and it was held that he was. But that decision could not have been arrived at unless it had been clear that the plaintiff was entitled to reopen the partition in the first place. This was impossible unless he was conceived before the partition and born afterwards, and there is nothing in the evidence reported in the report of the case to show that he was conceived after the partition. All we are told is that the property was partitioned before he was born. The reliance of the Sub-Judge on Yajnavalkya's text relative to the rights of a posthumous son shows that this son's rights arose out of his having been in existence (unknown) in the womb at the time of the partition. The High Court's references to sastra likewise apply only to such cases. The head-note, however, speaks of the father not having reserved a share for himself, and Mulla (for reason to be guessed later) was deceived into thinking that this was the principle in issue. Mulla's text therefore was not entirely supported by the case which he cited. Therefore when, in Chengama's case, their Lordships decided that the after-born son could reopen the partition, though he was conceived as well as born after the arrangement made by his father, they were deciding something new. If they had not been so doing the suspicion with which the case was subsequently treated would be difficult to explain.

Yet Athilinga's case¹⁶ makes perfect sense, as we have seen. The decision gave the after-born son one-fourth, whereas had the father's provision been given effect to he would have been entitled only to one-sixth. The learned Judges supposed they were doing nothing new and were merely following Chengama as relied upon by Mulla (ubi cit.) and Mayne (11th edn., p. 521, para 420). Both Mulla and Mayne incautiously followed the head-note in Chengama without realising that the case did not concern itself with the rights of one conceived as well as born after partition, and oblivious of the fact that the case was really concerned with the rights of a son born after partition (but conceived prior to it) to participate in acquisitions made by the separated co-parceners out of the corpus of their respective shares. In reality Athilinga's case is good law, for this reason: the father not having taken a share for himself, the partition he made between his sons did not satisfy his own rights in the family property. A son subsequently conceived and born to him would therefore have a birthright in ancestral property in respect of which his father's rights had not been satisfied. This is the justification for the rule, and it can be applied in many other cases than those where the partition is between father and son. Since the texts and the previous case-law do not in so many words provide anything of the kind this was judicial legislation, but of a most agreeable and satisfactory kind. The Madras Judges thought they were doing nothing new, and indeed accused (p. 304) the Sub-Judge of innovation, but in fact what they decided was a great step forward. That it was consistent with modern ideas is proved by the misconceived notions about Chengama's case entertained in happy ignorance by both Mulla and Mayne. And I hope I have shown that it was not inconsistent with sastric notions. Where the renunciation is made in circumstances where the family cannot be maintained by the renouncer (i.e. where subsequently born issue cannot be as well off with his property as they would be had he remained joint), the renunciation cannot foreclose their birthright.

Now we may proceed to see how the matter was tackled in the Andhra Pradesh High Court. So far we have seen that they understood that the renunciation made by S did not have the effect (as Madras had supposed) of separating SS1 from F, so that all the property went eventually to F by survivorship. Then they proceeded to say that SS2 and SS3 might well be coparceners with their father, but could not be coparceners with F. The nexus, namely the status of the father, was missing. Their Lordships failed to notice that at sastric law this would be true only if S had property sufficient for all his duties. In fact he had nothing but a bare and personal right of maintenance. Their Lordships distinguish the privileged position of the posthumous son from that of an after-begotten son, rightly. They then turn to Shivajirao v. Vasantrao.¹⁷ There a son relinquished his rights in favour of his father, having a son of his own living at the time. The facts were not altogether dissimilar from those in our own case. That son, the grandson, sued for partition and obtained a one-half share. Another son was born to the renouncer, who sued for participation in his brother's one-half. Knight, J., held he was not entitled, since his father had separated himself by his renunciation, so that an after-born son could not claim a birth-right in the ancestral property. It is important to notice that the father had loaded the family with debt, and his renunciation was purchased with sums intended to release him from debt and other considerations. His issue would thus have virtually no property unless they could prove a birthright in the property of their grandfather. The learned Judge in fact correctly points to the principle in Chengama's case¹⁸ as belonging to the field of rights of sons en ventre sa mere at the date of the respective partitions. He refuses to extend the principle to partitions other than between sons and father: his reason is based upon the supposition that Chengama put into effect the text of Vishnu quoted in 2 Colebrooke's Digest, 268.¹⁹ That text refers, as do all such texts, to the rights of sons conceived before partition but born after it. The textbook-writers take up Knight, J., here, and use the dictum as a restriction on Athilinga itself. This is evident from Mayne (ubi cit.).

We reach the position, then, where, without realising that they had done so the Madras High Court in Athilinga put the spirit of the sastric law into effect, while in Shivajirao v. Vasantrao the Bombay High Court had refused to allow a son, born in similar circumstances to SS2 and SS3 in our Andhra case, to participate in his brother's share. In our Andhra case SS2 and SS3 seek to participate in their grandfather's property, but the principle is the same. In agreeing perty—as in our wastrel cases—while his wife is still of child-bearing age), the son born after that renunciation is certainly entitled to reopen the partition which had taken place between his elder brothers, on the footing that separation of property during the mother's capacity to bear more sons, the father retaining no share for himself, was unlawful and not binding on subsequently-born issue. Such an important opinion on the part of a leading Hindu jurist can hardly be overlooked with satisfaction on the part of modern exponent of "Hindu" law.

with Shivaji's case the Andhra Pradesh High Court hold that once the renouncing member is separate, even if he takes no share of the ancestral property he debars his issue from participation unless they were alive in fact or in law at the time of the renunciation.

Their Lordships pass on, in the peculiar way so common in India, to discuss what would be the position if the renunciation by S had effected a severance between F and SS1. Since they had decided in the clearest terms that it had no such effect the part of the judgment proceeding on the assumption that it did is otiose and not a little confusing to the reader. This is a very usual proceeding in India, and one searches in vain for an explanation. Perhaps Judges do not want to be unfair to advocates who have spent time and trouble on alternative arguments, or perhaps they have an eye to what the Supreme Court may do. However, we shall follow their Lordships in their apparently academic discussion of what the law would have been if the facts had not been what they had just decided they were. They discuss the case of Krishna v. Sami,²⁰ which was not a case of renunciation at all, but was concerned with the rights of the sons of a deaf and dumb coparcener, who was at that period disqualified from taking a share. The decision was that their birthright was unaffected by their father's disqualification. The reason for the citation of the case is an incautious, and speculative dictum by Turner, C. J., at p. 77. After detailing the various contexts in which the term "son born after partition" is used, the Chief Justice says of one begotten and born after partition... "he takes the shares (sic) of his parents and acquisitions made after partition, or, if his father has reserved no share, he may call upon his brothers to make up a share to him." This was incautious, as well as obiter, because the learned Chief Justice had already expressed (at p. 72 foot) doubts as to the extent to which in practice it would be wise to apply the authority (the isolated authority) which he had found to such an effect. It was speculative in that the sole authority had never been tested in experience, and no case had adopted this rule until then. There was no knowing in 1884/5 what might flow from such a proposition, and the general notion which his Lordship expressed at p. 70 ("The case in which a son born after partition would receive nothing is not contemplated by any of the authors of the texts and commentaries to which we have had access except Varadaraja in the Vyavahara Nirnaya in a passage to which reference will presently be made") was what, after all, guided the full bench in its decision in favour of the sons of the disqualified man. This case no doubt predisposed the author of the headnote in *Chengama Nayudu v. Munisami Nayudu*²¹ (which we saw was unjustified by anything in the report) to draft it in the way he did.

The Andhra High Court surveyed Krishna v. Sami and the other Madras cases with the object of showing that although when a partition had taken place the after-born son could, if his father had taken nothing for himself, reopen the partition, even when he was conceived as well as born after partition (which the sastric texts had not in so many words contemplated), nevertheless that right was not a feature of the law of the joint Hindu family generally, but derived from the sastric limitation on the powers of a father to partition the property "so long as the mother has not passed the stage of childbearing" (p. 183, col. 2). This notion is no doubt sound in itself. But merely because in *Shivajirao v. Vasantirao*²² and subsequently in a Bengal case²³ the Madras cases had not been followed, on the alleged ground that they were all of partitions between father and his sons, it does not follow that the Madras rules have no application to other cases. At Anglo-Hindu law there might be room for such an argument: Athilinga, even in view of Chengama, and of a dictum in Krishna precariously based on Varadaraja (see below), was an innovation, though the Judges did not realise it; therefore it must be restricted to its own facts. But in reality the case of Athilinga did express a genuine sastric principle, as we have seen. Thus it is submitted that the Andhra Pradesh High Court were wrong in refusing to recognise in SS2 and SS3 any rights in F's property, and to allow them to partition it and so divest the alienees of the relevant fractions. The Andhra Pradesh High Court of course knew that the whole affair was a device to defeat creditors : but that had not in the past stood in the way of the development of the Hindu law.

Their Lordships considered the sastric texts relating to the rights of sons born after partition, but from the angle of the Judges in Krishna v. Sami. They believed that a text such as Vishnu's, "Sons with whom the father had made a partition should give a share to the son born after partition", applied to sons conceived as well as born after partition : but there is not the slightest reason for supposing this. The sastra did not contemplate shares for sons conceived after partition, who must rely exclusively on their father's share^{23a}. To this it might be replied, "What happens when the father takes no share, as in Athilinga?" The texts are quiet on the subject, but we have seen that in principle when the father takes nothing and is not able to maintain his family as well as he could had he remained joint the renunciation does not have the effect of foreclosing the birthright which would otherwise operate in respect of the ancestral property. And for this reason the rule in Athilinga, though from an Anglo-Hindu point of view technically novel, was in touch with the sastra, and should be applied in all other cases, including ours, where the father did not have his rights satisfied at the renunciation, and where the branch which he represents is virtually reduced to poverty relative to the parent family.

It might be argued, as it was in Krishna v. Sami,²⁴ that Varadaraja says something to confirm the right of the son conceived as well as born after partition when the father took no share. Turner, C. J., gives his text as follows :—"Yajnavalkya says that for one born after partition a provision is to be made from the divided brothers' own shares if there be no property of the father." This seems a fair translation of the text which will now be found at p. 423 of K. V. Rangaswami Aiyangar's edition (Adyar, 1942) and probably agrees with Burnell's version of 1872. But though this interpretation of Yajnavalkya and Vishnu, whom Varadaraja cites, is a possible one it conflicts with the Mitakshara interpretation and is based upon the view that where the father's property is lost or wasted and so the son is left destitute he ought to be entitled to divest his divided brothers of a proportion to save himself from destitution. This goes far beyond what we have been contending, and is not supported by the sastric principle we have recovered from a general consideration of the accepted authorities. Varadaraja seems to stand alone in this humanitarian, but apparently eccentric view. The fact that it is not repeated in his successors, the Sarasvati-vilasa or the Smriti-chandrika, tells heavily against its authenticity, certainly for later times.

CONCLUSION

The full bench answer in *Anjaneyulu v. Ramayya*²⁵ differs from the full bench answer in *Ramayya v. Venkanraju*²⁶ in taking a deed of renunciation of all right, title and interest in joint family property to be, not evidence of severance from the family such as would sever a son from his renouncing father, but evidence merely that the father severed himself from the family, leaving the son joint with the grandfather. The result was that, although the son's liability under the pious obligation was unaffected by the change in construction of the deed, the death of that son would leave the grandfather by survivorship full owner of the family property. The Andhra full bench has now decided that sons of the renouncing father conceived as well as born posterior to the renunciation are disentitled to claim a birthright in the grandfather's property. They refused to apply the principle enshrined in *Athilinga v. Ramaswami*²⁷ not because it was bad law, but because, under obiter dicta in *Shivajirao v. Vasantrao*²⁸ and *Kusum Kumari v. Dasarathi*²⁹, that principle applied only when a father had separated sons from himself retaining no share for himself, a position quite plainly not arising in the case before them. The distinction, it is submitted, is thin and misconceived. In reality wherever a father renounces and sons are subsequently born to him the latter should be able to obtain the portion of the joint family property to which their birthright entitles them, notwithstanding their father's separation by virtue of his renunciation, provided that he renounced in circumstances which do not secure their welfare. The cases under consideration are cases of wastrel or insolvent fathers who are neutralised in their own and the family interest, partly or mainly to frustrate claims by existing or future creditors. In such cases the interests of the sons should not be denied by pointing mechanically to the partition in which their father took nothing. Nor should they be denied because the family assets are in the hands of an ascendant or a single collateral or his heir. The principle which lies in reality behind Athilinga is, or should be, available in all parallel cases. It is true that once the sons are allowed their birth right, irrespective of the renunciation by their father, creditors may obtain access to their shares under the pious obligation; whereas if the property had remained with the ascendant, it would have come to them unimpaired, one hopes, by inheritance. But this is not an adequate reason for denying an Anglo-Hindu legal right which emerged, no doubt indirectly, from a misunderstanding of the authorities. The whole position requires reconsideration, and that upon the footing that the sastric texts and their true meaning ought to be available in straightening the tortuous and difficult Anglo-Hindu law.³⁰

OFFERS TO RENEW COHABITATION

AN offer or request by a wife to her husband, or vice versa, to resume cohabitation may be made after separation by consent or by a spouse who is in desertion. In either case it is of no effect unless genuine, but if it is genuine and there is no sufficient cause for the recipient spouse to remain separated, then failure to comply with it can have the result of bringing a state of desertion to an end or of putting the recipient of the offer in a state of desertion. The genuineness of the offer is thus all important. How is it to be tested? The best test, the courts have said, is by accepting it. Indeed, if the offeree does not test the offer by accepting it, that is itself some evidence that he thinks it genuine. So, if the recipient spouse is to be advised that the offer can be rejected, there should be independent evidence showing that it was not genuine—a mere assertion that the offer is not genuine will not be enough. Such evidence is likely to rest on the offeror's behaviour. A wife may, for example, be claiming maintenance based on an allegation of persistent cruelty; such a ground of claim is not easily reconciled with a genuine offer on her part to resume cohabitation permanently. Then the offer may be by letter—it may be a solicitor's letter, it may be a careful registered letter in her own handwriting of which she keeps a copy, or it may be a spontaneous, natural letter. The fact that the letter is written by a solicitor does not prevent its being accepted as conveying a genuine request to resume cohabitation. The fact that the spouse writes a careful letter and keeps a copy may tend to cast the shadow of doubt on the real genuineness of the offer. There are, of course, many facets to this sort of problem. On most of them guidance will now be found in the report of Dunn v. Dunn ([1965] 1 All E.R. 1043) and the decisions noted there at pp. 1050 et seq.—L.J.

REPORTS.

APPELLATE CIVIL

Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice Naik.

B. K. JOBANPUTRA v. B. S. KALELKAR.*

Payment of Wages Act (IV of 1936), Sec. 2(vi)—Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Secs. 2(p), 12, 18—Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872), Sec. 10—Gratuity payable under settlement arrived at in course of conciliation proceedings—Whether such gratuity “wages” within s. 2(vi) of Payment of Wages Act.

Gratuity payable under a settlement arrived at during the course of conciliation proceedings is not “wages” within the meaning of that word in s. 2(vi) of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936.

Per Naik J. Section 12(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, covers a situation where no settlement has been reached as also a situation where a settlement has been reached between the parties, but that settlement is not regarded by the conciliation officer as a fair or just or reasonable settlement.

Bombay Chronicle v. V. B. Potdar¹ and Bata Shoe Co. (P) Ltd. v. Ganguly, referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

D. S. Parikh, for the petitioners.

N. V. Phadke, with D. O. Sanghavi, for opponents Nos. 2 and 3.

TAMBE J. This is an application under art. 227 of the Constitution of India, by 29 workmen who were in the employment of respondent No. 3, the New Asiatic Company Limited. They seek to get quashed the order of the Second Additional Authority under the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, Bombay, of April 27, 1962.

The question that arises is whether the gratuity payable under the settlement arrived at during the course of the conciliation proceedings is “wages” within the meaning of that word in the Payment of Wages Act, 1936. These 29 workmen have been retrenched from service by respondent No. 3, the first 27 on July 1, 1960, and Nos. 28 and 29 on November 1, 1960. These 29 workmen, after they had been retrenched, filed applications under the Payment of Wages Act, for recovery of certain sums falling under three categories—wages for over-time work and for leave period, bonus and the amounts of gratuity claimed by them under the settlement reached during the course of conciliation proceedings. Now, the petitioners who had claimed payment of gratuity are only petitioners Nos. 2 to 8, 10, 16, 18, 28 and 29. The respondent company raised various objections, inter alia, contending that the gratuity was not ‘wages’ within the meaning of that word in the Payment of Wages Act. The issue arising out of this contention was considered as a preliminary issue by the Authority appointed under the Payment of Wages Act, and has been decided against the workmen; hence this application.

In order to appreciate the rival contentions raised by counsel for parties, it would be convenient to reproduce the material part of the definition of

*Decided, August 28, 1964. Special Civil Application No. 1283 of 1962.

“wages”. The definition is contained in cl. (vi) of s. 2 of the Payment of Wages Act, and the material part reads:

“(vi) ‘wages’ means all remuneration (whether by way of salary, allowances or otherwise) expressed in terms of money or capable of being so expressed which would if the terms of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a person employed in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes—

(a) ...

(c) ...

(d) any sum which by reason of the termination of employment of the person employed is payable under any law, contract or instrument which provides for the payment of such sum, whether with or without deductions, but does not provide for the time within which the payment is to be made”.

Therefore, for a sum to be “wages” under cl. (d), the conditions that are required to be fulfilled are: (1) it must be a sum payable by way of termination of employment; and (2) it must be a sum payable under any law, contract or instrument which provides for the payment of such sum, but does not provide for the time within which the payment is to be made. Both these conditions must be cumulatively satisfied. It is not in dispute that the amount of gratuity claimed by the petitioners is payable to them by reason of the termination of their employment. Clause of Demand No. 8 of the Settlement of date June 16, 1951, makes the position clear. The question next to be considered is whether it is a sum payable under any law, contract or instrument. It is clear that the claim being that it is payable under the settlement, it cannot be said to be a sum payable in law. The only question that has to be considered is whether it is a sum payable under a contract or instrument. In other words, the question that arises for consideration is whether the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings is a contract or instrument. It is the contention of Mr. Parikh, appearing for the petitioners, that having regard to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), the settlement is a contract between the employer on the one hand and all the workmen on the other, irrespective of the fact whether they were in service on the date of settlement or not. In the alternative, it is his contention that, at any rate, the settlement is a contract between the employer on the one hand and the workmen who actually were parties to the industrial dispute in relation to which the settlement was reached before the Conciliation Officer. Mr. Phadke, appearing for respondents Nos. 2 and 3, the employer company and its manager of the Western Division, contends that the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings is not a contract either between the employer on the one hand and all the employees on the other, or the employer on one hand and the employees who were parties to the industrial dispute on the other.

To appreciate the arguments advanced by counsel for the parties, it would be necessary to refer to the relevant provisions in the Industrial Disputes Act (hereinafter called the Act). A ‘settlement’ is defined in cl. (p) of s. 2 of the Act. It provides:

“‘Settlement’ means a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings and includes a written agreement between the employer and workman arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding where such agreement has been signed by the parties thereto in such manner as may be prescribed and a copy thereof has been sent to the appropriate Government and the conciliation officer.”

Section 4 empowers the appropriate Government to appoint by notification such number of persons, as it thinks fit, to be conciliation officers. These conciliation officers are, under sub-s. (1) of s. 4, “charged with the duty of mediating in and promoting the settlement of industrial disputes.” Chapter IV of the Act relates to the procedure, powers and duties of authorities appointed under the Act, and it consists of ss. 11 to 21. Sub-section (2) of s. 11 empowers a conciliation officer to enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates for the purpose of an inquiry into any existing or apprehended industrial dispute, of course after giving a reasonable notice to the party concerned. Sub-section (4) of s. 11 empowers a conciliation officer to call for and inspect any document which he has ground for considering to be relevant to the industrial dispute or to be necessary for the purpose of verifying the implementation of any award or carrying out any other duty imposed on him under the Act, and for the aforesaid purposes the conciliation officer has the same powers as are vested in a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 12 enumerates the duties of the conciliation officer, and it is inter alia, in the following terms:

"12. (1) Where any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, the conciliation officer may, or where the dispute relates to a public utility service, and a notice under section 22 has been given, shall, hold conciliation proceedings in the prescribed manner.

(2) The conciliation officer shall, for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of the dispute without delay, investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof and may do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute.

(3) If a settlement of the dispute or of any of the matters in dispute is arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings the conciliation officer shall send a report thereof to the appropriate Government together with a memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.

(4) If no such settlement is arrived at, the conciliation officer shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation, send to the appropriate Government a full report setting forth the steps taken by him for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof, together with a full statement of such facts and circumstances, and the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, a settlement could not be arrived at".

Sub-section (5) provides that after the consideration of the report under sub-s. (4), the appropriate Government may make a reference to the Industrial Tribunal, if it considers necessary. Sub-section (6) provides the time limit within which the report is to be made by the conciliation officer after the commencement of the conciliation proceedings. The prescribed rule shows that the procedure which is to be followed by the conciliation officer when he apprehends an industrial dispute is, first to issue notices both to the employer and the representative of the workmen. The representative of the workmen is expected to file the statement of demands of the workmen which gave rise to the dispute, and the employer is expected to file the say of the industry. Thereafter, the conciliation officer holds sittings either calling the employer and the employees together, or sees them separately, and endeavours his best to see if a reasonable and amicable settlement is possible. If he finds that a settlement, which he considers to be the right settlement, is arrived at, then he makes a report accordingly. This is the procedure in short. Considering these sections together, it is clear that the settlement is of two kinds: (1) settlement which is arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings, and (2) an agreement between the employer and the workmen relating to the dispute between them otherwise than in the course of the conciliation proceedings. For the latter to become a settlement, however, the copies of the agreement signed by the parties have to be in the prescribed manner sent to the appropriate Government and the conciliation officer. It would be seen that the settlements which are arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings are those which are arrived at with the mediation of the conciliation officer and which are in the opinion of the conciliator the right settlement. The statute casts a duty on the conciliation officer to take steps immediately he apprehends an industrial dispute. It requires the conciliation officer to move of his own accord to get the employer and the representatives of the workmen together.

In this, he has to act without delay. He is expected to investigate into the dispute. For this purpose, he is empowered to inspect any document which he deems it necessary to inspect. It is his duty to see that the settlement, which in his opinion is the right settlement, is amicably arrived at between the parties. After such a settlement, which meets his approval, is arrived at, he makes a report to the Government accordingly and also forwards a memorandum duly signed by the parties, i.e., the representative of the workmen and the representative of the employer, along with the report. It may be stated that the prescribed Form 'H' shows that the conciliation officer also has to sign evidencing that the settlement has been reached in the course of the conciliation proceedings. Section 18 relates to persons on whom the settlements and awards are binding. It is in the following terms:

"18. (1) A settlement arrived at by agreement between the employer and workman otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding shall be binding on the parties to the agreement.

(2) An arbitration award which has become enforceable shall be binding on the parties to the agreement who referred the dispute to arbitration.

(3) A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings under this Act or an award of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal which has become enforceable shall be binding on—

(a) all parties to the industrial dispute;

(b) all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute, unless the Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, records the opinion that they were so summoned without proper cause;

(c) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is an employer, his heirs, successors or assigns in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates;

(d) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part".

It would be noticed that the section divides the settlements and awards into two categories. The first category consists of settlements and awards which are arrived at otherwise than in the course of any proceedings before an authority appointed under the Act. They are contained in cls. (1) and (2). The other category consists of settlements and awards which are arrived at in proceedings before the authorities appointed under the Act, namely, the conciliation officer in the case of settlements, and the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal in the case of awards. The binding nature of settlements and awards falling under the two categories is also different. A settlement under the first category is binding only on persons who are parties to the agreement. The employer, of course, is a common party in both types of settlements and awards; but the workmen who get bound by settlements and awards falling under the first category are only those workmen who were parties to the agreement in the case of a settlement, or who were parties to the reference made to a private arbitrator. The case, however, is different in respect of settlements and awards falling under the second category. The combined effect of cls. (a) to (d) of sub-s. (3) of s. 18 would be that settlements and awards, which are arrived at during the course of proceedings before the authorities appointed under the Act, are binding not only on the workmen who were parties to the industrial dispute, i.e., who had appeared before the conciliation officer or before the Industrial Tribunals or Courts, but also all persons who were workmen in the establishment or part of the establishment to which the dispute relates, and all the workmen who were in the establishment on the date of the dispute as well as all the workmen who are subsequently employed in the establishment or part of the establishment to which the dispute relates. Similarly, a settlement or award binds not only the employer who was actually a party to the industrial dispute, but also his heirs, successors or assigns in respect of that particular establishment. It would thus be seen that the binding nature of a settlement or an award arrived at before an authority appointed under the Act is much wider than the settlement otherwise arrived at or the award otherwise made. These are all the relevant provisions which it is necessary for us to consider.

Now, Mr. Parikh, in the first instance, argues that reading sub-s. (3) of s. 18, as a whole, the position in law that emerges is that workmen, who were in employment, but who were not parties to the industrial dispute as well as workmen who are subsequently employed in the establishment, become parties to the settlement itself. Those of the workmen on whom a settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings is made binding are, by fiction of law, made parties to the settlement. A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings thus is a contract between the employer on the one hand and all the workmen on whom the settlement is binding. It is not possible for me to accept this contention of Mr. Parikh on the language of sub-s. (3) inclusive of its clauses, of s. 18. Sub-section (3) of s. 18 provides the extent of the binding nature of a settlement arrived at in conciliation proceedings and an award made by the authorities under the Act, and cls. (a) to (d) of sub-s. (3) enumerate the persons on whom such a settlement or award is binding. The sub-section itself distinguishes between persons who were parties to the dispute on whom the agreement is binding, and the persons, though not parties to the dispute, who are bound by the settlement or award. It is thus clear that cl. (d) does not enact a fiction relating to the parties to the dispute, but it enacts the categories of persons on whom a settlement or award would act. The first contention of Mr. Parikh, therefore, should fail.

It is next argued by Mr. Parikh that it may be that the settlement arrived at during the conciliation proceedings binds not only parties to the dispute but persons who were not parties to the dispute and enumerated in cl. (d), but nonetheless a settlement is an agreement. It is an agreement freely reached between the employer on the one hand and the representatives of the workmen who were parties to the dispute. The conciliation officer acts only in an advisory capacity. His role is that of ironing out the differences between the employer and the workmen and to endeavour that they amicably arrive at a right agreement, which in his opinion, is a fair and reasonable agreement. The settlement thus arrived at is, therefore, nothing but a contract between the employer on the one hand and the workmen who are parties to the dispute on the other. At any rate, therefore, the settlement is a contract between the workmen who were actually parties to the dispute and the employer, and it has been pointed out by Mr. Parikh that the petitioners before us, who claim gratuity, were the members of the Union that had agreed to the settlement on the date the dispute arose. It is true that a mere fact that the settlement is reached with the mediation of the conciliation officer by itself may not have the effect of altering the character of the settlement if it was, in fact, a contract. It is also true that a settlement is reached as a result of the mediation and at the persuasion of the conciliation officer. Nonetheless, the agreement reached is reached by the parties to the dispute with a free consent. The conciliation officer has no power to effect a settlement if the parties do not agree, and, therefore, mediation or intervention of the conciliation officer by itself may not have the effect of altering the original character of the settlement. Still the question remains whether, having regard to all the provisions of the Act, a settlement reached during the course of the conciliation proceedings, is a contract. Section 10 of the Indian Contract Act defines a "contract", and it reads:

"All agreements are contracts if they are made by the free consent of parties competent to contract, for a lawful consideration and with a lawful object and are not hereby expressly declared to be void".

It would thus be seen that all agreements are not contracts. Only the agreements described in s. 10 of the Contract Act are contracts; and the essential feature of a contract is that it is an agreement between the parties. In other words, it is binding on persons who have arrived at or entered into the agreement. This is one of the essential features of a contract, apart from the other essential features, namely, that the parties must be competent to contract, their consent to the agreement must be of free will, consideration for the agreement must be lawful and the agreement itself must be for a lawful object. We have already shown that by reason of the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 18, the binding nature of the settlement is of much wider character. The settlement does not bind only the parties to the dispute which the conciliation officer has settled, but binds all the workmen in the establishment, present or future. Thus, though it is possible to say that the agreement initially arrived at between the parties to the dispute is a contract between those parties, it is difficult to say that the ultimate product, namely, the settlement in a conciliation proceeding is a contract between the parties to the dispute. On receiving the assent of the conciliator in token of which he signs the agreement, it ceases to be an agreement between the parties and becomes a settlement having a binding effect not only on the parties to the dispute but also other employees, namely, the employees who were at the date of the dispute in the service of the relevant establishment and also those who joined the establishment subsequently. Thus, the settlement in a conciliation proceeding ceases to be a contract between the parties to the dispute or parties to the initial agreement, and becomes a creature of the statute having a binding effect on all the aforesaid three categories of workmen. In this view of the matter, the authority under the Payment of Wages Act, in my opinion, was not in error in holding that the petitioners, who were claiming gratuity under the Payment of Wages Act, were not entitled to claim it. I find it difficult to accept the argument that a settlement in a conciliation proceeding after it has received the assent of the conciliator still retains the character of a contract as between the original parties to the dispute, though such may not be the case so far as the other persons, who are bound by the settlement, are concerned.

It is next to be considered whether a settlement is an instrument within the meaning of the definition of "wages". The expression "instrument" was considered by this Court in Bombay Chronicle v. V. B. Potdar.¹ The question that was considered by a Division Bench of this Court in that case was whether gratuity payable under the award is not 'wages' within the meaning of this term given in s. 2(vi) of the Payment of Wages Act. It was held that gratuity payable under the award is not 'wages'. The learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Court, considered the true meaning of the expression "instrument" at page 814 of the report, observed:

"The next question to be considered is whether an award can be said to be an instrument. The word 'instrument' in its ordinary meaning means a document of a formal legal kind, which creates some right or liability. It is usually used in the sense of a document executed by or between the parties. An order of a Court cannot be said to be an instrument... An award is an adjudication by an Industrial Tribunal. In our opinion, therefore, it cannot be said to be an instrument. It may also be noted that the word 'instrument' follows the word 'contract', which means an agreement between the parties. It seems to us that the word 'instrument' is used in the same sense in sub-cl. (d), that is a document executed by the employer or between him and his employees". There is no good reason shown to take a different view. I have already shown that the settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings is not an agreement as between the parties on whom it is binding. In my opinion, therefore, a settlement is not an "instrument" within the meaning of the definition of "wages".

Another decision which was cited before us by Mr. Phadke is a decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Bata Shoe Co. (P) Ltd. v. Ganguly.² The decision has no direct bearing on the question which we have to consider here. There, the question that arose was whether a settlement arrived at between the employer and some workmen otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings is a settlement, debarring the State Government from making a reference to the Industrial Court; and their Lordships held that a settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings would alone have the effect of putting an end to the industrial dispute, and not a settlement arrived at between a section of workmen in the employment of the employer, though the settlement was reached during the pendency of the conciliation proceedings. The difference between the two has been pointed out by their Lordships in this decision.

For the reasons stated above, in my opinion, the petition fails. I would, therefore, discharge the rule. The opponents have not pressed for costs, and therefore, I would make no order as to costs.

NAIK J. I am in agreement with the conclusion reached by my learned brother. I would, however, like to make a few observations on the question as to whether a gratuity that becomes payable under a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings can be treated either as a contract or an instrument within the meaning of these words in cl. (d) of sub-s. (vi) of s. 2 of the Payment of Wages Act. Before proceeding to analyse the relevant provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, it would not be out of place to consider the scheme of the definition of "wages" contained in sub-s. (vi) of s. 2 of the Payment of Wages Act. This definition was substituted for the old definition by the Payment of Wages (Amendment) Act, 1957. In the first part, wages are defined to mean all remuneration expressed in terms of money... if the terms of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a person employed in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment. This is the primary definition of the term "wages". Clauses (a) to (c) then describe the inclusive part of the definition of the term wages. Clause (a) says that "wages" includes any remuneration payable under any award or settlement, between parties or order of a Court. I need not refer to cls. (b) and (c) and (e). Clause (d) is the relevant clause, and the argument of Mr. Parikh was that a claim for gratuity under the settlement effected in the present case falls within the purview of the words "contract or instrument" used in this clause. Clause (d) runs thus:

"(d) any sum which by reason of the termination of employment of the person employed is payable under any law, contract or instrument which provides for the payment of such sum, whether with or without deductions, but does not provide for the time within which the payment is to be made."

The third part of the definition can be characterised as exclusive part of the definition. The categories enumerated as falling in this exclusive part are six in number. The first clause speaks of a bonus payable under an award or settlement. Clauses (2) to (5) are not relevant for the present discussion. Clause (6) is again important, and it provides "any gratuity payable on the termination of employment in cases other than those specified in sub-clause (d)". It will at once be noticed that the object of the Legislature in providing an elaborate definition comprising three parts, namely the meaning part, the inclusive part and the exclusive part, is to make the definition exhaustive. Reading cl. (6) of the exclusive part and cl. (d) of the inclusive part together, I arrive at the result that a claim for gratuity can only be enforced under the Payment of Wages Act as "wages", if it falls within the purview of cl. (d) but not otherwise. Mr. Parikh readily conceded that the claim for gratuity arising out of the settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings in the present case does not fall within the purview of the word

"law". He, therefore, restricted his argument to the submission that this claim would either fall under the word "contract" or "instrument".

For a proper consideration of the question as to whether the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings can be treated as a contract within the meaning of that word in s. 2(vi)(d) of the Payment of Wages Act, it is necessary to refer to the manner in which conciliation proceedings are conducted, and the role played by the conciliation officer in the course of the conciliation proceedings, culminating in a settlement. The word "settlement" has been defined in s. 2(p) of the Industrial Disputes Act in two parts—(1) settlement means a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, and (2) it includes a written agreement between the employer and workmen arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding where such agreement has been signed by parties thereto in such manner as may be prescribed and a copy thereof has been sent to the appropriate Government and the conciliation officer. It is common ground that in the present case, the settlement is a settlement which is arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings, and therefore, falls within the first part of the definition. Section 4 which relates to the appointment of a conciliation officer, lays down that the conciliation officer is "charged with the duty of mediating in and promoting the settlement of industrial dispute". The word "promoting" indicates that the conciliation officer is expected to play an active role in bringing about a settlement. Section 11(2) relates to the powers of the conciliation officer, and provides that it would be open to the conciliation officer to enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates for the purpose of inquiring into an existing dispute. Sub-section (4) of the same section empowers a conciliation officer to call for and inspect any document which he has ground for considering to be relevant to the industrial dispute. Section 12 lays down the duties of the conciliation officer. Sub-section (1) relates to the duties of the conciliation officer where the dispute relates to the public utility services. This sub-section, therefore, is not relevant for the present discussion. Sub-section (2) provides that the conciliation officer shall, for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of the dispute, without delay investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof and may do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute. It would thus appear that sub-s. (2) requires the conciliation officer to investigate all matters which affect the merits and the right settlement of the dispute. The expression "merits and the right settlement thereof" suggests that it is for the conciliation officer to examine the merits and try to arrive at a settlement which he considers to be the right settlement. Again the words "for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute" show that the conciliation officer has to assist the parties in forging a settlement which, according to him, is a fair settlement. Sub-section (3) of s. 12 lays down that the conciliation officer shall send a report of the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings to the appropriate Government together with the memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute. Pausing here for a moment, it is true that the section nowhere lays down that a settlement reached between the parties requires the sanction or the approval of the conciliation officer. Formal sanction of the conciliation officer is not a condition sine qua non for the validity of a settlement reached between the parties. At the same time, it is implicit in the words used in sub-ss. (2) and (3) emphasised above that the concurrence of the conciliation officer is necessary, and without his concurrence the settlement reached is not a settlement in the proper sense of the term. The concurrence of the conciliation officer must be satisfied in regard to the fairness, justness and the reasonableness of the settlement reached. The conclusion suggested above is strengthened if reference is made to the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 12. Sub-section (4) provides for the contingency of a settlement not having been reached in the course of the conciliation proceedings. It runs thus:

"(4) If no such settlement is arrived at, the conciliation officer shall... send to the appropriate Government a full report setting forth the steps taken by him for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof, together with a full statement of such facts and circumstances, and the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, a settlement could not be arrived at."

The report, which the conciliation officer is expected to submit, must contain a statement (1) regarding the steps taken by him for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement, (2) a full statement of such facts and circumstances, and (3) the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, a settlement could not be arrived at. Sub-section (4) covers a situation where no settlement has been reached as also a situation where a settlement has been reached between the parties, but that settlement is not regarded by the conciliation officer as a fair or just or reasonable settlement. This view finds support from the observations at page 315 of the report in Bata Shoe Co. (P) Ltd. v. Ganguly.¹ In that case, a settlement was reached between the parties during the pendency of the conciliation proceedings, but that settlement was not approved of by the conciliation officer. The question was whether the settlement would be a bar to a reference of the dispute by the Government under s. 12(5). Their Lordships held that such a reference would not be barred. The relevant observations are to be found at page 315. While discussing the meaning of the expression "in the course of the conciliation proceedings", their Lordships stated (p. 315):

"...But do these words mean that any agreement arrived at between the parties during this period would be binding under s. 18 of the Act? Or do they mean that a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings postulates that that settlement should have been arrived at between the parties with the concurrence of the conciliation officer? As we read this provision we feel that the legislature when it made a settlement reached during the course of conciliation proceedings binding not only on the parties thereto but also on all present and future workmen intended that such settlement was arrived at with the assistance of the conciliation officer and was considered by him to be reasonable and therefore had his concurrence."

Although, therefore, it is true that the settlement is based on the consent of the parties, still, since it requires the concurrence of the conciliation officer for acquiring the status of a settlement, the same cannot be treated as a creature of the agreement between the parties. Under s. 10 of the Indian Contract Act, all agreements are contracts if they are made by the free consent of the parties competent to contract. It is true that the consent of the parties does not cease to be free merely because the conciliation officer brings his influence to bear upon the discussions and negotiations that are proceeding around the table. His influence can hardly be regarded as anything like undue influence. The consent of the parties is essentially a free consent, and in that sense, the agreement reached can be considered as a contract in the sense in which that word is used in the Indian Contract Act. At the same time if we concentrate our attention upon the peculiar role played by the conciliation officer, it would be difficult to say that the final product that emerges is nothing more than an agreement between the parties. The conciliation officer has, in the course of discussion, brought to bear his influence and has tried to mould the agreement so that it should conform to a standard which he has set before his mind's eye. The conciliator cannot be treated as just a middle-man or an honest broker. He plays a dynamic part, and in view of the part played by him, it would be impossible to sever the final product that emerges, from the process of the formation or the forging out of the settlement. In my view, the two are so indissolubly connected that it would not be proper to treat the product apart from the process. In the course of negotiations, inevitably a process of bargaining goes on. The dispute may centre round several demands put forward by the Union on behalf of the workmen. Some of these demands may be given up in favour of securing a concession in respect of others. In the entire process, what emerges cannot be treated as just a proposal and acceptance, which are the essence of an agreement between the parties. I have already pointed out that the conscience of the conciliation officer must be satisfied about the reasonable character of the settlement. It is then only that the conciliation officer treats the agreement as a settlement. In the process, therefore, what was essentially an agreement becomes transformed into something more than an agreement and, therefore, loses its original character as an agreement.

The view set out above would be strengthened on a close analysis of the provisions of s. 18. Sub-section (1) of s. 18 relates to the binding effect of a settlement which is arrived at by agreement between the employer and workmen otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, and provides that such a settlement will be binding on the parties to the agreement. The expression "parties to the agreement" is significant. It is also necessary to note that sub-s. (1) does not contemplate an agreement between the Union on one side and the workmen on the other. It refers in terms to an agreement between the employer and the workmen. That shows that the agreement is binding only upon the individual workmen who are parties to the agreement. Sub-section (2) has no bearing upon the question under discussion. Sub-section (3) relates to the effect of a settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings, and provides that such a settlement would be binding on (a) all parties to the industrial dispute; (b) all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings... (c) where a party referred to in cl. (a) or cl. (b) is an employer, his heirs, successors or assigns, (d) where a party referred to in cl. (a) or cl. (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part. It is significant to note that whereas sub-s. (1) speaks of parties to the agreement, sub-s. (3) speaks of parties to the industrial dispute. The distinction between the two phrases, viz., "parties to the agreement" and "parties to the industrial dispute" is clear and requires no elaboration. Had the Legislature intended to convey the idea that the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings stands on the same footing as an agreement, they would have used the same or similar language as used in sub-s. (1). Instead of using the words "parties to the industrial dispute" they would have more appropriately used the words "parties to the agreement". This shows that the settlement arrived at is not a mere agreement. After all, the agreement which forms the basis of the settlement is arrived at between the parties to the dispute. Yet, the Legislature have preferred the expression "parties to the dispute". That shows that the Legislature wanted to put settlement on a different footing than agreement. My learned brother has already elaborated upon the significance of cl. (d) which makes a settlement binding not only on all the workmen employed in the establishment at the time of the settlement, but also workmen who would be employed in future in such establishment. A contract ordinarily binds parties to the contract. When the Legislature have expressly provided that the settlement would not only bind parties to the dispute but also workmen, who would get themselves employed in future in the same establishment, they are contemplating a case of something which is more sacrosanct and has greater force than agreement reached between the parties. We cannot also forget that the Legislature have put the 'settlement' on the same pedestal as an 'award'. The binding effect of a settlement in sub-s. (3) of s. 18 is the same as the binding effect of an award. On the other hand, the Legislature have taken care to distinguish a settlement and an award on one side and an agreement between the parties on the other.

Finally, I may point out that the Legislature have used the words 'award' and 'settlement' in cl. (a) as also in cl. (1) of sub-s. (vi) of s. 2 of the Payment of Wages Act. There should have been no difficulty for them to use the word "settlement" in cl. (d) so as to put the matter beyond any pale of controversy. This was necessary particularly because by cl. (6), the Legislature provided that no other gratuity except the one provided in cl. (d) would fall within the purview of 'wages'. Considering the question from any point of view, I am inclined to the view that a gratuity which has a settlement as its basis cannot be enforced as "wages" under the Payment of Wages Act.

So far as the argument advanced by Mr. Parikh, namely, that the settlement can be treated as an instrument, is concerned, I adopt the reasons given by my learned brother, which in turn are based upon the decision of this Court in Bombay Chronicle v. V. B. Potdar.² I would, therefore, agree with the order suggested by my learned brother.

DR. A. N. TENDULKAR v. C. F. MATHIAS.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Secs. 23(7), 24(1)(a)—Constitution of India, Part III—Order made by State Government under s. 23(7) whether a quasi-judicial order—President of municipality presiding at meeting passing resolution disallowing some members to sit in house—Order passed by State Government under s. 23(7) removing President from office—Validity of such order—Right of councillor to attend meeting of municipality whether a fundamental right.

An order made by the State Government under s. 23(7) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, removing the President of a municipality, governed by the Act, from the office of President, is a quasi-judicial order.

Board of High School v. Ghanshyam,¹ applied.

The President of the Bhor Municipality, governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, presided at a meeting of the municipality which passed a resolution disallowing two of its members to sit in the house. The State Government made an order under s. 23(7) of the Act removing the President from the office of President for neglect and of incapacity to perform his duty as President on account of his failure or omission to disallow the said resolution:—

Held, that as under the Act or the Rules framed thereunder by the municipality there was no duty cast on the President to suo motu disallow moving of a resolution, the failure on the part of the President to suo motu object to the moving of the resolution did not amount to negligence on his part to perform his duty or to his incapacity to perform his duty and, therefore, the order passed by the State Government was liable to be quashed.

A right of a member or councillor to attend the meeting of a municipality is not a fundamental right as enshrined in the Constitution of India.

THE facts appear in the judgment

Y. S. Chitale, for the petitioner.

M. S. Sanghavi, instructed by Little & Co., for the opponents.

TAMBE J. By this petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution, the petitioner, who was the President of the Bhor Municipality, seeks to get quashed the order dated July 16, 1964, made by the State Government, in exercise of its powers under s. 23(7) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, (hereinafter referred to as the Act), removing the petitioner from the office of President.

The facts giving rise to this petition in brief are: As already stated, the petitioner was an elected President of the Bhor Municipality. In his capacity as the President, he presided over the meetings of the Municipality on January

Civil Application No. 1056 of 1964.

*Decided, August 26/27, 1964. Special . 1 [1962] A.I.R. S.C. 1110.

30, 1963. In that meeting, the Municipality passed a resolution to the effect that Sarvashri B.S. Bapat and R.D. Patil of the Bhore Municipality should not be allowed to sit in the house till they apologised for having published mischievous news in the two newspapers i.e. 'Tarun Bharat' and 'Sakal' against the President. The effect of passing that resolution was that the aforesaid two councillors were prevented from participating in the deliberations of the meeting. On these facts being brought to the notice of Government, it appears that the State Government took the view that the failure or omission on the part of the petitioner to disallow the said resolution amounted to neglect to and showed incapacity to perform his duty properly. Further it appears that Government took the view that the President had taken the law in his own hands and had prevented the councillors from attending the said meeting. It appears that the view taken by Government is that the right of a municipal councillor to attend the meeting of the municipality is a councillor's "fundamental right", and preventing a municipal councillor from attending the meeting amounted to misconduct. A show cause notice was, therefore, issued to the petitioner, and the order of July 16, 1964, indicates that Government found that the explanation of the petitioner was not satisfactory. The State Government came to the conclusion that the action of the petitioner amounted to negligence in the performance of his duty and showed his incapacity to perform his duty as President properly. On these findings, the State Government made the following operative order:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by section 23(7) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, Government hereby removes Dr. A. N. Tendulkar, President, Bhore Municipality, from the Office of President, Bhore Municipality for neglect and of incapacity to perform his duty as President."

It is this order that the petitioner seeks to get quashed by this petition. We were, at the commencement of the hearing, at a loss to know as to what was meant by the clause "Further, he (petitioner) took the law in his own hand and prevented the Councillors from attending the said meeting". It was not clear whether the petitioner (President) had by any physical act prevented the councillors from attending the meeting, or what was the manner or mode in which the petitioner had taken the law in his own hands in preventing the councillors from attending the said meeting. Mr. Sanghavi, learned counsel for the respondents, told us that the only act of the petitioner of which complaint is made is omission or failure on the part of the petitioner to disallow the aforesaid resolution at the meeting of the Bhore Municipality on January 30, 1963. It is thus clear that what prevented or what came in the way of the two councillors from further participating in the meeting was the passing of the resolution by the Municipality—the only fact on which the finding of neglect and incapacity to perform his duty is founded. There was an ambiguity in the order made by Government. In the preamble, it appears that the view taken by Government was that on the aforesaid facts the petitioner was guilty of misconduct. However, the operative part of the order did not indicate that the petitioner had been removed for misconduct on his part. We, therefore, again asked Mr. Sanghavi to make the position clear, and the learned counsel has stated at the Bar that the petitioner has not been removed for any misconduct, but the ground on which the petitioner has been removed is neglect of and incapacity to perform his duty as President properly.

Before we proceed to consider the contentions raised by counsel for the parties, on merits, it would be convenient to consider an objection raised by Mr. Sanghavi, which could be said to be in its nature a preliminary objection. It is the contention of Mr. Sanghavi that the order of Government removing the petitioner is not a quasi-judicial order, but it is an administrative act. It is, therefore, not competent to this Court to quash this order in exercise of its power under arts. 226 or 227 of the Constitution of India.

The first question, therefore, that arises is whether the order which the petitioner is seeking to get quashed is a quasi-judicial order; in other words, whether there was any duty imposed by the Act on the State Government to act in a quasi-judicial manner in the matter of removing the President. It is indeed true that in making the order, the State Government was not deciding a dispute between two private parties, but the parties to the dispute were the State Government on the one hand and the petitioner on the other. A similar question arose before their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Board of High School v. Ghanshyam.¹ The facts in that case were that the Examination Committee under the U.P. Intermediate Education Act, which was a statutory educational authority, had taken action against an examinee on the ground that he had used unfair means. The question that arose was whether the statutory educational authority was under a duty to act in a quasi-judicial manner in taking action against the examinee, and their Lordships held that there was such a duty cast on it though there were no express provisions to that effect in the Act. The principle laid down by their Lordships has been thus summarised in the placitum:

"The statute is not likely to provide in so many words that the authority passing the order is required to act judicially; that can only be inferred from the express provisions of the statute in the first instance in each case and no one circumstance alone will be determinative of the question whether the authority set up by the statute has the duty to act judicially or not. The inference whether the authority acting under a statute where it is silent has the duty to act judicially will depend on the express provisions of the statute read along with the nature of the rights affected, the manner of the disposal provided, the objective criterion if any to be adopted, the effect of the decision on the person affected and other indicia afforded by the statute."

Dealing with the provisions of the statute, their Lordships further observed:

"...Though there is nothing express one way or the other in the Act or the Regulations casting a duty on the Committee to act judicially, the manner of the disposal based as it must be on materials placed before it, and the serious effects of the decision of the Committee on the examinee concerned, must lead to the conclusion that a duty is cast on the Committee to act judicially in that matter, particularly as it has to decide objectively certain facts which may seriously affect the rights and careers of examinees, before it can take any action in the exercise of its power under R. 1(1)."

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, the power conferred on the statutory authority, viz., the State Government, is a power to remove a President or a vice-President of a municipality. The exercise of the power depends on the existence of either negligence in performance of duty by the President or vice-President, or incapacity of the President or vice-President to perform his duty, or a misconduct on the part of the President or vice-President. It is clear that before an action could be taken by the statutory authority, it has to inquire objectively whether any of these three aforesaid facts exists in the case. Needless to say, the action when taken under s. 23(7) of the Act prejudicially affects a subject having serious consequences. It is not merely that a President or vice-President is removed from the office, but the sub-section further provides that he is debarred from standing for a re-election during the remainder of the term of the office of the municipality. There can hardly be any doubt that the principles laid down by their Lordships are attracted to the facts of the present case. In our opinion, therefore, having regard to the provisions of the Act, the order made by the State Government, removing the petitioner from the office of President, is a quasi-judicial order. The preliminary objection raised on behalf of the respondent, therefore, should fail.

The question that next arises is whether there was any duty on the part of the President (petitioner) to disallow the resolution that has been moved at the meeting. It is only if there would be any duty cast on the petitioner to suo motu disallow the resolution then alone, if at all, it could be so said that his failure to disallow the resolution would amount to negligence or incapacity on his part to perform his duty. The argument of Mr. Chitale, learned counsel for the petitioner, is that there is no such duty cast on the petitioner under the provisions of the Act. On the other hand, it is the argument of Mr. Sanghavi, that having regard to the provisions of s. 24(I)(a) read together with r. 12 framed by the Bhor Municipality, the only possible inference that could be drawn is that there was such duty imposed on the petitioner. Section 24 deals with the functions of a President, and cl. (a) of sub-s. (I) thereof is in following terms:

"24. (1) It shall be the duty of the president of a Municipality to—

(a) preside, unless prevented by reasonable cause, at all meetings of the Municipality, and subject to the provisions of the rules for the time being in force under clause (a) of section 46 to regulate the conduct of business at such meetings;"

It would be seen that the duty imposed by this clause on the President is two-fold—(1) he has to preside, unless prevented by reasonable cause, at all meetings of the municipality, and (2) subject to the provisions of the Rules for the time being in force under cl. (a) of s. 46 to regulate the conduct of business at such meetings. There is no provision in the statute further elucidating the meaning of the clause "to regulate the conduct of business at such meeting." And this brings us to the Rules. Relevant rules are framed by the Municipality under s. 46 of the Act. Relevant portion of s. 46 reads:

"Every Municipality shall, as soon as conveniently may be, after the constitution thereof, and subject to the provisions of Chapter XIII A, make and may from time to time alter or rescind rules, but not so as to render them inconsistent with this Act,

(a) regulating the conduct of their business and the delegation of any of their powers or duties and, subject to the provisions of sections 27 and 27A, the appointment and constitution of committees;"

The rules framed by the Municipality in exercise of the powers under this clause are contained in Chapter II of the Rules. They are rr. 3 to 36.

Rule 3 deals with the time of commencement of the meetings. Rule 4 relates to confirmation of the minutes of the last meetings. Rule 5 provides the manner in which the amendment to the minutes of the last meeting are proposed. Rule 6 relates to the language to be used at the meeting, r. 7 provides the manner in which a member will speak at the meeting. Rule 8 provides that the presiding authority shall preserve order and all points of order shall be summarily decided by him, no discussion thereon being allowed, unless he shall think fit to take the opinion of the members of the meeting thereon. Rule 9 provides that any member of a meeting may at any time submit a point of order to the decision of the presiding authority. Rule 10 provides that a councillor called to order by the presiding authority shall seat till the decision of the point of order raised. Rule 11 empowers the President to adjourn any meeting that has refused to obey his ruling on the point of order. Rule 12 provides that when the Councillor disregards the presiding authority or is guilty of obstructive or offensive conduct at any meeting, the presiding officer shall forthwith put the question (no amendment, adjournment or debate being allowed) that such councillor be suspended from the service of the council for the remainder of his seating, and if a majority of the councillors present are in favour thereof the councillor named shall withdraw, failing which the presiding authority may call such aid as he deems expedient to secure such withdrawal and suspension. Rule 13 enables a councillor to leave the meeting before it is closed after intimating his intention to do so to the presiding authority. Rules 14 to 17 relate to the procedure to be followed by the members in putting questions. Rule 18 relates to the provisions relating to the seconding of motion or amendment. Rule 19 relates to the manner in which the discussion of a motion or amendment is to be conducted. Rule 20 relates to the manner in which the amendment could be moved. Rule 21 relates to the right of a mover to speak, and also give a reply. Rule 22 relates to adjourning or postponing the consideration of any question. Rule 23 relates to opening adjourned debate. Rule 24 relates to closure of discussion.

Rule 25 relates to voting on original motion and amendments. Rules 26 and 27 relate to manner in which votes are taken. Rule 28 relates to the procedure to be followed when the votes are equal. Rule 29 relates to declaration of the result of voting. Rule 30 enables a poll to be demanded. Rule 31 relates to the taking of votes for appointment of committees. Rules 32 and 33 relate to the voting on budget. Rule 34 relates to the form of minutes. Rule 35 relates to the manner in which notice of business is given to the members. Rule 36 relates to the order in which the business is to be taken up by the chairman of the meeting. Rule 37 provides the extent to which the procedure at the general meeting is to be followed in committee meetings.

These are all the rules which have been framed under cl. (a) of s. 46(1) of the Act, which are relevant for the purposes of this case. It is nowhere expressly stated that one of the duties of the President is to suo motu disallow a resolution which the members or a councillor propose to move at the meeting. On the other hand, the scheme appears to be that it is the member or the councillor who has to raise a point of order, and it is only when a point of order is raised by a member, it is the duty of the President to decide normally summarily without allowing any debate or discussion on the point of order. It is only in a special case when the President thinks it advisable to take the opinion of the members on the point of order, that he may allow a debate thereon. The only case in which the President is empowered to suo motu move a motion is provided in r. 12, and that is only when a councillor disregards the presidential authority or is guilty of obstructive or offensive conduct at any meeting. But, it would be seen that under r. 12, the President is not empowered to ask a member to withdraw or suspend him from the meeting. The only proposal which the President can make under r. 12 is in the form of putting a question whether the member who has disregarded the presidential authority is guilty of obstructive or offensive conduct at the meeting should be suspended from the service of the council for the remainder of his seating. It is only when the House or the councillors present are in favour of such an action, the President may call such a councillor to withdraw from the meeting. It would be noticed that the scheme of the rules is that a point of order is to be raised by a councillor, but decided by the President; motion under r. 12 alone could be made by the President suo motu, but the decision thereon is left to the House. It is thus clear that the member or the President who proposes a motion or an action has not been made or has not been empowered to judge the merits of the motion or the action, or is not empowered to take a decision thereon himself. It would, therefore, be difficult to hold that the President is empowered under the provisions of the Act or the rules framed thereunder to suo motu disallow a resolution which a councillor intends to move in absence of any point of order raised by the member. It is pertinent to note that at the meeting no councillor or member including the two members Messrs. Bapat and Patil had raised any point of order regarding the competence of the municipality to consider the resolution No. 59 moved at the meeting on January 30, 1963. It is, therefore, difficult to hold that there was any failure on the part of the petitioner to perform his duty imposed on him by the Act or the rules framed thereunder. It is, however, the argument of Mr. Sanghavi that the petitioner ought to have known that the only contingency provided in the rules under which a member could be suspended is one provided in r. 12, and on no other ground a member could be suspended from the House. The argument of Mr. Sanghavi virtually amounts to reading something more than what r. 12 contains. It is nowhere stated in r. 12 that a member could be suspended only when the conditions mentioned in that rule are fulfilled. However, it is not necessary for us to pursue the matter further, because we are not here concerned with the validity or otherwise of the Resolution No. 59 passed by the municipality. Mr. Chitale has frankly conceded that we should proceed to consider this case on an assumption that the municipality was not competent to pass such a resolution. What we have to decide is whether there was a duty cast on the petitioner to suo motu disallow moving of the resolution. We have already discussed that not only there is no express provision to that effect in the Act, but the inference that follows from the rules framed thereunder, is that there was no such duty cast on the President.

The question next to be considered is whether such a duty could be read in the expression: "to regulate the conduct of business at such meeting" occurring in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 24. We have already stated that the expression has not any further been elucidated in the Act, nor are there any provisions which impose any duty on the President in respect of regulating the conduct of business of a meeting of the municipality. On the other hand, as it appears, it is left to each of the municipality to frame rules regulating the conduct of business of its meetings. Further, we have not been shown that there is any rule in any municipality or Corporation or a book on the subject, imposing a duty on its President to suo motu disallow moving of a resolution on the ground of incompetence of the municipality to consider the resolution.

In view of the aforesaid conclusion, it can hardly be said that the failure on the part of the petitioner to suo motu object to the moving of this resolution amounted to negligence on his part to perform his duty or to his incapacity to perform his duty. The error in the order which assumes that there was such a duty cast on the petitioner is apparent on the face of the record. There is also another error which is apparent on the face of the record. It appears that the view taken by the respondent is that the said failure on the part of the petitioner has prejudicially affected the two councillors' "fundamental right" of attending the meeting. Now, the fundamental rights of a citizen are enshrined in Part III of the Constitution of India. It is not necessary to elaborate, but suffice it to say that having regard to the articles contained in Part III of the Constitution, it can hardly be said that a right of a member or a councillor to attend the meeting of a municipality is a fundamental right. The error being apparent on the face of the record, the petitioner is entitled to get the order quashed.

In the result, application is allowed. The order of date July 16, 1964, made by the respondent is hereby quashed. Rule is made absolute with costs.

Rule made absolute.

*Decided, August 24, 1964. Criminal Appeal No. 1204 of 1963, against the order of acquittal passed by S. G. Mandlik, Additional Sessions Judge, Nasik, in Criminal Appeal No. 152 of 1963.
1 (1958) 42 Cr. App. R. 153.

PATEL J. The accused in this case is a young man. He was convicted by the learned Assistant Sessions Judge at Nasik for an offence under s. 376 of the Indian Penal Code for rape on a young girl of four years of age but was acquitted by the learned Additional Sessions Judge at Nasik in appeal.

The facts as they emerge from the evidence of Indubai (P.W. No. 1), the mother of the girl, are few and are as follows: Her husband, Sukhdeo (P.W. No. 7), is a motor driver in the State Transport Corporation and at the relevant time in January 1963 he was posted at Nasik, while she and her child lived at Pimpalgaon. Her husband used to come to the village every week. The accused lived with his brothers Vithoba and Balkrishna one house away from her house. Vithoba had two young daughters and therefore whenever Indubai had to go for any work, she used to leave her daughter Suman at the house of Vithoba.

The incident occurred next day after the Sankrant. Her husband left on that day for Nasik at about 8 o'clock in the morning. She then went to the river for washing clothes keeping Suman in the house of Vithoba. She returned within a short time and after putting the clothes to dry she came out and saw her child answering call of nature and as soon as she saw her, Suman started weeping. She found her private parts injured and bleeding. She asked her what had happened and she learnt from her that the accused had caused the injury to her. She then contacted Vithoba who pleaded that she should forgive what had happened. She then went to her neighbour Shantabai (P.W. No. 6) who advised her to contact her husband. She accordingly went to Nasik and contacted Sukhdeo (P.W. No. 7) her husband. When she informed him about the incident he decided to lodge a complaint with the police. They, therefore, came to Pimpalgaon and lodged the present complaint on which immediate investigation was commenced.

After the complaint was lodged, the girl's clothes were attached and she was also sent after a panchnama of her injuries having been made, to the Medical Officer. He is Dr. Jotikumar (P.W. No. 4). He found six injuries on her. They are as follows: (1) Separation of thighs was painful. (2) Labia Majora and minora were swollen. (3) Vaginal canal was red and tender to touch. (4) Hymen ruptured and bleeding and tender on touching. (5) A tear of $1/4'' \times 1/8'' \times 1/8''$ on the right lateral wall of the vagina. (6) A tear of $1/6'' \times 1/6'' \times 1/8''$ on the anterior fornix of the vagina. The accused after his arrest was also forwarded to this doctor and he reported that there were no injuries detected on any part of the body of the accused.

Now, the evidence of the panch Madhukar Gujar (P.W. No. 4) in connection with the examination of the accused and the seizure of his clothes is important. It was found that the pyjama which the accused was wearing had stains of blood and semen. The witness has further stated that the panchnama correctly recorded what was seen by the panchas. Now, the panchnama is at exh. 8. It states that there were two stains of blood on the right sleeve of the pant just below the thigh and similarly at three places there were stains on the left sleeve below the thigh and near about there were stains of semen. It also states that the private parts of the accused appeared to be flushed and swollen, though it is no doubt true that the Medical Officer when he examined the accused at 9.20 p.m. did not find this to be so. It also appears from another panchanama at exh. 6 that the front room in the house of the accused was examined and there appeared to be some spots of blood. The report of the Chemical Analyser and the Serologist showed that the girl's clothes had blood, that the pyjama of the accused had blood and also semen.

The difficulty arose in the case because the child was too young to give evidence and when she came in the box she was found not able to understand the value of oath nor could she give any rational answers. In fact, in such cases the advisability of calling child witnesses has been questioned by L.C.J.

Goddard in the case of *William Evans Wallwork*¹. In this case there was no evidence of the victim...

Though evidence of statements made to Indubai by Suman cannot be given, in our view, evidence of her and Indubai's conduct is relevant under the second part of s. 8 of the Evidence Act. Explanation 1 to the section further shows that even a statement very closely connected to the conduct, in that it explains the conduct, would be admissible. That this is intended by the section is demonstrated by illustration J. to it. In the case above referred to we have the following observations (p. 162):

"...There would have been no objection to the grandmother saying: 'The little girl made a complaint to me' and she could have been asked: 'In consequence of that complaint what did you do?'—and the answer would have been 'I took her to the doctor and later to the police.' One realises that, although the terms of the child's statement must not be given, any jury could see at once that as a consequence of the complaint the grandmother took the child to the doctor and the police and that the terms of the complaint would mention her father."

Indubai says

"I saw her answering call of nature outside in the open and on seeing me she began crying and on questioning she told me that accused had placed her on his lap and blood came out."

The latter part is by way of explanation of her crying and clearly is admissible. The first circumstance, therefore, against the accused is that the child made the complaint naming the accused....

Order of acquittal set aside.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Naik.

M. W. PRADHAN v. M/s. PANCHAL ENGINEERING WORKS.*

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 85—Indian Partnership Act (IX of 1932), Secs. 46, 47—Mutual, open and current account between plaintiff and defendant firms—Suit for dissolution of plaintiff firm and appointment of Court Receiver—Suit by Receiver against defendant firm for balance due to plaintiff at foot of account—Applicability of art. 85.

There was a mutual, open and current account between the plaintiff firm and the defendant firms. One of the partners of the plaintiff firm filed a suit for dissolution of the firm on July 24, 1950. The Court Receiver was appointed to manage the property of the firm and to realise the assets. On November 3, 1953, the Receiver filed a suit against the defendant for recovery of the balance due to the plaintiff at the foot of the accounts. In the plaintiff's account relating to its transactions with the defendant the last debit entry was made on June 17, 1950, and as the accounting year ran from Divali to Divali, during the relevant year 1949-1950, November 9, 1950 was the closing date of the accounting year. On the question whether the suit filed by the Receiver was barred by limitation, the Receiver contended that the account continued to be mutual, open and current till the date of the suit and, therefore, art. 85 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, applied and the suit was within time. The defendant contended that the account had ceased to be so on the dissolution of the plaintiff firm on July 24, 1950, and that the suit was barred by limitation:—

Held, that as the plaintiff firm was dissolved on July 24, 1950, and it became incapable of continuing the dealings between the parties, the account had ceased to be mutual, open and current at the date of the suit, and that, therefore, art. 85 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, was not applicable and the suit was barred by limitation.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

D. H. Buch, instructed by Bhaishankar Kanga & Girdharlal, for the appellant.

R. L. Dalal, instructed by Mulla & Mulla & Cragie Blunt and Caroe, for the respondent.

NAIK J. This appeal arises out of a suit filed by the Court Receiver of a firm called Prabhat Trading Company against the defendant for the recovery of a sum of Rs. 7,000 and odd due at the foot of the accounts. The Prabhat Trading Company (hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff-firm) was a firm carrying on business at Bombay in the sale and purchase of paper and engineering goods. The defendant was a firm carrying on business as iron and brass founders at Ahmedabad. Among other things they were manufacturing lathe machines. The defendant-firm was placing orders with the plaintiff-firm for the supply of engineering goods. In the same way, the plaintiff-firm was also placing orders with the defendant-firm for the supply of the products of their factory. There was an account opened in the name of the defendant-firm in the plaintiff-firm, and entries were made in this account as transactions took place. The last entry made in the account with the plaintiff-firm was on June 17, 1950. It is common ground that the accounting year ran from Divali to Divali and during the relevant year viz., 1949-50, November 9, 1950, would be the closing date of the accounting year. Disputes started between the partners of the plaintiff-firm and on July 24, 1950, one of the partners filed a suit for dissolution of the firm on the Original Side of this Court (No. 1001 of 1950). On August 18, 1950, the Court Receiver had been appointed as receiver to manage the property of the firm and to realise the assets. On April 20, 1951, the Court Receiver wrote a letter (exh. B collectively) to the defendant-firm stating that a suit for dissolution of the partnership was pending in the High Court of Bombay and that he was appointed as receiver for collecting the assets and that it was noticed that a sum of Rs. 18,000 and odd was due at the foot of accounts from the defendant-firm. He called upon the defendant-firm to make that payment good and threatened action in case of its failure to pay the amount. The defendant-firm gave a reply on April 27, 1951, stating that the balance shown by the plaintiff-firm against the defendant-firm was not true and contending inter alia that a big sum was due from the plaintiff to the defendant on account of delivery of nineteen lathe machines not being taken in pursuance of a contract between the parties. The defendant, therefore, called upon the plaintiff to settle the account and accept delivery of the remaining nineteen lathe machines. The Receiver, therefore, filed a suit for the recovery of the balance due to the plaintiff-firm at the foot of accounts. The plaintiff-firm alleged that there were mutual dealings between the parties since May 1945 in respect of the goods supplied from time to time by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the goods supplied by the defendant to the plaintiff from time to time. The plaintiff averred that the account continued to be mutual, open and current till the date of the suit. At para. (7), the plaintiff referred to the correspondence that ensued between the Receiver and the defendant. It is not necessary to set out the details of that correspondence at this stage of the discussion.

The defendant-firm put in its written statement and resisted the plaintiff's claim on several grounds. It denied that the account between the parties was mutual, open and current. Alternatively, it contended that assuming that the account was mutual, open and current, the same ceased to continue as such on the dissolution of the plaintiff's partnership. At para. (12) of the written statement, the defendant gave details of the set-off, which it claimed from the plaintiff. At para. (16), it referred to the internal disputes between the members of the plaintiff-firm and stated:—

"...The disputes and difference which had arisen between the partners of the plaintiffs' firm ultimately led to the dissolution of the plaintiffs' firm as appears from the said High Court suit for dissolution of the plaintiffs' firm."

It is not necessary to set out the other defences, since the suit has been decided on the preliminary point viz., that it is barred by limitation.

Appropriate issues were framed, but the trial Court chose to treat issues Nos. 1 to 3 as preliminary issues. These issues ran as follows:—

"(1) Whether there was a mutual, open and current account between the parties before the suit was filed?

(2) Whether the suit is barred by the law of limitation?

(3) Whether the partnership firm of Messrs. Prabhat Trading Co. was dissolved on 20th June 1950 or on 24th July 1950?"

It was conceded on behalf of the plaintiff that the plaintiff-firm was dissolved with effect from July 24, 1950. The learned trial Judge, therefore, recorded a finding to that effect on issue No. 3. With regard to issue No. 1, the trial Judge proceeded on the footing that initially the account was mutual, open and current for the purpose of deciding the issue of limitation. Eventually, the trial Judge came to the conclusion that the suit was not governed by art. 85 of the Limitation Act inasmuch as the account ceased to be mutual, open and current at the date of the suit. Once it is held that art. 85 of the Limitation Act is not attracted to the facts of this case, it is clear that the suit is barred by limitation, since the date of the last debit entry was June 17, 1950 and that of the last credit entry was made on May 30, 1950, whereas the suit was instituted on November 3, 1953. Consequently, the trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's suit. It is against that judgment that the plaintiff has come up in appeal.

It is clear that the suit would be in time, in case it is held that art. 85 of the Limitation Act applies to the facts of this case. Article 85 of the Act runs thus:

1st Col. "Description of suit: For the balance due on a mutual, open and current account, where there have been reciprocal demands between the parties".

2nd Col. "Period of limitation: Three years".

3rd Col. "Time from which period begins to run: The close of the year in which the last item admitted or proved is entered in the account; such year to be computed as in the account".

It is conceded that the accounting year in this case begins from Divali to Divali, and since the last entry was dated June 17, 1950, and since Divali of that year fell on November 9, 1950, the cause of action for filing the suit under art. 85 would commence from November 9, 1950.

The crucial question, however, for consideration is whether art. 85 of the Limitation Act applies to the facts of the present case. It has been held by this Court in *Karsondas v. Surajbhan*¹ that the account must continue to be mutual, open and current till the date of the suit in order that art. 85 is attracted. The only point that was raised in the written statement was that the account had ceased to be mutual, open and current, because the plaintiff-firm had come to be dissolved. The trial Court held that the fact that the plaintiff-firm has come to be dissolved with effect from July 24, 1950, must bring the account to an end. The trial Court also proceeded to consider the effect of the demand put forward by the Receiver by the registered notice dated April 20, 1951, and the reply given by the defendant to the said notice on April 27, 1951, and came to the conclusion that the legal effect of this correspondence is that the account was closed between the parties. Mr. Buch, for the appellant, contended that the trial Court was wrong in holding that the effect of the correspondence referred to above is to close the mutual dealings between the parties. He also contended that the dissolution of the partnership would not put an end to the dealings between the parties. These two points are connected with one another and, therefore, they can be conveniently discussed together.

In order to appreciate the rival contentions raised on behalf of the parties before me, it is necessary to set out a few more facts. Suit No. 1001 of 1950 was filed by one of the partners against the other for dissolution of the plaintiff-firm. The partnership was a partnership at will. The plaintiff averred at para. (2) of the plaint in that suit that there was an express agreement to the effect that in the event of the dissolution of the firm neither of the partners shall be entitled to trade under the firm name, i.e. the Prabhat Trading Company, and that it would cease to exist. Again, at para. (6) of the said plaint, the plaintiff averred that on June 20, 1950, the defendant gave a notice alleging mismanagement of the affairs of the firm by the plaintiff and that, therefore, he was dissolving the said partnership. At para. (9) of the plaint, the plaintiff stated that he was willing to treat and was thereby treating the said firm as dissolved from the date of the filing of that suit. Alternatively, he submitted that the firm be dissolved by the Court from the date of the filing of that suit. He also requested that accounts of the said firm be taken and its affairs be wound up by or under the supervision of the High Court. The other partner in his written statement accepted the position taken by the plaintiff in the plaint. At para. (9) he reiterated that he was compelled to dissolve the said partnership by his letter dated June 20, 1950. He also submitted that the said partnership may be treated as dissolved as from the date of the filing of the suit. It will, therefore, be seen that it was common ground between the partners of the plaintiff-firm that the firm was dissolved either from June 20, 1950, or in any case from the date of the institution of the suit i.e., July 24, 1950. It is an admitted fact that the High Court has passed a decree fixing the date of the dissolution of the plaintiff-firm as July 24, 1950, and the Commissioner has been asked to take accounts of the firm. I have already pointed out that the High Court appointed a Receiver by an order dated August 18, 1950. The Receiver was called upon to take into possession the furniture and stock-in-trade of the firm. He was invested with all the powers under O. XL, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code, including the power of management of the property of the firm. It is significant to note that this order did not confer any power upon the Receiver to carry on the business of the firm. In his registered letter dated April 20, 1951, the Receiver referred in the opening paragraph to his appointment by an order of the High Court with powers to recover the outstandings due to the plaintiff-firm. It will thus be clear that the Receiver was writing the letter dated April 20, 1951, with the object of realising the outstandings belonging to the plaintiff-firm.

It is in this background that we have to consider the two points viz., (1) what is the effect in law of the dissolution of the firm upon the transactions between the parties? and (2) what is the effect of the correspondence that ensued between the Receiver on one side and the defendant on the other so far as the mutuality and openness of the account between the parties was concerned? As pointed out above, it has been held in Karsondas's case that the account must continue to remain mutual, open and current till the date of the institution of the suit. The Calcutta High Court in *Gonesh Lal v. Sheo Golam Singh*² had taken the view that it was not necessary that the account should continue to remain mutual, open and current till the date of the institution of the suit and it was enough for the application of art. 85 of the Limitation Act that the account was open, mutual and current till the end of the year when the last transaction or the last entry took place. Under art.

85 of the Limitation Act the cause of action accrues at the end of the accounting year and the Calcutta High Court proceeded on the footing that once the cause of action had accrued and once the Court came to the conclusion that till the accrual of the cause of action the account was mutual, open and current, the happening of the subsequent events, that is to say, subsequent to the accrual of the cause of action, would not affect the nature and character of the account. This view was disapproved by this Court and it categorically held that the account must continue to be open, mutual and current till the date of the institution of the suit. The learned Judges have also considered the question as to under what circumstances, the account would be deemed to have been closed between the parties. The facts of the case under the learned Judges' consideration were as follows: On July 10, 1922, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs a letter sending them an account showing the amount due from the defendants to the plaintiffs as Rs. 2,123 odd, and they stated that they had settled that amount by a hawala entry in favour of another shop, in which they alleged the plaintiffs were partners. To that letter the plaintiffs replied on July 16, saying that they did not admit the accuracy of the account and they also challenged the right of the defendants to settle the account by means of the hawala entry, and they stated that the money due must be paid to themselves. After some further correspondence, on July 28, the defendants wrote saying that they would send the moneys due viz., Rs. 2,123 odd to the plaintiffs, and they further contended in the correspondence that the accounts were correct. On July 25, 1928, the present suit was filed. Beaumont C.J. emphasized two facts viz., that there were no dealings between the parties after April 1922 and that in July the defendants sent in an account showing the amount due and made an unconditional offer to pay that amount. From these two circumstances the learned Chief Justice drew the inference that it was the intention of the defendants to close the account. Rangnekar J., who gave a concurring judgment, observed as follows (p. 937):

"...An account current means a running account, that is an account which is continued and not stopped or closed. If the account is running, that is to say, if it is unclosed, then it is open and current. It is open either because the balance remains to be drawn or struck, or because it is to be carried forward because of some contemplated future dealings between the parties. If the account is not closed by settlement or otherwise, it is open. Of course mere cessation of the dealings between the parties does not mean that the account is closed. The real question in each case would be what is the intention of the parties, and that must be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. Suppose there is a mutual, open and current account between the parties and the dealings close in July and the plaintiffs draw a balance against the defendants and then demand the sum from them intimating that no further dealings will take place between them, I am unable to see how it can be said that after July the account still remained a mutual, open and current account and continued to bear that character right up to the end of the year. There is nothing in law which prevents a party from saying to the other 'I am closing your account today. This is what is due to you. I shall have nothing to do with you in future'."

Thereafter, the learned Judge referred to a passage from Wood, 4th edn., p. 1427, which is as follows:

"The theory upon which the doctrine as to mutual accounts rests is that there is a mutual understanding between the parties, either express or implied, that they will continue to credit each other until one signifies a contrary intention, when the balance being ascertained, becomes due and payable."

The learned Judge then referred to the facts of the case and remarked that the only conclusion possible on the facts was that the account between the parties was closed.

The principles deducible from the above decision are the following:

- (1) The account between the parties may be settled by mutual consent and finally put an end to. This is the clearest case of the closure of the account between the parties.

(2) The account may be settled by one of the parties and a demand made accompanied by an intimation that he was closing the account. This also is a clear case for raising the inference that the account has ceased to be mutual, open and current.

(3) Between the two extreme positions illustrated by cases (1) and (2) above, there may be circumstances from which it will be permissible to draw the inference that the intention of the parties or either of them was to close the account.

Side by side with the positions described at Nos. 1 and 2 above, which arise out of the act of the parties, there may be cases where certain situations arise by the operation of law which would make it impossible for the parties or either of them to carry on the dealings between them. The mutuality, openness and currency of the account presupposes the continuance of the mutual dealings between the parties. If an event has taken place which will make it impossible for the parties or either of them to continue the dealings, then certainly it would be difficult to say that the account continued to be open or mutual. It is true that mere stoppage or cessation of dealings by itself is no ground for holding that the account has come to a close. But, side by side with the cessation of the dealings, if we find a situation which makes it impossible for either of the parties to continue the transactions, then it would be reasonable to draw an inference that the mutuality or openness of the account has come to an end. Such a situation would arise where one of the parties is dead or where, if it is a firm, it has been dissolved and if it is a limited company, it has gone into liquidation. As pointed out above, it was one of the terms of the agreement of partnership that after the dissolution of the partnership, the firm ceased to exist and the name of the firm could not be utilised by either of the parties and no transactions could be carried on in that name. In the present case, the firm has been dissolved with effect from July 24, 1950. The defendant is aware that the firm has been dissolved. It is significant to note that the firm has been dissolved before the date of the closing of the accounting year in which the last transaction took place viz., November 9, 1950, the date of the last transaction being June 17, 1950. If the firm is dissolved, it became incapable of continuing the dealings between the parties. That, in my view, should be sufficient to close the dealings between the parties and the logical corollary of the closure of the dealings would be the closure of the account between the parties. In this connection, reference may be made to ss. 46 and 47 of the Indian Partnership Act. Section 46 of the said Act in effect provides that

"On the dissolution of a firm every partner or his representative is entitled, as against all the other partners or their representatives, to have the property of the firm applied in payment of the debts and liabilities of the firm and to have the surplus distributed among the partners or their representatives according to their rights".

That means that once the firm is dissolved, not only the firm becomes incapable of carrying on the business of the old firm but that the assets of the firm become liable to be distributed between the partners. Section 47 of the Act provides that after the dissolution of the firm the authority of each partner to bind the firm, and the other mutual rights and obligations of the partners, continue notwithstanding the dissolution, so far as may be necessary to wind up the affairs of the firm and to complete transactions begun but unfinished at the time of the dissolution, but not otherwise. In *Kalipada v. Sree Bank Ltd.*³ (which is relied upon by Mr. Buch, for the appellant), the Bank was ordered to be wound up or liquidated and it was held that the legal effect of liquidation must mean that openness, mutuality and currency of the account are all disrupted. Of course, the Calcutta High Court took the view that although as a result of liquidation the openness, mutuality and currency of the account have come to an end, still the cause of action which was vested in the Bank when the account was mutual, open and current, would pass on to the liquidator and the liquidator could file a suit within three years from the date of the closure of the accounting year. In taking this view, the Calcutta High Court reaffirmed the view taken in Ganeshlal's case which was not accepted by this Court in Karsondas's case. I am, therefore, inclined to the view that the fact that the firm came to be dissolved even before the accrual of the cause of action must result in the disruption of the mutuality, openness and currency of the account between the parties.

Turning to the other point, it is necessary to note that the receiver in his letter (exh. B) dated April 20, 1951, after pointing out that he had been appointed a receiver with power to recover the outstandings, called upon the defendant to pay the amount due to the plaintiff with interest at nine per cent. within four days from the receipt thereof. He has also stated that in case the defendant failed to pay the said amount, further steps would be taken for the recovery of the amount. It is true that the mere circumstance that a balance has been struck at the end of the year and the further circumstance that a demand for the balance has been made by the creditor by themselves do not amount to the closing of the account. At the same time, we have to take into account the surrounding circumstances viz., the fact that demand was being made by the receiver, who was appointed by the Court in the suit for dissolution of the partnership; that the receiver was making a reference to the powers vested in him by the Court to recover the outstandings; that demand was being made by a registered notice; that the receiver was calling upon the defendant to pay interest at nine per cent., when no interest was charged in the earlier account and that finally, he made a peremptory demand for payment within a short period of four days and threatened to take legal steps for the recovery in case of default, would indicate that the notice was inspired with the intention to close the business and the account between the parties. In Firm Kamta Prasad v. Gulzari Lal,⁴ the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court was dealing with the following facts: (1) After the end of the year the plaintiff struck a balance in his books on November 3, 1937, and (2) thereafter he started making demand for payment and on April 18, 1938, he served defendant No. 1 with a registered notice of demand threatening defendant No. 1 with institution of a suit for recovery in case he failed to pay within a week. The learned Judges held that the mutuality, openness and currency of the account must be deemed to have been closed with effect from November 3, 1937. The facts of the present case are, in my view, stronger than those with which the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court were dealing. But the matter does not rest there. Assuming that the letter dated April 20, 1951, written by the receiver did not by itself amount to the closure of the account, we have on record the reply of the defendant which leaves no manner of doubt about the defendant's intention. In this letter, the defendant made a counter claim on the allegation that there was a breach of contract committed by the plaintiff in regard to the supply of twenty lathe machines. On its part, the defendant too called upon the plaintiff-firm to take delivery of the remaining lathe machines within eight days from the receipt of the letter and settle the account with the said firm. The two letters read together, therefore, lead to the conclusion that neither of the parties was intending to continue the business and that they were keen on putting an end to the transactions between themselves and thus close the account.

The result is that the appeal fails and is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

ATMARAM LAXMAN v. THE STATE OF MALLARASHTRA.*

Bombay Police Act (Bom. XXII of 1951), Sec. 161—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 197—Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), Sec. 99—Bombay District Police Act (Bom. VII of 1867), Sec. 80—Police officials when investigating murder case wrongfully detaining and assaulting suspects—Whether such wrongful acts done under colour of duty and in excess of duty—Applicability of s. 161 of Bom. Act XXII of 1951—Distinction between s. 161, Bombay Police Act and s. 197 of Criminal Procedure Code.

The accused who were police officials were charged with the duty of proceeding with the investigation in connection with a suspected murder case and they questioned the suspects for that purpose. In order to enable them to carry out this duty, they wrongfully detained these persons and assaulted them for the purpose of extorting statements or confessions in course of that investigation. On the question whether the acts of the accused came within the ambit of s. 161(1) of the Bombay Police Act, 1951:—

Held, that the wrongful acts of detention and assault were committed by the accused in the course of their official duty of investigation and though their impugned acts were not by virtue of their duty and though they were in dereliction of their duty, they were clearly under the cloak of duty within the meaning of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951.

Held further, that the impugned acts were in excess of the accused's duty or authority of questioning the witnesses for the purpose of investigation and consequently their acts would also be covered by the clause "in excess of duty imposed or authority conferred on them," and therefore the acts would come within the ambit of s. 161 of the Act.

12 (1964) Criminal Application No. 6 of 1963, decided by Wagle and Paranjpe JJ., on March 31, 1964 (Unrep.).

Police Station in Buldana district in September 1962. On September 1, 1962, one Akaram went to that police station to report that his brother Lahanu had disappeared. He expressed a suspicion that Lahanu might have been murdered. The Sub-Inspector in charge of the police station recorded that information and ordered the appellant Atmaram to enquire into that report of Akaram.

The case for the prosecution was as follows: From the report of Akaram, the appellant Atmaram suspected that Lahanu was murdered, and Shewanti w/o Sonaji, Dwarki w/o Lahanu, Sheikh Jumma, Sakharam son of Kisan and Sakharam son of Sonaji were involved in that murder. In order to obtain information from these persons with respect to the murder of Lahanu and for knowing where the corpse was, Atmaram kept these five persons in unauthorised custody from September 3, 1962, till September 7, 1962, and also assaulted them. While she was in his custody, Atmaram also committed rape of Dwarki wife of Lahanu. The co-accused Uttam and Bhikaji also helped him in these illegal acts. Hence the prosecution under ss. 330, 342, 343, 348 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code.

All the three appellants abjured the guilt. According to them, false charges were levelled against them due to enmity.

The Additional Sessions Judge, Khamgaon, found on facts that Atmaram had wrongfully confined Sheikh Jumma and had caused hurt to Sakharam son of Kisan, Sakharam son of Sonaji, Sheikh Jumma, Shewanti wife of Sonaji and Dwarki wife of Lahanu between September 3, 1962, to September 7, 1962. He also found that Atmaram had confined the other four persons from September 3 to 7, 1962. According to him, appellant No. 2 Uttam was guilty of causing hurt to Shewanti wife of Sonaji and Sheikh Jumma, and appellant No. 3 Bhikaji was guilty of causing hurt to Sakharam son of Kisan on September 7, 1962. He convicted appellant No. 1 Atmaram under ss. 330, 342, 343 and 348 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for one year on each count, the sentences being concurrent. He convicted appellant No. 2 Uttam and appellant No. 3 Bhikaji under s. 330 of the Indian Penal Code only and sentenced each of them to rigorous imprisonment for six months. Those convictions and sentences are being challenged now.

Mr. M. N. Phadke, learned advocate for the three appellants pointed out that though the offences were committed between September 3 and 7, 1962, the charge sheet was not put up in the Court till March 15, 1963, i.e. for more than six months after the commission of the offences. According to him, s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act precluded the Court from entertaining such a complaint or police report after the expiry of six months from the date of the offence and consequently the convictions and the sentences were bad in law. He also urged that the learned Additional Sessions Judge was in error in relying on the oral evidence which was interested and uncorroborated. I think it desirable to first consider the question of jurisdiction of the trial Court and then to proceed to discuss the evidence on merits if it were to be found that the trial was not vitiated by virtue of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act.

In support of his main contention, Mr. Phadke submitted that the three appellants were charged with the duty of investigating the offences of the alleged murder of Lahanu and they were performing that official duty of investigation and of questioning the suspects. According to him, the alleged wrongful detention and assault were made "under colour" or "in excess of" the duty or authority of investigation and, therefore, they were all protected by s. 161(1) of the Bombay Police Act. He was relying on the decision of the Supreme Court in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore,¹ and also on *Shriram v. State*² and *Narhari v. State*³ which I had decided on the authority of the aforesaid Supreme Court decision. Mr. Phadke also placed reliance on the order of the Division Bench in *State v. Narhari*⁴ by which leave to appeal to the Supreme Court against the decision in Narhari v. State was refused.

Mr. Palsikar, Honorary Assistant Government Pleader, contended that the impugned acts had no connection or nexus with the official duty which was assigned to the three accused and, therefore, their act of wrongfully confining and assaulting the five persons cannot come within the ambit of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act. He was relying on the opinion of the Full Bench in *Narayan v. Yeshwant; Dattatraya v. Annappa*⁵ in answer to the questions referred in First Appeal No. 346 of 1924 by Marten C.J. and Crump J. According to him, Virupaxappa's case was not applicable to the facts of the present case and the principles laid down in *State of Andhra Pradesh v. Venugopal*⁶ would more appropriately apply to the facts of this case and would show that the impugned acts not being protected by any provision of law or authority would not give the protection of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act to the accused.

Section 161(1) of the Bombay Police Act on which both parties are relying is in the following words:

"161. (1) In any case of alleged offence by the Revenue Commissioner, the Commissioner, a Magistrate, Police officer or other person, or of a wrong alleged to have been done by such Revenue Commissioner, Commissioner, Magistrate, Police officer or other person, by any act done under colour or in excess of any such duty or authority as aforesaid, or wherein, it shall appear to the Court that the offence or wrong if committed or done was of the character aforesaid, the prosecution or suit shall not be entertained, or shall be dismissed, if instituted, more than six months after the date of the act complained of." (Italics are mine).

The relevant question to be decided would, therefore, be whether the offence does or does not arise out of an act done under colour of office or in excess of duty or authority or whether it does or does not appear to the Court that the act was of the character aforesaid.

Analogous provisions with respect to acts done in the discharge of official duties have also been made in s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code and in s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Section 99, Indian Penal Code, protects "acts of a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law."

It would, therefore, be clear that s. 99, Penal Code, would countenance an act of an official if done in good faith even if it is not strictly justifiable by law by which he is governed.

The relevant provisions of s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are in the following words:

"197. (1) When... a Judge... or any Magistrate, or public servant... is accused of any offence alleged to have been committed by him while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty, no Court shall take cognizance of such offence except with the previous sanction (of the prescribed authority)."

A comparison of s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure with s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act would show that there is a considerable difference between them. Section 197(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure is limited to offences committed while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of the official duty. It does not cover acts committed under colour of or in excess of the authority. Section 161(1) of the Bombay Police Act, however, covers cases of acts done under colour of office and/or in excess of any such duty or authority. It further covers offences in which it appears to the Court that the wrong done was of the aforesaid character, viz., under colour of office or in excess of the duty. In view of this difference in the language of the two sections, there can be no doubt that the provisions of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act are much wider than those of s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. There is another important distinction also. Under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Government acts in an executive capacity and it is in the discretion of the Government whether to grant or withhold sanction under s. 197 and the orders of the Government, either refusing or granting sanction under s. 197, need not be based on legal evidence; vide, In the matter of Kalagava Bapiiah.⁷ Unlike these provisions of s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code which the Government can use in an executive manner, the provisions of s. 161 (1) of the Bombay Police Act have to be interpreted by the Courts judicially on the basis of the evidence and materials on record. That would be another important distinction between these two provisions.

Before proceeding to consider how s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act should be interpreted, I should think it necessary to review how the law regarding sanction under s. 197, Criminal Procedure Code, had been applied. In the case of *Hori Ram Singh v. Emperor*⁸ the accused, who was a Civil Surgeon in charge of a hospital, was convicted under ss. 409 and 477A of the Indian Penal Code without sanction for his prosecution under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure having been obtained. The case against him was that he had dishonestly removed certain medicines from the hospital and had converted them to his own use. It was held that the test for determining whether sanction for prosecution was or was not necessary, was whether the official capacity of the accused had been utilised or involved in the act which was complained of; if his office is involved, s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code applies and want of sanction is fatal; otherwise sanction is not necessary. On applying this test it was further held that the act of the removal of stocks of medicine did not involve any official capacity but the act of falsification of records was in its very nature such that employment of the official capacity of the accused was necessarily involved in that act and, therefore, no sanction was required for the prosecution under s. 409, but a sanction would be required for the prosecution under s. 477A of the Indian Penal Code.

In *Gill v. King*⁹ the charge was under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code. Their Lordships made the following observations for holding that the offence of receiving a bribe did not require sanction under s. 197, Criminal Procedure Code (p. 494):

"...A public servant can only be said to act or to purport to act in the discharge of his official duty, if his act is such as to lie within the scope of his official duty. Thus a judge neither acts nor purports to act as a judge in receiving a bribe, though the judgment which he delivers may be such an act; nor does a Government medical officer act or purport to act as a public servant in picking the pocket of a patient whom he is examining, though the examination itself may be such an act. The test may well be whether the public servant, if challenged, can reasonably claim that, what he does, he does in virtue of his office."

This view was reiterated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Albert West Meads v. The King.¹⁰ Their Lordships of the Supreme Court also followed these Privy Council decisions in *Ronald v. State of West Bengal*¹¹ for holding that no sanction was necessary under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code for offences under ss. 120B and 161 of the Indian Penal Code. It would be seen from the aforesaid decisions that as pointed out by Varadachariar J. in *Hori Ram Singh v. Emperor*¹² the question regarding whether the tests prescribed in those rulings were satisfied or not, was treated as a question of fact to be determined with reference to the facts of each case.

The matter again came up for discussion before the Supreme Court in Ramayya v. State of Bombay.¹³ The question was whether sanction was necessary for prosecuting the accused under s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code and s. 5(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act. Their Lordships made the following observations:

"...if s. 197, Cr. P. C. is construed too narrowly it can never be applied, for of course it is no part of an official's duty to commit an offence and never can be. But it is not the duty which the Courts have to examine so much as the act, because an official act can be performed in the discharge of official duty as well as in dereliction of it. The section has content and its language must be given meaning. The Courts have to concentrate on the word 'offence' in the section. An offence seldom consists of a single act. It is usually composed of several elements and, as a rule, a whole series of acts must be proved before it can be established. Where the elements alleged against the accused, a public servant in charge of Government stores, are first, that there was an 'entrustment' and/or 'dominion'; second, that the entrustment and/or dominion was 'in his capacity as a public servant'; third, that there was a 'disposal' and fourth, that the disposal was 'dishonest', it is evident that the entrustment and/or dominion here were in an official capacity, and it is equally evident that there could in this case be no disposal, lawful or otherwise, save by an act done or purporting to be done in an official capacity. Therefore, the act complained of, namely the disposal, could not have been done in any other way. If it was innocent, it was an official act; if dishonest, it was the dishonest doing of an official act, but in either event the act was official because the accused could not dispose of the goods save by the doing of an official act, namely officially permitting their disposal. Therefore, whatever the intention or motive behind the act may have been the physical part of it remained unaltered, so if it was official in the one case it was equally official in the other, and the only difference would lie in the intention with which it was done; in the one event, it would be done in the discharge of an official duty and in the other, in the purported discharge of it."

The matter again came up before their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Amrik Singh v. State of Pepsu.¹⁴ Relying on the earlier decisions of the Federal Court and the Privy Council, it was apparently urged that under no circumstances could it be said that misappropriation was within the scope of the duties of a public servant and, therefore, no sanction was necessary. While repelling this suggestion, their Lordships made the following observations (p. 312):

"We are of opinion that this is too broad a statement of the legal position, and that the two decisions cited lend no support to it. In our judgment, even when the charge is one of misappropriation by a public servant, whether sanction is required under S. 197(1) will depend upon the facts of each case. If the acts complained of are so integrally connected with the duties attaching to the office as to be inseparable from them, then sanction under S. 197(1) would be necessary; but if there was no necessary connection between them and the performance of those duties, the official status furnishing only the occasion or opportunity for the acts, then no sanction would be required." It would thus be seen that their Lordships liberalised the earlier view which appeared to be too rigid and stringent.

Mr. Mudholkar, Additional Government Pleader, then contended that the Supreme Court had again taken a narrower view on this point in *Satwant Singh v. State of Punjab*¹⁵ laying down the test that the act must bear such relation to the duty that the public servant could lay a reasonable but not a pretended or fanciful claim, that he did it in the course of the performance of his duty. I am afraid this would not be a correct interpretation of that decision. While dealing with the question of the necessity or otherwise of a sanction under s. 197 for an offence of cheating, their Lordships more or less summarised the views of that Court on this point. In para. 16 they made the following observations (p. 271):

"...We have no hesitation in saying that where a public servant commits the offence of cheating or abets another so to cheat, the offence committed by him is not one while he is acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty, as such offences have no necessary connection between them and the performance of the duties of a public servant, the official status furnishing only the occasion or opportunity for the commission of the offences (vide Amrik Singh v. State of Pepsu). The act of cheating or abetment thereof has no reasonable connection with the discharge of official duty. The act must bear such relation to the duty that the public servant could lay a reasonable but not a pretended or fanciful claim, that he did it in the course of the performance of his duty (vide Matajog Dobey v. H. C. Bhari)."

15 [1960] A.I.R. S.C. 266.

It was clear that their Lordships had not narrowed down the scope of their observations in the earlier case of Amrik Singh on a part of which they were again relying, in the above quotation. It appears that their Lordships summarised the view taken in the two cases mentioned therein without amending or overriding their earlier decision in Amrik Singh's case which lays down, as indicated above, that the question would depend upon the facts of each case. This decision in Satwant Singh v. State of Punjab cannot, therefore, amount to narrowing the view of the question as was suggested on behalf of the State.

On applying the test laid down by the Supreme Court as indicated above, the question to be determined even for the purpose of s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code would be whether the acts complained of are "so integrally connected with the duties attaching to the offence as to be inseparable from them". As I will show in greater detail in the sequel, the three accused were charged with the duty of proceeding with the investigation in connection with a suspected murder case and were questioning the suspects for that purpose. In order to enable them to carry out this duty, they wrongfully detained these persons and even assaulted them for the purpose of extorting statements or confessions in the course of that investigation. When that duty of investigation, which was entrusted to them, is viewed in its proper perspective, it would appear that this act of wrongful restraint and detention of the suspects and of causing hurt to them was integrally connected with the duty of questioning those persons for the purpose of investigation and it would not appear possible to separate it from their duty of investigation which they were carrying on at that time. Therefore, even according to the view of the Supreme Court with respect to sanction under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the impugned acts would amount to offences performed while purporting to do the official duty and they would, therefore, necessarily fall under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code for which a sanction would be necessary.

The three accused were not removable by the State or the Central Government, and, therefore, no sanction for their prosecution was necessary under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. However, the District Superintendent of Police had accorded his sanction as per exh. 77 which is on page 262, of the paper book. It was not disputed that this sanction was meant or intended to be under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. There was nothing in the record to support the contention of Mr. Palsikar that this sanction was given by the District Superintendent, only by way of abundant caution. The District Superintendent would not have proceeded to grant the sanction by way of abundant caution, if he had not considered it necessary. This sanction did not even mention the provision of law under which it was given or the grounds or reasons for which it was given. When there was no much lack of care in the matter of preparing that small sanction, it does not seem probable that it was given by way of abundant caution. This fact that the District Superintendent proceeded to accord a sanction apparently under s. 197, Code of Criminal Procedure, would necessarily mean that he considered that the impugned conduct of the accused was in purported discharge of their duties. This view of the immediate superior of the accused would discount the contention of Mr. Palsikar that the impugned acts were not in the purported discharge of their duty.

There is one other important indication in the record to show that the three accused were acting or purporting to act in discharge of the duties which were assigned to them. After completing the investigation against the three accused, the police put up the charge sheet which contains the following recitals:

"The case for the prosecution is that on 1-9-1962 witness No. 1 (Akaram) gave a report to the police station Jalgaon about the sudden suspicious disappearance of his brother Lahanu. That is registered in the Station Diary at Serial No. 5, dated 1-9-1962, and witness No. 22 (P.S.I. Dhoke) entrusted the enquiry into that application to the accused No. 1 (Atmaram). Accordingly, accused No. 1 made an enquiry and, on his entertaining a strong suspicion as a result of the enquiry that the witnesses Nos. 2 to 5 (Shevanti, Dwarki, Sheikh Jumma and Sakharam) were involved in the crime, he kept them under enquiry from the 3rd till the 4th of September 1962; in order to obtain real information about the murder of Lahanu and about the place of murder and the whereabouts of the dead body and for getting information on these points he kept them under custody in the Baithak of the witness No. 15 (Police Patil Sheshrao) and after that assaulted them at the Gram Panchayat Sungaon. He obtained from them written confession under pressure of beating by the police; thereafter on 7-9-1962 while bringing back witnesses Nos. 2 to 5 to Sungaon assaulted them on the road." (Details of assault are mentioned).

In view of these recitals in the charge sheet Mr. Palsikar did not dispute that the investigating officer treated these acts as having been done while performing the official duties assigned to the accused, but he contended that the opinion of the investigating officer should not bind this Court and the matter should be decided independently. Mr. Palsikar was not right in saying that the Sub-Inspector had given his opinion in the charge-sheet. Under s. 173(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code, he has to write the substance of his information which he gathers in the course of investigation. That recital is by way of substance of the information on facts which he had gathered in the course of investigation. The criticism of Mr. Palsikar on this point was not tenable.

I have already indicated the difference in the language of s. 197, Criminal Procedure Code, and s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act. Under the latter provision, with which I am concerned in this appeal, it has to be found whether the impugned acts were committed under colour of office or in excess of the duty or whether it appears to the Court that they were committed under the character of colour of duty or authority. The word "colour" in its legal sense is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "an appearance or semblance of a right, authority, office or the like." In Wharton's Law Lexicon, 14th Ed., page 214, "colour of office" is defined as follows:

"When an act is unjustly done by the countenance of an office, being grounded upon corruption, to which the office is as a shadow and colour."

In Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, 3rd ed., the word "colour" has been defined at page 521 as follows:—

"'Colour of office' is always taken in the worst part, and signifies an act evil done by the countenance of an office, and it bears a dissembling face of the right of the office, whereas the office is but a veil to the falsehood, and the thing is grounded upon Vice, and the office is as a shadow to it. But 'by reason of the office' and 'by virtue of the office' are taken always in the best part."

Their Lordships of the Supreme Court have observed in this connection, in Virupacappa v. State of Mysore in para. 10 as follows:

"It appears to us that the words 'under colour of duty' have been used in S. 161(1) to include acts done under the cloak of duty, even though not by virtue of the duty. When he (the police officer) prepares a false Panchanama or a false report he is clearly using the existence of his legal duty as a cloak for his corrupt action or to use the words in Stroud's Dictionary 'as a veil to his falsehood'. The acts thus done in dereliction of his duty must be held to have been done 'under colour of the duty'."

Mr. Phadke submitted that on applying these tests it would be clear that the acts of wrongful detention and assault were committed by the three accused persons in the course of their official duty of investigation and, though these impugned acts were not by virtue of their duty, they were obviously under the cloak of duty even though they amounted to dereliction of their duty and, therefore, they will have to be treated as being within the meaning of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act. Mr. Palsikar contended on the other hand that there was no integral connection of these impugned acts with the duty of investigation, and wrongfully detaining persons or assaulting them was not their duty and consequently they would not come under the cloak of duty within the meaning of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act.

In making this submission Mr. Palsikar was treating the clause "under the cloak of duty" as synonymous with "by virtue of the duty". He did not show any authority to support that view. On the contrary, the observations from para. 10 in Virupaxappa's case quoted above, would show that the expression "under cloak of duty" is not equivalent to but is different from the expression "by virtue of duty". Wrongfully detaining these persons and assaulting them was certainly not the duty assigned to these accused, but they committed these acts for the purpose of carrying out their duty of collecting information and confessions, if possible, from these persons. Consequently, it will have to be held that these impugned acts, though they were not by virtue of their duty and though were in dereliction of their duty, were clearly under the cloak of duty within the meaning of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act.

Mr. Palsikar then submitted that the view of the Supreme Court in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore was modified and superseded by their later decision in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Venugopal. According to him, the impugned acts cannot be permitted by s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act because an action therefor cannot be lawfully brought for anything done or intended to be done under the provisions of any law for the time being in force conferring powers on the police. He further submitted that the Supreme Court decision in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore was not in point and the matter was really covered by the opinion of the Full Bench in Narayan v. Yeshwant: Dattatraya v. Annappa on the second question referred by the Chief Justice in the First Appeal No. 346 of 1924.

Mr. Phadke, advocate for the appellants, met these contentions of Mr. Palsikar on the grounds that follow. The expression "any act done under colour of any such duty or authority" as appearing in s. 161 was explained by the Supreme Court in the case of Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore and that decision was exactly in point so far as the present case was concerned. The view of the Supreme Court in Virupaxappa's case was not modified or superseded in the later decision in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Venugopal but was specifically affirmed therein. In this later decision s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act, which was materially different from s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act was explained by their Lordships and the criticism of Mr. Palsikar based on the wordings of that s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act was not applicable to the facts of the present case. The other expression "in excess of any such duty or authority" as appearing in s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act was not considered by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Virupaxappa's case as it was not necessary for the decision of the facts therein. The opinion which the Full Bench gave on the question referred in the First Appeal No. 346 of 1924 was not applicable as claimed by Mr. Palsikar because the facts which gave rise to the reference on the point were materially distinguishable.

The contention of Mr. Palsikar that the Supreme Court decision in Virupaxappa's case was modified and superseded by their later decision in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Venugopal was based on the assumption that the Supreme Court had interpreted s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act differently in the later case but that assumption was unwarranted. A perusal of the later decision would show that their Lordships were interpreting s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act and not s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act. That s. 53 of the Madras

District Police Act, as quoted in the aforesaid decision, is in the following terms:

"All actions and prosecutions against any person, which may be lawfully brought for anything done or intended to be done under the provisions of this Act or under the provisions of any other law for the time being in force conferring powers on the police shall be commenced within three months after the act complained of shall have been committed and not otherwise."

A comparison of this provision with s. 161 (1) of the Bombay Police Act would show that the two are widely different. Since the two provisions are not in pari materia it would not be permissible to apply the interpretation of that section while interpreting s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act.

Moreover, Mr. Palsikar was also not right in suggesting that the earlier decision in Virupaxappa's case was overruled or modified by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in their later decision. Paragraph 15 in the later decision was in these terms:—

"This aspect of the matter was emphasized by this Court recently in Virupaxappa Veerappa v. State of Mysore, when examining the language of a similar provision in the Bombay District Police Act."

The similarity referred to in the two provisions in s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act and in s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act was only with respect to the word "under the provision of law". I have already pointed out that the point to be considered in the present case was whether the impugned acts were or were not under colour of duty or authority of the accused and it would not be possible to agree with Mr. Palsikar that the impugned acts cannot be treated as under colour or in excess of the duty because they did not fall under the wordings of s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act or under the provisions of any other law for the time being in force.

Mr. Palsikar was not right in his submission that the decision in Virupaxappa's case which had interpreted the provisions of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act was not in point. Their Lordships of the Supreme Court while considering the wordings of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act have held as follows (p. 851):—

"The expression 'under colour of something' or 'under colour of duty', or 'under colour of office', is not infrequently used in law as well as in common parlance. Thus in common parlance when a person is entrusted with the duty of collecting funds for, say, some charity and he uses that opportunity to get money for himself, we say of him that he is collecting money for himself under colour of making collections for a charity. Whether or not when the act bears the true colour of the office or duty or right, the act may be said to be done under colour of that right, office or duty, it is clear that when the colour is assumed as a cover or a cloak for something which cannot properly be done in performance of the duty or in exercise of the right or office, the act is said to be done under colour of the office or duty or right. It is reasonable to think that the legislature used the words 'under colour' in S. 161(1) to include this sense. It is helpful to remember in this connection that the words 'colour of office' have been stated in many law lexicons to have the meaning just indicated above."

In the face of that direct pronouncement, there was no substance in the contention that the section had not been interpreted by the Supreme Court or that that decision of the Supreme Court was not applicable to the facts of the present case.

Mr. Phadke was right in pointing out that their Lordships of the Supreme Court had not explained the expression "in excess of any such duty or authority" as appearing in s. 161 in their decision in Virupaxappa's case, as that was not necessary for the decision of the facts therein. The provisions of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, are analogous to the provisions of s. 80 of the Bombay District Police Act, 1890. The question whether the acts of an investigating officer in deliberately taking down the statement of a witness incorrectly come within the expression "done under colour or in excess of a duty imposed or any authority conferred" within the meaning of s. 80 of the Bombay District Police Act, 1890, had arisen in a criminal case. Upon a reference, the Full Bench gave its opinion on that question in Narayan Hari v. Yeshwant Raoji. The Full Bench did not explain the expression "in excess of duty or authority", but delivered the following opinion on that question:—

"Where an investigating police-officer reduces a statement of a witness to writing his act is one done under colour or in excess of a duty imposed or an authority conferred on him by s. 51(1), cl. (b), of the Bombay District Police Act, etc. whether he acts bona fide or otherwise, and even if he acts mala fide and in deliberate disregard of his proper duty or authority and deliberately takes down the statement of such witnesses incorrectly."

Relying on this opinion, Mr. Phadke contended that the impugned acts would be in excess of the duty or authority of the three accused. There is considerable force in this contention. The accused were entrusted with the duty of investigating the alleged offence of the murder of Lahauu. In furtherance of that duty, they called the witnesses for questioning them. They were not authorized to wrongfully detain those persons or to assault them for the purpose of carrying out their duty of investigation and yet they did wrongfully confine and assault those persons for the purpose of obtaining their statements in the course of investigation. These impugned acts would, therefore, clearly appear to be in excess of their duty or authority of questioning the witnesses for the purpose of investigation. Consequently, their acts would also be covered by the clause "in excess of the duty imposed or authority conferred on them" and, for that reason also, the acts would come within the ambit of s. 161 of the Bombay District Police Act.

I would next consider Mr. Palsikar's contention that the instant case was covered by the opinion of the Full Bench on the second question in the civil reference in *Narayan Hari v. Yeshwant Raoji*¹⁷. Two references were made to that Full Bench, one arising from the Criminal Revision No. 20/27 and the other arising from the First Appeal No. 346/24. I have already pointed out in the preceding paragraph what the reference in the criminal case was and what answer was given to it by the Full Bench. The facts which gave rise to the reference in the First Appeal No. 346/24 were the following: A Police Sub-Inspector and his assistant were engaged in investigating into certain charges of criminal offences committed by two members of the criminal tribe. It had been alleged that the plaintiff was harbouring these two persons and some offenders connected with them. One morning, the plaintiff happened to be passing by the office of the Sub-Inspector and he was called into the office. The Sub-Inspector, with the help of his assistant, then proceeded to question him as regards the two members of the criminal tribe, who were then in the office and put to him certain questions. The plaintiff denied any knowledge of the two persons in question, whereupon the Sub-Inspector accused him of telling lies. Afterwards, getting angry, the Sub-Inspector seized him by the moustache and pulled him into an upright position. Then defendant No. 2 at the instigation of defendant No. 1 beat him. The plaintiff then left the office and was again called back and was further threatened by the Sub-Inspector. On these facts two questions were referred to the Full Bench. Mr. Palsikar was relying only on the second question and the answer thereto. That question was in the following words:—

"Can the alleged assault or battery be said to have been committed under colour or in excess of such duty or authority?"

The answer of the Full Bench was that the alleged assault or battery cannot be said to have been committed under colour or in excess of such duty or authority. Mr. Palsikar was contending that this opinion on the second question and the ratio thereof should be treated as guides for deciding the instant case. In making that submission, he was not remembering that the facts leading to that reference and the ratio for the opinion of the Full Bench were materially distinguishable from the facts of the present case. As would be seen from the recitals of the facts therein, the acts of the Sub-Inspector from the summoning of the plaintiff upto questioning him were held by the Full Bench to be fully under colour of his duty or authority but the subsequent act of assault and battery were not in any manner connected with the discharge of his duties. It was not the case that he assaulted the plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining a statement from him. The matter of obtaining the statement had come to an end with the plaintiff's denial of any knowledge about the two members of the criminal tribe. Consequent on the answer given by the plaintiff the Sub-Inspector accused him of telling lies and afterwards getting angry, committed the acts of assault and battery. These acts were, therefore, entirely unconnected with the duty or authority which was imposed on him. The Full Bench had given the following reason for their opinion in the middle of the second column on page 361:

"In the second case, however, while the acts of the Sub-Inspector from the summoning of the plaintiff and questioning him also fell under colour of his duty or authority, by no process of reasoning can the alleged acts of battery and assault be said to fall under such colour or in excess of such duty or authority."

Since the acts were in no way connected with the duty or committed for the purpose of carrying out the duty, but were committed after the duty was over, no other answer could have been given. In view of that distinguishing feature that opinion cannot be applicable to the facts of the present case, in which the impugned acts were not unconnected with the duty but were committed for the purpose of discharging the duty. Mr. Palsikar's contention in this behalf must, therefore, fail.

In support of his contention, Mr. Palsikar was contending that the Full Bench had not given their opinion with reference to the particular facts, and even if they had given the opinion with reference to the facts of the case, the opinion of the Full Bench must be treated in the abstract without considering the facts on which it was based. Mr. Palsikar was obviously not right in saying that the opinion was not given on the facts of that particular case. In the order of reference, the facts were quoted and they were also considered by the Full Bench while delivering their opinion. The second question, which I have quoted above had referred to the "alleged assault and battery". That would necessarily mean that the question was only with reference to the facts of that case and was not meant or intended to be a general question without reference to facts. When an opinion was given on the particular facts placed before the Full Bench, it would not be permissible to say that the opinion, merely because it came from the Full Bench, should be considered in abstract without considering the facts giving rise to the reference or the facts of the case to be decided. This opinion was not meant or intended to lay down any general propositions but was with reference to the facts of that case and, therefore, it will be impossible to accept the contention that it should be applied to the present case without considering the facts either of the reference or of this case.

Mr. Palsikar was then contending that only this opinion on the second question in the civil reference would apply to the present case and the opinion of the same Full Bench in the criminal reference should not be applied. It was indeed difficult to accept or appreciate that submission. The opinion on the reference in the criminal case clearly showed that the acts of a police officer in making a false record of the statement of witnesses clearly amounted to an act done under colour of duty or in excess of duty and, therefore, s. 80(3) of the Bombay District Police Act came into operation. There was no warrant for the contention of Mr. Palsikar that this opinion in the criminal reference which was in point for the decision of the present case, should be left out of account and only the opinion on the civil reference, the facts of which were materially distinguishable should be followed. That submission also must stand rejected.

The question whether the act of making a false report by a police officer in the course of investigation was covered by s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act had recently come before this Court in another case. Certain police officers who were convicted and sentenced under s. 218 read with s. 34, Indian Penal Code, for making false reports in the course of investigation had challenged their convictions and sentences. It was urged in the course of arguments before Mr. Justice Chitale that the impugned acts were done under colour of duty or authority and the prosecution was launched more than six months after the date of offence and, therefore, the prosecution was liable to be dismissed under s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act. The learned Additional Government Pleader who appeared for the State did not dispute that the alleged acts which constituted the offence of accused Nos. 2 and 3 under s. 218 read with s. 34, Indian Penal Code, were done under colour of their duty or authority and the charge-sheet was filed more than six months after the alleged act. The learned Additional Government Pleader, however, argued that s. 161, Bombay Police Act did not affect the State as it does not refer to the State either expressly or by necessary implication, with the result that the police prosecution filed after six months would not be barred under s. 161. Since the point was of considerable importance, Mr. Justice Chitale referred it to the Division Bench. The decision of the Division Bench is reported in State v. Atmaram Mahadeo.¹⁸ The Supreme Court decision in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore was referred to. The learned Additional Government Pleader was challenging the ratio decidendi of the Supreme Court decision on the ground that the decision might have been different if arguments were addressed on the point raised by him. The Division Bench pointed out that the ratio decidendi of the case decided by the Supreme Court could not be challenged on that ground. The Division Bench after considering the law on the question held that the word "prosecution" in s. 161(1) necessarily implied that the State is referred to in that provision, and that every prosecution for an offence, whether initiated on the complaint or a police report will come under the mischief of that provision. That Division Bench decision will also repel the contention raised before me in this behalf.

Mr. Phadke then drew my attention to Narhari v. State. That application was for leave to appeal against my judgment whereby I had dismissed a prosecution in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act with respect to an alleged offence under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code read with s. 5(1)(d) and 5(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act as it was instituted more than six months after the offence was committed by the police officer under colour of his duty. The learned Additional Government Pleader had also urged therein that the later decision in State of Andhra Pradesh v. Venugopal should be followed in preference to the earlier decision in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore. It was pointed out in that decision delivered by Mr. Justice Wagle that their Lordships of the Supreme Court were considering a different provision of law in the later case, namely, s. 53 of the Madras District Police Act, and that the Supreme Court had not purported to override or dissent from its earlier decision. The case which had given rise to that application for special leave concerned a police officer, who was demanding a bribe for dropping or weakening the prosecution case which he himself was investigating. The following observations were made by Mr. Justice Wagle in that decision:—

"The result that was to be achieved in the Supreme Court case was also to lessen the gravity of the offence and the object of the police officer in the instant case was also a similar one, giving either complete relief to the accused or at least a partial relief. The facts of this case, therefore, would certainly bring it within the ratio of the decision of the Supreme Court in Virupaxappa v. State of Mysore."

It is, therefore, clear that the impugned acts of the three accused were committed under colour of office while discharging their duty and in excess of the authority vested in them. The prosecution was admittedly launched more than six months after the date of offence. Consequently, s. 161(I) of the Bombay Police Act would be a bar to entertaining the case and the prosecution ought to have been dismissed.

In the course of arguments, it had also been suggested that by giving special protection to police officers, s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act had made an invidious distinction between police officers and persons other than police officers who commit such offences. I do not think that it would be correct to say that any such invidious distinction had been made in favour of police officers by enacting s. 161. That enactment was based on a reasonable classification by giving protection to police officers so that they may not be harassed by such prosecutions, if they are made after a long lapse of time. It was also contended that interpreting s. 161 of the Bombay Police Act by giving protection to police officers would result in allowing several police officers to escape the clutches of law if only they can succeed in covering their offences for a period of six months or in managing to get the investigation delayed for more than six months. The idea of that provision is not to allow delinquent police officers to escape punishment for offences but to ensure that such police officers are not required to face prosecutions after a long lapse of time and are promptly brought to book. It was contended that the prosecution frequently find it difficult to complete the investigation within a period of six months and to put up a charge-sheet against police officers within that period. The difficulty in the way of the prosecution putting up a charge sheet within six months need not deflect the Court from arriving at a correct conclusion on the basis of the wordings of the statute. If the difficulties are genuinely felt, it would be for the Legislature to step in and amend the law as was remarked by his Lordship Mr. Justice Bhagwati in para. 17 of the Supreme Court decision in Behram Pesikaka v. State of Bombay.¹⁹

In the view that I am taking, I do not think it necessary to consider the submission of Mr. Phadke that the oral evidence on record did not establish the offences alleged against the accused. When s. 161(I) of the Bombay Police Act bars the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the prosecution, there would also be no jurisdiction to decide questions of fact arising out of the allegations of the prosecution. Consequently, I refrain from entering into any discussion on the evidence on merits though I may mention that there is considerable force in the submission of Mr. Phadke that the oral evidence was highly interested and lacked corroboration in material particulars.

In the result, the appeal is allowed, the convictions and sentences of the three appellants are quashed and set aside and the prosecution of these three accused under the several sections of the Indian Penal Code is dismissed in accordance with the provisions of s. 161(I) of the Bombay Police Act. The bail bonds of the appellants shall stand cancelled.

Appeal allowed.

There can be separate convictions for an offence under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, and an offence under s. 8(1) read with s. 23(1-A) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, in relation to the same article or thing.

the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank of India bring or send into India any gold or silver. Section 23, as it originally stood, provided for penalties and procedure for imposing the same and contained four sub-sections. Sub-section (1) provided a penalty of two years imprisonment or fine or both for any breach of any of the provisions of the Act or of any order, rule, direction made or issued under the Act. The other sub-sections are not necessary to be referred for the present purpose. By Act VIII of 1952 a new s. 23(A) was added. It is as follows:

"Without prejudice to the provisions, of section 23 or to any other provision contained in this Act, the restrictions imposed by sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 8,.... shall be deemed to have been imposed under section 19 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878 and all the provisions of that Act shall have effect accordingly except that section 183 thereof shall have effect as if for the word 'shall' therein the word 'may' were substituted."

It is evident that this section does not repeal s. 8(1) of the Act and introduce it in the Sea Customs Act or affect the penalty provision of s. 23(1). Maintaining the status quo it only introduces a fiction by which all restrictions introduced under s. 8(1) are deemed to be restrictions under the Sea Customs Act and the reasons are not far to seek. To discover any breach of such restrictions proper machinery is needed and this existed under the allied provisions of the Sea Customs Act and did not exist under the Regulations. In order to facilitate investigation of such breaches without the necessity of creating separate machinery, the restrictions were fictionally imported into the Sea Customs Act. But the breach of restrictions still continued to be an offence under s. 8(1) read with s. 23(1) which is made clear by the introductory saving clause "without prejudice to...section 23 or...Act".

It would seem that any breach of the restrictions under s. 8 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act which were deemed to be made under s. 19 of the Sea Customs Act, would be an offence under the latter Act, under cl. 8 of the schedule in s. 167 under which the penalty is one of fine and confiscation. By Act X of 1963, cl. 81 was introduced in the schedule to s. 167 of the latter Act. The clause is complicated and provides for a large many matters. It may be broken up into its constituent parts as follows:

(1) If any person knowingly or with intent to defraud the Government of any duty payable thereon acquires possession or is concerned in carrying or removing, depositing, harbouring or concealing or in any manner dealing with goods (a) which have been unlawfully removed from a warehouse (b) or which are chargeable with a duty which has not been paid (c) or with respect to the importation or exportation of which any prohibition or restriction is for the time being in force. (2) If any person knowingly and with intent to evade any prohibition or restriction for the time being in force under or by virtue of this Act with respect thereto acquires possession or is concerned in carrying, removing, depositing, harbouring, keeping or concealing or in any manner dealing with any goods (a) which have been unlawfully removed from a warehouse (b) or which are chargeable with a duty which has not been paid (c) or with respect to the importation or restriction of which any prohibition or restriction is for the time being in force as aforesaid. (3) If any person is in any way knowingly concerned in any fraudulent evasion or attempt at evasion (a) of any duty chargeable as aforesaid (b) or of any prohibition of this Act applicable to those goods.

Under this clause in all the offences intention is a necessary ingredient of the offence, which may be to evade duty or prohibition and restrictions. Moreover it is any one of the physical act in connection with the goods there referred to that is made an offence but it does not deal with the actual importation of gold contrary to the restrictions, for one may do any of the acts mentioned in the clause in connection with the articles without himself actually importing them into India which is an offence under the Foreign Exchange Regulation

Act. For the reasons stated above if the acts and omissions of the accused satisfied the requirement of each one of the enactments then he could be convicted under both since each one of the Acts continued to operate.

But by s. 10 of Act XXXIX of 1957, s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act was amended which recast sub-s. (1). The scheme under the amendment is to provide penalty for some offences separately. By sub-s. (1) two kinds of penalties for offences under ss. 4, 5, 9 and sub-s. (2) of s. 12 are prescribed and provision for its levy is made. Sub-section (1-A) is almost similar to original sub-s. (1). Clause (a) provides a penalty of two years' imprisonment and fine or both for contravention of any provisions of the Act or direction, rule etc. except of those referred in sub-s. (1) and s. 19 and as to the latter provided by cl. (b) only a penalty of a fine not exceeding two thousand rupees. By sub-s. (1-B) power is given to the Court or authority to make an order for confiscation.

Section 8 of the General Clauses Act provides that any references in any Act or instrument to any of the provisions of an enactment which is repealed and re-enacted with or without modification by another enactment shall be construed, unless a contrary intention appears, as references to the re-enacted provision. There is nothing in the amending Act XXXIX of 1957 indicating that reference to s. 23 in s. 23-A should not be read as references to the substituted sub-s. 23(1-A). The position, therefore, even after the amendment of s. 23 continued the same as before. In the case referred to by Mr. Kode the only question before the Court was whether a breach of regulation issued under s. 8(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act would be punishable under cl. (81) of schedule of s. 167 which the Court answered in the affirmative and indeed rightly. It is apparent that the decision in *Secy. of State v. H. C. I. Society*² can apply to cases of incorporation of the provisions of an earlier statute in another and the earlier is thereafter amended. On the other hand, it may be regarded as well settled that a deeming provision must have its full effect including all logical consequences flowing from it. In our view, therefore, apart from anything else, there can be separate convictions and sentences under both Acts.

Mr. Kode relies on s. 26 of the General Clauses Act in support of the same contention. For its application the section requires that "an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more enactments" which means that the same set of facts must constitute offence under both the Acts. If the ingredients of the offences in each act are different then even if the offence is committed in relation to the same article or thing the section cannot apply. This interpretation has been accepted in Reoti v. Emperor.³ We have explained above that the ingredients for offences under each Act are different. In one case mere carrying or dealing with an article with the necessary intent is an offence while in the other bringing into India.

The charges against the accused are: (1) they conspired to bring gold into India with intent to defraud the Government and to evade the prohibitions and restrictions; (2) that for these purposes they acquired possession or were concerned in acquiring possession of gold; (3) that they were concerned at several places in fraudulent evasion or attempt at evasion of the duty chargeable thereat and prohibitions and restrictions relating to it; (4) that they imported the gold into India without the permission of the Reserve Bank of India. The charges being in respect of separate acts respecting evasion of duty and importation of gold, in our view separate sentences on both the counts are proper, though in the second and the third charges the words "in relation to evasion of restrictions" may as well have been omitted. In any case, the learned Magistrate has directed that sentences regarding conspiracy and the main offences under the Sea Customs Act the subject matter of the second and the third charges run concurrent. If separate sentences could not be passed respecting the second and the third charges and the fourth charge, sentences regarding the first charge and that regarding the second, third and fourth could, in our view, have been directed to be consecutive in view of the gravity of the offence. The sentences are, therefore, legal.

We also cannot accede to the plea of Mr. Kode for reduction of sentence as the circumstances justify the sentences which in our view are not excessive.

Both appeals, therefore, fail and are dismissed. The accused to surrender to their bail.

Appeals dismissed.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai.

LAXMAN DAMODHAR ZOTING v. SHAMRAO VISHWANATH.
JAWADE.*

Bombay Village Panchayat Election Rules, 1959—Ballot paper contained in ballot box of one constituency whether can be considered while counting votes in respect of another constituency.

Under the Bombay Village Panchayat Election Rules, 1959, a ballot paper contained in a ballot box for one constituency cannot be considered while counting votes of candidates from another constituency.

Therefore, if a voting paper issued to a voter from a certain ward is found in the ballot box pertaining to another ward, it cannot be taken into consideration in counting the votes of candidates who had stood for election from the former ward.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

P. B. Gadkari, for the petitioner.

R. N. Deshpande, for respondent No. 1.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioner and opponents Nos. 1 to 3 stood as candidates for election from ward No. 2 to the Gram Panchayat of mouza Khadki. Two members were to be elected from this ward and one of the two seats was reserved for women. After the election, the petitioner and opponent No. 2 were declared elected. Subsequently, opponent No. 1 filed an election petition challenging the election of the petitioner. The learned Civil Judge, who heard the petition, found that 13 voting papers, which bore more than one stamp mark against the name of a candidate, had been wrongly rejected, as in his opinion the manner of stamping did not suggest that the voter in each of these cases intended to record more than one vote for the same candidate. His finding on this point has not been challenged before us. The learned Judge also found that one voting paper bearing No. 10 which had been issued to a voter from ward No. 2 had been found in the ballot box pertaining to ward No. 1. This voting paper had been rejected by the Returning Officer because it was not found in the ballot box for ward No. 2. It was admitted before the learned Judge that the ballot boxes for both the wards Nos. 1 and 2 had been kept in the same room. As the voting paper related to the same election, the learned Judge was of the opinion that this voting paper could not be rejected and it should be considered in counting the votes. The votes recorded on this voting paper were in favour of opponents Nos. 1 and 3. As a result of the recounting of the votes, including the votes recorded on this voting paper, the petitioner and opponent No. 1 were found to have polled equal number of votes. The learned

*Decided, September 12, 1964. Special Civil Application No. 37 of 1963.

Judge then drew lots and declared opponent No. 1 to be duly elected. He set aside the election of the petitioner.

Mr. Gadkari, who appears on behalf of the petitioner, has contended that the view taken by the learned Judge in regard to the voting paper No. 10 referred to above is wrong. It seems to us that his contention on this point must be accepted. Mr. Gadkari referred to r. 24 of the Bombay Village Panchayat Election Rules, 1959, which states that it shall be the duty of the presiding and polling officers and their assistants to see that votes are recorded with absolute secrecy, that only such persons as may be admitted to the polling booth under the rules are admitted thereto and that persons who have recorded their votes or against whom objections have been heard and upheld leave immediately. In the present case, it appears that the ballot boxes for both the wards Nos. 1 and 2 had been kept in the same room. But in para. 3 of the petition, it has been stated that there were separate booths and separate polling officers for each of these wards. That statement in the petition has not been denied. Having regard to the provisions of r. 24, it has been urged by Mr. Gadkari that the voter, to whom ballot paper No. 10 was issued, could not have himself gone to the wrong booth, i.e. to the booth for ward No. 1, and put the voting paper in the ballot box of that ward. It is, however, not necessary to speculate how this voting paper came to be placed in the ballot box for ward No. 1, because the election rules clearly contemplate that in counting the votes for any constituency, only the voting papers contained in the ballot boxes pertaining to that constituency should be taken into consideration.

Sub-rule (1) of r. 19 states that on the morning of the polling day, the presiding officers shall each be supplied with a ballot box with an aperture for receipt of voting papers, a copy of the sections of voters' list pertaining to their polling stations and a bound book or books of voting papers serially numbered in foil and counterfoils at the rate of one voting paper for each voter in the voters' list. Each polling station is, therefore, to be provided with a separate ballot box, with a copy of the section of voters' list pertaining to that polling station and a separate bound book or books of voting papers serially numbered at the rate of one voting paper for each voter in the voters' list. Separate voting papers are, therefore, provided for use at each polling station. Rule 22 states that every voter desirous of recording his vote shall attend for the purpose at the polling station for the ward for which he is entered in the voters' list. Clause (v) in r. 23 provides that the voter shall, after making his mark on the voting paper, fold the paper and insert the folded voting paper into the ballot box and without undue delay leave the polling room. It has been urged by Mr. Deshpande that these provisions are only directory and that failure to comply with them would not make the voting paper invalid. There might perhaps be some force in the argument, so far as the folding of the voting paper is concerned. But it seems to us to be an essential requirement of this rule that the voting paper must be put in the ballot box, for otherwise the secrecy of the voting cannot be maintained. It is also clearly implied in this rule that the voting paper must be put in the ballot box kept in the particular polling room. Sub-rule (1) of rule 30 states that the presiding officer shall, after the close of the poll, in the presence of any candidate or representative of a candidate, if present, seal the aperture of the ballot boxes and seal with his own seal and the seal of any candidate or representative, who may desire to affix his seal, each ballot box in use at the polling station. It is obvious that the candidate, who can be allowed to affix his own seal on a ballot box, must be a candidate from that particular constituency. Rule 32 provides for the inspection of the ballot boxes by the candidates and their agents, for the Returning Officer's satisfying himself that none of the boxes has in fact been tampered with, for the opening of the ballot boxes and taking out and counting the ballot papers contained therein and for the rejection of invalid voting papers. These rules suggest that in respect of votes recorded at a polling station, only the ballot papers contained in the ballot box kept at that polling station are to be taken into consideration. Rule 33 mentions the grounds on which a ballot paper contained in a ballot box shall be rejected. This rule provides that a ballot paper contained in a ballot box shall be rejected if

“(b) it bears any serial number... different from the serial numbers... authorised for use at the polling station at which the ballot box in which it was found, was used.”

A ballot paper pertaining to any polling station must, therefore, be rejected if it is found in the ballot box of another polling station. It follows that a ballot paper contained in a ballot box for one constituency cannot be considered while counting votes of candidates from another constituency.

The voting paper No. 10 in this case was not found in the ballot box of ward No. 2. It could not, therefore, have been taken into consideration in counting the votes of candidates, who had stood for election from ward No. 2. The view taken by the learned Civil Judge on this point is, therefore, not correct.

If this voting paper is excluded as it must be, the position will be that the valid votes recorded in favour of the petitioner will be 33, while those recorded in favour of the opponent will be 32. The petition, therefore, succeeds. We set aside the order made by the Civil Judge setting aside the election of the petitioner and confirm the original declaration declaring the petitioner to be duly elected from ward No. 2. The petitioner to get his costs from opponent No. 1.

Petition allowed.

City of Nagpur Corporation Act (II of 1950), Sec. 374—Corporation alleging damages due to it for breach of contract—Whether Corporation can recover such damages by distress and sale of property from person alleged to have caused such breach of contract.

Section 374 of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948, does not empower the Corporation to recover damages or any other sum, which, according to the Corporation, is due to it on account of a breach of a contract entered into by the Corporation for carrying out a work on behalf of the Corporation, by distress and sale of the property of a person from whom such sum is alleged to be due.

Gajanan v. Municipal Commr.,¹ distinguished.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. S. Padhye, for the petitioner.

C. S. Dharmadhikari, for the respondents.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioners are a partnership firm carrying on the business of building contractors in Nagpur. They entered into a contract with the Municipal Corporation of the City of Nagpur for constructing 100 quarters. They constructed 50 quarters. Thereafter disputes arose between the parties, on account of which the petitioners did not complete the work of the construction of the remaining 50 quarters. The Corporation, therefore, carried out the remaining part of the work departmentally. On August 28, 1962, the Corporation issued a notice to the petitioners under s. 374 of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948, informing the petitioners that the Corporation proposed to recover Rs. 8,225 from the petitioners on account of the non-fulfilment of the contract work of the construction of 100 quarters and that they proposed to do so by issue of a distress warrant as provided by s. 374 read with s. 154 of the Nagpur Corporation Act. The petitioners made certain representations against this notice, but these were of no avail. Subsequently, a distress warrant was also issued on February 7, 1963. The petitioners then filed the present special civil application in which they have prayed that the distress warrant dated February 7, 1963, should be quashed.

The question, which arises for determination in this application, is whether s. 374 of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act empowers the Corporation to recover damages or any other sum, which, according to the Corporation, is due to it on account of a breach of a contract entered into by the Corporation for carrying out a work on behalf of the Corporation, by distress and sale of the property of a person, from whom such sum is alleged to be due. Section 374 of the Act provides:

"In any case not expressly provided for in this Act or in any rule or bye-law made thereunder, any sum due to the Corporation on account of any charge, cost or costs, expenses, fees, rates or rent or any other account under this Act or under any such rule or bye-law, shall be recoverable by distress and sale of the movable property of the person from whom such sum is due, in the manner provided by Chapter XII."

This section, therefore, authorises the Corporation to recover in the manner specified any sum due to the Corporation on account of any charge, cost or costs, expenses, fees, rates or rent or any other account under this Act or under any rule or bye-law made under the Act. The sum which the Corporation claims on account of the breach of contract cannot be said to be of the nature of a charge, cost or costs, expenses, fees, rates or rent. It can only fall under the words "any other account under this Act or under any such rule or bye-law". The Corporation has no doubt the authority to enter into contracts for the purpose of carrying out certain works; but it will be difficult to hold that a sum, ascertained or unascertained, which the Corporation claims on account of a breach of contract, would fall under the words "any other account under this Act or under any such rule or bye-law." When a breach of contract is alleged, several questions of fact and law arise for consideration, such as, who broke the contract, when the breach took place, whether as a result of the breach, any loss has been sustained, and if so, how much. In the present case, for instance, the petitioners have alleged in the petition that it was the Corporation which was guilty of breach of the contract. They have also alleged in para. 14 of the petition that on account of the Corporation's failing to perform its part of the contract, they have suffered a loss of about Rs. 68,000. The Corporation had sent along with the notice issued to the petitioners a statement showing how the figure of Rs. 8,225 had been arrived at. Many of the items in this statement are not admitted by the petitioners. Disputed questions of fact and law will, therefore, have to be decided before it can be said that any particular sum is due to the Corporation. We do not think that it could possibly have been intended by the Legislature that in the absence of any express agreement between the parties, the Corporation should be the Judge in its own cause and determine who had broken the contract, the Corporation itself or the contractor, and also how much amount it should receive on account of damages from the contractor. In our opinion, therefore, s. 374 does not empower the Corporation to recover in the manner laid down in this section any amount, such as the one it proposes to recover in the present case.

On behalf of the Corporation, Mr. Dharmadhikari has relied upon *Gajanan v. Municipal Commr.*¹ In that case, the Corporation had given a block in a chawl belonging to the Corporation to the petitioner, who had executed an agreement of licence in favour of the Corporation for the period from February 3, 1960, to March 31, 1961. The petitioner vacated the block before the expiry of the period of the licence and handed it over to the Corporation. The Corporation then put the block to auction. Subsequently, the Corporation claimed from the petitioner the amount of the loss which it had sustained, on account of the petitioner's vacating the block before the expiry of the period of the licence. Part of the claim related to the amount payable to the Corporation for the period the block remained unoccupied, while the rest of the claim was made as and by way of compensation, being the difference between the amount which the petitioner was liable to pay for the remaining period and the amount actually recovered from the new occupant. It was held that the amount claimed by the Corporation fell within the purview of s. 374, as being due on "any other account under this Act" within the meaning of s. 374. This case is clearly distinguishable from the one before us. In that case, the amount was claimed in respect of property of the Corporation, which had been given for use and occupation for a certain period on an agreement to pay a certain amount each month. The sum, which the Corporation claimed, was also an ascertained sum, being the difference between what the Corporation would have realized under the agreement from the petitioner, if he had continued in occupation for the whole period of the licence and the amount which actually it realised. This decision cannot, therefore, be relied upon in support of the contention that even in cases of breach of building contracts, such as the one in the present case, the Corporation could itself determine who had committed the breach of the contract and also assess the amount of damages, which might be due to it.

We, therefore, allow the petition and quash the distress warrant dated February 7, 1963, which the Corporation had issued in order to recover Rs. 8,225 from the petitioners. The petitioners should get their costs from the respondents.

Petition allowed.

A civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit by an employee against his employer for recovery of wages, after the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed by s. 15(2) of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936 for making an application to the Authority appointed under the Act, or after the Authority has refused to condone the delay in making such an application.

to December 1955, which according to him had not been paid to him by the petitioners. Under the first proviso to sub-s. (2) of s. 15 of the Act the application has to be made to the authority within one year from the date on which the payment of wages was due to be made. The second proviso permits an application to be made after the period of one year when the applicant satisfies the authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within such period. The authority refused to condone the delay in making the application for the period prior to December 1955. The authority directed the petitioners to pay to the respondent his wages for the month of December 1955, leave wages and notice pay. The respondent did not appeal against this order. On January 2, 1958, the respondent filed a suit in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, for recovering the wages alleged to have been due to him for the period from December 1, 1954, to November 30, 1955. The applicants denied the respondent's claim. They also contended that the Small Causes Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit by reason of s. 22 of the Payment of Wages Act. This contention was accepted by the trial Judge and the suit was dismissed. An application was then made to a Bench of the Small Causes Court under s. 38 of the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act. Relying on the observations made in Special Civil Application No. 879 of 1956¹ the Bench of that Court held that the suit filed by the respondent was maintainable. The decree passed by the trial Court dismissing the suit was, therefore, set aside and the suit was remanded to the trial Court. Thereafter the petitioners filed the present civil revision application, in which it has been contended that the view taken by the Bench of the Court of Small Causes is erroneous. This civil revision application came up for hearing before a Division Bench of this Court, which decided to refer it to a Full Bench.

The question which arises for consideration by the Full Bench is as under :

"Whether a Civil Court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit by an employee against his employer for recovery of wages, after the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed by sub-section (2) of section 15 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936 for making an application to the Authority appointed under this Act, or after the Authority has refused to condone the delay in making such an application."

Sub-section (1) of s. 15 of the Payment of Wages Act states that the State Government may appoint one or more persons to be the authority or authorities to hear and decide for any specified area all claims arising out of deductions from wages or delay in payment of wages to persons employed or paid in that area. Sub-section (2) of this section, in so far as it is material, provides :

"Where contrary to the provisions of this Act any deduction has been made from the wages of an employed person, or any payment of wages has been delayed, such person... may apply to such authority for a direction under sub-section (3)..."

Provided that every such application shall be presented within one year from the date on which the deduction from the wages was made or from the date on which the payment of the wages was due to be made, as the case may be:

Provided further that any application may be admitted after the said period of one year when the applicant satisfies the authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within such period."

Sub-section (3) states that where any application under sub-s. (2) is entertained, the authority shall hear the applicant and the employer or other person responsible for the payment of wages, or give them an opportunity of being heard, and after such further inquiry, if any, as may be necessary, may direct the refund to the employed person of the amount deducted or the payment of delayed wages. Sub-section (5) provides that any amount directed to be paid under this section may be recovered by the authority as an arrear of land revenue. This section, therefore, provides for the constitution of a special Tribunal to hear and decide all claims arising out of deductions from wages or delay in payment of wages, as defined in the Act. The section also lays down that an application under this section must be made to the authority within one year from the date on which the deduction from the wages was made or from the date on which the wages were payable. The application may be made even after the expiry of one year, provided the employee satisfies the authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within such period.

Sub-section (1) of s. 17 provides for an appeal against an order made by the authority. Sub-section (2) of this section states that save as provided in sub-s. (1), any order dismissing either wholly or in part an application made under sub-s. (2) of s. 15, or a direction made under sub-s. (3) or sub-s. (4) of that section shall be final. This provision, therefore, gives finality to the order made by the authority under s. 15, unless it is set aside or modified in appeal under s. 17. Section 22 is in the following terms:

"22. No court shall entertain any suit for the recovery of wages or of any deduction from wages in so far as the sum so claimed—

(a) forms the subject of an application under section 15 which has been presented by the plaintiff and which is pending before the authority appointed under that section or of an appeal under section 17; or

(b) has formed the subject of a direction under section 15 in favour of the plaintiff; or

(c) has been adjudged, in any proceeding under section 15 not to be owned to the plaintiff; or

(d) could have been recovered by an application under section 15."

The marginal note to this section is: "Bar of suits." This section, therefore, ousts the jurisdiction of a civil court in respect of the matters specified therein. It cannot, therefore, be said that s. 15 provides a remedy in addition to that available under the ordinary law. Clause (a) bars a suit when the claim made under s. 15 is under investigation either before the authority or in appeal. Clause (b) does the same when the employee has succeeded in his application and has obtained a direction in his favour. In view of cl. (c) no suit can lie when in the proceeding under s. 15 it is found that no sum is due to the employee. Clause (d) bars a suit when the sum claimed could have been recovered by an application under s. 15. The question, which we have to determine, is in regard to the interpretation of this cl. (d).

In construing this clause it is necessary to bear in mind its phraseology. Omitting cls. (a), (b) and (c), the section reads:

"No Court shall entertain any suit for the recovery of wages or of any deduction from wages, in so far as the sum so claimed... could have been recovered by an application under section 15."

The significant words are "sum so claimed... could have been recovered by an application under section 15." The emphasis seems to be more on the mode of recovery specified in this clause, that is, by an application under s. 15 rather than on the time when the remedy is resorted to. If, therefore, the sum claimed could be or could have been recovered by an application under s. 15, a suit for the recovery of the same will be barred. Under the first proviso to sub-s. (2) of s. 15, an application under this section must be made within one year from the date on which the wages became due for payment or the date on which they are alleged to have been wrongfully deducted. It has not been disputed before us that during this period of one year the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is ousted. The same will be the position if the employee makes the application after one year and shows satisfactory cause for the delay in making it. It is difficult to see why the position should be different merely because of laches or negligence on the part of the employee in either not making an application to the authority or making it after the prescribed time but without there being a sufficient cause for not making it in time. His failure to take advantage of the special remedy provided cannot affect the jurisdiction of the Court. It seems to us, therefore, that if it was possible for the employee to recover the amount by making an application for its recovery under s. 15 within the prescribed time before he institutes the suit, the Court will not be competent to entertain the suit. If the employee delays the making of the application until the period of limitation has expired, and if he is unable to show sufficient cause for the delay, it cannot be said that he could not have recovered the amount by an application under s. 15.

It has been urged that the word "recovered" indicates that cl. (d) has reference to the stage of recovery referred to in sub-s. (5) of s. 15, that is, when the amount directed to be paid under sub-s. (3) of s. 15 is to be recovered as an arrear of land revenue. This argument does not seem to be correct. The question of recovering the amount as an arrear of land revenue can only arise after a direction has been made under sub-s. (3) of s. 15. Clause (b) in s. 22 bars a suit when such a direction has been made. Apart from the fact that sub-s. (5) does not provide for a separate application for realising the amount directed to be paid, no suit can lie after such a direction has been made, whether the amount is or is not recovered. Clause (d) would, therefore, become redundant if the above view is accepted.

Having regard to the context, the words "sum so claimed... could have been recovered by an application under section 15," in our opinion mean "could have made an application for recovery of the sum so claimed under section 15." The test for determining whether a suit can lie, therefore, is not only whether on the date of the suit an application can be made to the authority under s. 15, but also whether such an application could have been made before the institution of the suit. The jurisdiction of the Civil Court to entertain a suit will not consequently depend upon the choice of the employee as to whether he should or should not apply to the authority. The Civil Court's jurisdiction will be ousted if the application could have been made to the authority before the suit is filed. If, therefore, an employee does not apply to the authority for recovering his wages within one year or if he applies to the authority after one year but fails to satisfy the authority that he had sufficient cause for not making the application within one year, he will not be able to maintain a suit for the same purpose.

The view, which we are taking, seems to be in accordance with the intention of the Legislature. The Act provides for the constitution of a special tribunal for deciding claims in regard to wages. The proceedings before the tribunal are cheap, because by reason of s. 15A the applicant is not liable to pay any Court-fees. The limitation of one year has been prescribed for making applications under s. 15, so that claims in regard to wages may be made and decided expeditiously. If, however, for any good reason an employee is not able to make the application within one year, he may do so after the expiry of this period by satisfying the authority on this point. Having provided a cheap and expeditious remedy and having constituted a special tribunal for this purpose, the Legislature intended that it should have exclusive jurisdiction in respect of matters, which it could entertain. Subject to appeal, finality has, therefore, been given to the decisions of the authority, while s. 22 deprives the Civil Court of its jurisdiction to deal with such matters.

Mr. Sukthankar has strongly relied on the following observations of Chagla C.J. in Special Civil Application No. 879 of 1956 decided on September 3, 1956:

"Now, as has been often pointed out, the Payment of Wages Act was enacted in order to confer upon the workers certain important rights. A quick and expeditious remedy was provided for recovering wages and a special tribunal was set up. But it would be entirely erroneous to suggest that any provision under the Payment of Wages Act was in derogation of the ordinary rights of employees. If an application could be made under section 15, then undoubtedly a civil court is debarred from entertaining a suit in respect of that cause of action. But in order that an application could be made under section 15, not only must the application refer to the subject matter referred to in that section, but the application must be within the time also mentioned in that section. In other words, if an employee wishes to avail himself of this expeditious remedy and wishes to go before the special tribunal, he must go within one year. But if he fails to do so, it does not follow that he is debarred from going to the civil court within the period of limitation provided by the limitation Act to recover his wages."

With respect, it may be pointed out that s. 22 in terms takes away the remedy available to an employee under the ordinary law to the extent specified in the section. This section is, therefore, to the extent specified therein, in derogation of the ordinary rights of employees to approach a Civil Court. Clause (d) does not also say, "If an application could then be made under section 15." The words used are: "the sum claimed... could have been recovered by an application under section 15." If, therefore, when a suit is filed the Court finds that at any time before the institution of the suit it was possible for the employee to make an application for the recovery of the wages claimed under s. 15, it will have no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. With respect, therefore, we do not agree with the above observations. They also appear to be obiter, as they were not necessary for decision of the particular case, before the Division Bench.

In Bhagwat Rai v. Union of India,² a Division Bench of the Nagpur High Court has taken the same view as we are inclined to take. It was held in that case that s. 22(d) of the Payment of Wages Act excludes the jurisdiction of a Civil Court to entertain a claim, which could have been recovered by an application under s. 15 of the Act, that this exclusion is absolute and does not depend on the choice of the claimant and that the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is not revived by his omission to make an application under s. 15 within the time allowed by law.

The reply to the question, which we have formulated for our consideration, will, therefore, be in the negative. The matter may now be placed before a Division Bench for further orders.

Bombay Public Trusts Act (Bom. XXIX of 1950), Secs. 79, 80, 22A, 70A—Person not party to proceedings under Act finding his property registered as trust pursuant to such proceedings—Whether person precluded from filing suit for declaration of his title to property.

A person who was not a party to the proceedings under the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, but finds that his property is registered as trust property pursuant to the said proceedings, is not precluded under ss. 79 and 80 of the Act from filing a suit for declaration of his title to such property in a Civil Court.

A Hindu widow who had inherited her husband's property donated it to a Jain Mandir by a gift-deed executed in 1945. After her death the plaintiff as one of the reversioners filed a suit for partition and separate possession of his share in the property on the ground that the widow who had a limited estate had no right to donate the property. On the question whether the Civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit in view of s. 80 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950:—

that the said question was not covered by s. 79 of the Act, and that, therefore, the suit was not barred under s. 80 read with s. 79 of the Act.

K. B. Sukthankar, for respondent No. 1-plaintiff.

K. J. Abhyankar, for respondent No. 5-defendant No. 4.

CHITALE J. These are appeals by the trustees of 'Shri Adinath Tirthankar Jain Mandir' and the Charity Commissioner against the order of remand passed by the learned Assistant Judge, Kolhapur.

These appeals arise in this way. The suit property, which is land, originally belonged to one Devappa. After the death of Devappa and his son Annappa, Devappa's property was inherited by his widow Ratnabai. She donated the suit land to 'Shri Adinath Tirthankar Jain Mandir,' which is defendant No. 1 in the present suit. The gift-deed was executed on July 23, 1945. After the execution of that gift-deed Ratnabai died sometime later during the same year. The plaintiff alleges that he and defendants Nos. 2 to 4 are reversioners to the estate of Annappa. The plaintiff filed the present suit for partition and separate possession of his one-fourth share in the suit land. According to the plaintiff, Ratnabai as a widow in the joint Hindu family had a limited estate and she had no right to donate the suit land to the said Mandir. On these allegations, partition and separate possession of one-fourth share is claimed by the plaintiff. The Charity Commissioner is defendant No. 5 in the present suit.

The suit was contested on various grounds, one of them being that the Civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain and try the present suit in view of s. 80 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act"). The trial Court upheld that contention and dismissed the plaintiff's suit. Against this decision, the plaintiff preferred an appeal to the District Court, Kolhapur. The learned Assistant Judge, who heard the appeal, held that the present suit is not barred under s. 80 of the above-said Act. He, therefore, set aside the decree passed by the trial Court and remanded the suit to the trial Court for disposal on merits. It is against this decision, that Appeal from Order No. 271 of 1962 is preferred by the trustees of the above-said Mandir. Appeal from Order No. 302 of 1962 is preferred by the Charity Commissioner against the same decision.

Mr. Shrikhande, who appears for the trustees, and Mr. Abhyankar, who appears for the Charity Commissioner, both contend that the view taken by the trial Court is correct and that of the lower appellate Court is wrong. Reliance is placed on ss. 79 and 80 of the Act. It is urged that the question in the present suit is whether the suit land is the property of the plaintiff and defendants Nos. 2 to 4, or whether it is the property of a public trust in the name of defendant No. 1. This question must be decided by the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner or the Charity Commissioner under s. 79, hence jurisdiction of the Civil Court is barred under s. 80 of the Act. I am unable to accept this contention. Considering the allegations in the plaint in the present suit, it is clear that the question raised by the present suit is whether the author of the alleged trust, viz. Ratnabai, had the capacity to create the trust in question. According to the plaintiff, Ratnabai had no authority to create the trust, hence no trust exists in the eyes of law. That is the contention raised by the present suit. Thus the question for determination in these appeals is whether the above-said question, viz. whether Ratnabai had the authority to create the trust in question, is covered by s. 79 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act. It is urged by Messrs. Shrikhande and Abhyankar that under the Act, the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner or the Charity Commissioner has to decide whether a public trust exists or not and while deciding that they have also jurisdiction to decide the above-said question. It is further urged that not only they have jurisdiction to decide that, but they are bound to decide it while arriving at the finding whether a public trust exists or not. In other words, while deciding whether a public trust exists or not, all other incidental questions could be decided, in fact they have got to be decided, by the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner or the Charity Commissioner. In support of this contention, reliance is placed on a decision of this Court, viz. *Taraben Baldevdas v. Charity Commr.*¹ As pointed out by the learned appellate Judge, the question that arises in these appeals was not decided in that case and it was expressly left open. Reference is also made to Gurusiddappa v. Miraj Education Society.² In the first place, in that case the question that arose was whether the suit was barred, because the consent of the Charity Commissioner was not obtained, as provided by s. 50 of the Act. The question that arises in these appeals did not directly arise in that case. Mr. Justice Naik took the view that it is only in the cases of disputes arising out of administration and management of public trusts that the Charity Commissioner comes into the picture and s. 50 of the Act provides that the Charity Commissioner or with his consent two or more persons interested in the trust can file a suit for any of the various reliefs set out in sub-cl. (a) to (h) of cl. (iii) of s. 50. With these observations Mr. Justice Naik held that the claim in that suit did not fall within the scope of the said section. Messrs. Abhyankar and Shrikhande rely on a decision of Mr. Justice Gokhale in Shirgonda Kalgonda Patil v. Amritrao Anandrao Bhoperao.³ Some of the observations in that decision seem to favour the contention advanced by Messrs. Abhyankar and Shrikhande. It is, however, important to note that in that case an application under s. 72 of the Act was filed in the District Court. The petitioners before Mr. Justice Gokhale having come to know of that application under s. 72 of the Act applied to the District Court praying that they should be joined as parties to that application. That prayer was rejected and against that order a revision application was preferred to this Court. Thus, in that case the petitioners themselves wanted to have their claim adjudicated under the provisions of the Bombay Public Trusts Act and Mr. Justice Gokhale held that if a person feels aggrieved by the decision under the Act, he is entitled to apply to the District Court under s. 72 of the Act and have his claim adjudicated. But the point that arises in these appeals before me is whether a person, who was not a party to the proceedings under the Bombay Public Trusts Act, but finds that his property is registered as trust property pursuant to the said proceedings, is precluded from filing a suit for declaration of his title in a Civil Court in view of ss. 79 and 80 of the Act. In my opinion, the decision by Mr. Justice Gokhale can be distinguished on facts; in that case persons concerned wanted to be joined as parties to the proceedings under the Act.

Reliance is also placed on a decision of Mr. Justice Shelat, as he then was, in Kuberbbhai v. Purshottamdas.⁴ Here again it must be pointed out that the plaintiffs in that case did file an application before the Deputy Charity Commissioner. That application was rejected, an appeal to the Charity Commissioner against that decision was also dismissed, but the plaintiffs did not pursue the further remedy by way of an application under s. 72 of the Act. Thus there was a decision in proceedings under the Bombay Public Trusts Act against the plaintiffs in that case. Mr. Justice Shelat at page 567 observes that inquiry under s. 19 of the Act is by no means an administrative or an executive inquiry, the inquiry is not only for the purpose of registration, but it involves adjudication of questions, viz. whether a trust exists, if a trust exists whether it is a public trust and what properties belong to that trust. Mr. Justice Shelat referred to the various provisions of the Act and then came to the conclusion that the Act provided certain remedies to a person affected by a decision in a proceeding under the Act, i.e. the Bombay Public Trusts Act. In this respect he referred to s. 22A of the Act. With regard to ss. 79 and 80 of the Act Mr. Justice Shelat observes:—

“...It would also appear that section 79 had to be inserted to make clear what section 80 provides. Section 79 therefore expressly provides that the Deputy or the Assistant Charity Commissioner or the Charity Commissioner shall have power to decide matters set out therein and having conferred that power on those officers, the Legislature by section 80 debars the jurisdiction of a Civil Court to decide or deal with any question in respect of which the decision or the order of such officer has been made final and conclusive under section 79(2). That was necessary because under section 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in spite of sections 19, 20 and 79, a civil Court would still have jurisdiction to entertain matters involving such questions. That jurisdiction under section 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure has been now taken away by the provisions of section 80 of the Act. It would also appear that whereas section 19 confers power upon the Assistant or the Deputy Charity Commissioner to ascertain the question as to whether a trust exists or not and if so, whether it is a public trust or whether a particular property is the property of such trust in an inquiry for registration, section 79 in express terms and with a view to avoid any possible ambiguity confers power upon these officers to decide the questions set out therein...”

Relying on these observations, it is urged that the present suit is barred under ss. 79 and 80 of the Act. With regard to s. 22A Mr. Justice Shelat observes (p. 571):—

“...Therefore, any person, not merely a trustee, can apply under section 22A for a change in the entry on a matter or a particular left out from consideration in a previous inquiry under section 19. If an order is passed under section 22A, and an applicant is aggrieved, he has the right of appeal under section 70. If he is dissatisfied by an order under section 70, a right has been conferred upon him to apply under section 72 to the District Court and thereafter in appeal to the High Court. Such a right is confined to the two questions set out in section 79(1). Therefore, there is a complete code provided in the Act for dealing with matters set out in sections 18 and 19 and recourse must be had to the procedure laid down in the Act...”

I may point out here that the scope of s. 22A is limited. Section 22A reads thus:—

“If at any time after the entries are made in the register under section 21 or 22 it appears to the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner that any particular relating to any public trust, which was not the subject-matter of the inquiry under section 19, or sub-section (3) of section 22, as the case may be, has remained to be enquired into, the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner, as the case may be, may make further enquiry in the prescribed manner, record his findings and make entries in the register in accordance with the decision arrived at or if appeals or applications are made as provided by this Act, in accordance with the decision of the competent authority provided by this Act. The provisions of sections 19, 20, 21 and 22 shall, so far as may be, apply to the inquiry, the recording of findings and the making of entries in the register under this section.”

From the wording of this section it is clear that s. 22A deals with a case, where any particular relating to a public trust was not inquired into at the initial inquiry. The wording of s. 22A does not indicate that if a particular property is registered as property belonging to a public trust after inquiry under s. 19, further inquiry under s. 22A can be made merely because someone, who was not a party to the proceedings under s. 19, sets up a title to that property. The words 'which was not the subject-matter of the inquiry under section 19' are material. If after inquiry under s. 19 a particular property is held to be public trust property, it is difficult to see how it can be said that the title to that property is a particular, which was not the subject-matter of the inquiry under s. 19. Moreover, under s. 22A the Deputy or Assistant Charity Commissioner has discretion, he can refuse to make further inquiry. It is also important to note that the scope of the inquiry under s. 72 of the Act is a limited one, as is clear from the wording of s. 72. It is also pertinent to note that there is no provision for issuing a public notice in any of the proceedings under the Act. In view of all this, it cannot be said that s. 22A provides a remedy for a person who is aggrieved by the findings at an inquiry under ss. 18 and 19 of the Act, but was not a party to the proceedings under the said sections. In this respect reference is also made to s. 70A of the Act. Relying on s. 70A, it is urged that any aggrieved person, though not a party to the proceedings under ss. 18 and 19, may apply to the Charity Commissioner and have his claim adjudicated. It is, however, important to note that the remedy provided by s. 70A is not an adequate remedy, because under s. 70A the Charity Commissioner is not bound to re-open the inquiry. It merely confers discretion on the Charity Commissioner to re-open the inquiry if he finds it expedient to do so. It cannot be said that question of title of persons, who were not parties to proceedings under ss. 18 and 19 of the Act, was left merely to the discretion of the Charity Commissioner and that they would not have an unfettered right to have their title declared. Mr. Justice Shelat observes (p. 571) :

"...This is made clear by the provisions of section 80 which bar the jurisdiction of a civil Court in the two categories of matters, viz., (1) those questions left under the Act to be decided by the Assistant or the Deputy Charity Commissioner under sections 18 and 19, and (2) those which the Act has made final and conclusive under section 79(1) and section 21(2). The plaintiffs having had recourse to section 70 and not having followed up their remedy under section 72 are bound by the decision of the Charity Commissioner in their appeal before him."

The last observation of Mr. Justice Shelat will indicate that his decision was based upon the fact that the plaintiffs in that suit did not avail themselves of the remedy provided by s. 72 of the Act. Hence, in my opinion, the decision of Mr. Justice Shelat does not support the contention advanced in these appeals.

Here I may refer to the decision of this Court in Prataprao Maruttrao Pangavane v. Raje Laxmanrao Vyankatrao Deshmukh.⁵ In the judgment Mr. Justice Patel observes:—

"...It is difficult, however, to assert that the Charity Commissioners have got exclusive jurisdiction where titles of third parties may be involved. While requiring them to decide statutory issues, if finality were to be attached to certain matters, we would be permitting them indirectly to decide very complicated and important questions of facts of heredity and legitimacy as well, which, in all probability, in view of the wording of section 19, may not have been intended. Even apart from this, the procedure, prescribed is also a summary procedure, which is highly unsuited to any inquiry about the titles of third persons...."

With respect, I agree with these observations. It is pointed out that these observations are obiter. Even so, the view expressed in these observations seems to be a considered view and I am in agreement with that view. As pointed out by Mr. Justice Patel, even though s. 70A provides some sort of remedy to a person aggrieved by an inquiry under ss. 18 and 19 of the Act to which that person was not a party, that remedy seems to be inadequate. Unless the intention of the Legislature to exclude the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to decide title of persons, who are not parties to the proceedings of the inquiry under ss. 18 and 19 of the Act, is clear, either by an express provision or by necessary implication, it cannot be held that suits like the present one are barred under s. 80 read with s. 79 of the Act. It is urged that questions like the one that arises in these appeals may arise during inquiries under the Act. It is possible that such questions may arise, but the jurisdiction of the Civil Court cannot be held to be barred merely because such questions may arise during inquiries under the Act. Considering ss. 79 and 80 and other relevant provisions of the Act, I am of the opinion that the question that arises in the present suit, viz. whether Ratnabai, the author of the trust, was capable of creating the trust in question, cannot be said to be covered by s. 79 of the Act. In any case, the plaintiff in the present suit was not a party to the proceedings under s. 19 of the Act. By the present suit the plaintiff wants to establish his title to one-fourth share in the suit property on the ground that Ratnabai had no authority to gift the property in question and create a trust. For reasons indicated above, I am unable to hold that the present suit is barred under s. 80 read with s. 79 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950.

decided by Patel and K. K. Desai JJ., on

The learned appellate Judge has in a careful and considered judgment held that the present suit is not barred by s. 80 of the Act. That view seems to be correct.

I, therefore, confirm the order passed by the lower appellate Court and dismiss these appeals. Costs will be costs in the cause.

AMBALAL CHIMANLAL CHOKSHI v. H. R. JOKHI.*

Defence of India Rules, 1962 [Part XIA. Gold Control] Rules 126L, 126P—Constitution of India, Art. 20(3)—Search Authorization issued under r. 126L whether amounts to accusation of an offence—Whether r. 126P(1)(ii) attracted if person fails to furnish information when interrogated under r. 126L(4).

Any step or proceeding including a Search Authorization taken under rule 126L of the Defence of India Rules, 1962 (Part XIA. Gold Control) is of an exploratory nature for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of the Rules has been committed or not and is not a step or proceeding amounting to an accusation of an offence.

In a Search Authorization issued under r. 126L of the Defence of India Rules, 1962 the mere use of the present tense to the effect "that gold...is secreted" and the further fact that the same was authorised to be seized, will not convert the Search Authorization into any accusation of an offence.

The penal provisions of rule 126P(1)(ii) of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, will be attracted if a person fails to furnish information by omitting to make statements when he is interrogated by the officer concerned under r. 126L(4) of the Rules.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

TULZAPURKAR J. This revisional application raises a question of inadmissibility of certain statements made by the petitioner-accused to the Central Excise Officers, on the ground of immunity claimed under sub-cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution of India. The relevant facts giving rise to the objection taken by the petitioner-accused to the admissibility of his certain statements under art. 20(3) of the Constitution may be stated: The petitioner Ambalal Chimanlal Chokshi is being prosecuted, on a complaint being filed on December 19, 1963, by the respondent (Shri H. R. Jokhi, Assistant Collector of Central Excise, Marine and Preventive Division, Collectorate of Central Excise, Bombay), for an offence under Rule 126 P of Part XII-A of the Defence of India Rules, 1962 (which Part contains "Gold Control Rules") and s. 135(b) of the Customs Act, 1962, (Act LII of 1962). The allegation made against the petitioner is that he had acquired possession and was concerned in carrying, removing, harbouring, keeping, concealing and otherwise dealing with smuggled gold and that he had not made any declaration about the said gold and had no permit as required under the Gold Control Rules. Before the complaint was filed on December 19, 1963, by the respondent for the alleged offence said to have been committed by the petitioner, on April 5, 1963, a written Search Authorization (exh. A) under Rule 126 L(2) of the Gold Control Rules was issued by Superintendent Wagh of the Central Excise, Central Intelligence Unit, Bombay, in favour of Shri V. B. Rane, Deputy Superintendent of Central Excise (Preventive and Marine Division, Bombay), authorising the latter officer to enter and search certain premises being the flat of the petitioner in building called 'Neeta' at 90, Marine Lines, behind Marine Lines Railway Station, Bombay, for the said gold and if found, to seize and produce the same before the Superintendent and in pursuance of this Search Authorization, the aforesaid premises of the petitioner were raided and during the course of such raid some gold was found on a ledge outside the balcony of one Kotak on the first floor and a bag containing currency notes and some other documents was found from the balcony of one Modi by the side of the balcony of the petitioner on the second floor. A search of the petitioner's flat was also conducted and some documents and other property along with the aforesaid gold and the bag of currency notes were seized under a Panchnama (exh. O), which was made at the spot. It appears that the petitioner was interrogated by Shri Rane, Deputy Superintendent in respect of the said gold as also the bag of currency notes at the time of making of the Panchnama and the statements made by the petitioner were incorporated in the Panchnama. It may be stated at this stage that as regards the gold (12 slabs) found outside the balcony of Kotak on the first floor, the petitioner stated that the same did not belong to him or anybody in his house or family and that he did not know anything about it; while regarding the currency notes found in a bag, which was recovered from the balcony of Modi, which was by the side of the balcony of the petitioner, the petitioner claimed that the money belonged to him together with the other contents of the bag and he further stated that the cloth bag had been put by him in his neighbour's flat across the balcony and without the knowledge of Mr. Modi when the officers went for search. Later on the Central Excise Officers summoned the petitioner and detailed statement of his was recorded by Deputy Superintendent Parekh under instructions of Superintendent Wagh, who interrogated the petitioner under the powers vested in them by law. With regard to the gold and the bag containing currency notes, the petitioner gave his version in his detailed statement recorded on this occasion, which was almost similar to that which he had given at the time of making of the Panchnama.

After completing the investigation, the respondent filed a complaint on December 19, 1963, against the petitioner for the alleged offences mentioned above, being Case No. 62/W of 1964, the trial whereof is being conducted by the learned Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate, 8th Court, Esplanade, Bombay. After fully setting out the manner in which the search of the petitioner's premises was carried out as also the circumstances in which the gold and the bag containing the currency notes were recovered during the raid and the statements made by the petitioner in connection therewith, the respondent categorically averred in his complaint as follows:

"In view of all the premises aforesaid the complainant says that it was the accused who threw or caused to be thrown the said gold in the two bags into the said shaft with a view to avoid the finding and seizure of the said gold in his flat by the Central Excise Officers just as he admittedly threw the theli (Bag) containing the currency notes into the flat of Shri C. U. Mody with a view to avoiding the finding and seizure of the said currency notes in his flat by the said officers, and the complainant accordingly prays that the necessary process be issued against the accused and that the accused be dealt with according to law."

It may be stated that the raid was not for the purpose of seizing the currency notes but admittedly was for the purpose of seizing gold in respect whereof contravention of Gold Control Rules and Customs Act was apprehended and it will appear clear from the aforesaid averments made in the complaint that though the petitioner-accused had disowned any connection with the gold that was found on a ledge outside the balcony of Shri Kotak, the respondent sought to establish petitioner's connection with that gold or rather his possession thereof in contravention of Gold Control Rules, by relying upon the admitted conduct on the part of the petitioner of throwing the bag containing currency notes into the flat of Shri Modi (which currency notes were claimed by him as his), thus rendering highly probable a similar conduct on his part in connection with the gold which he disowned. At the trial, therefore, the statement made by the petitioner and recorded in the Panchnama (exh. O) as well as the portions of his detailed statement recorded by Deputy Superintendent Parekh, were sought to be proved by tendering the same in evidence and the petitioner objected to the admissibility of these statements. A three-fold objection was raised by counsel on behalf of the petitioner before the learned Magistrate. In the first place, it was contended that these statements, which had been obtained from the petitioner under compulsion at a time when he was accused of offences under the Gold Control Rules and Customs Act, could not be used in evidence against him and were barred under art. 20(3) of the Constitution of India and the petitioner was entitled to claim immunity under the said provisions of the Constitution in respect of those statements and in this behalf reliance was placed upon the recitals and the operative part of the Search Authorization dated April 5, 1963, as well as the recitals in the Panchnama to show that at the material time the petitioner was accused of commission of offences under the Gold Control Rules and Customs Act. Secondly, it was contended that the Central Excise Officers, who recorded these statements were police officers, within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act and the statements made to them, therefore, would not be admissible and in that behalf reliance was placed upon a decision of the Supreme Court reported in *Raja Ram v. State of Bihar*¹ in which an Excise Officer under the Bihar and Orissa Excise Act, was held to be a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. Thirdly, it was urged that the statements in question would be hit by the provisions of s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, because they were recorded by officers who were in the position of a police officer and had powers of investigation analogous to those in Chapter 14 of the Criminal Procedure Code. These objections were heard by the learned Magistrate in great detail and by his order dated July 24, 1964, he overruled the objections and ordered the statements to be admitted in evidence. Regarding the first contention he took the view that at the time when the Panchnama was drawn which incorporated certain statements of the petitioner as well as at the time when the detailed statement of the petitioner was recorded, the petitioner was not formally accused of any offence and that the petitioner had a formal accusation made against him for the first time when the complaint was filed against him by the respondent on December 19, 1963, which resulted in process being issued against him by the Court and that, therefore, the privilege contained in art. 20(3) of the Constitution could not be claimed by him. With regard to the argument under s. 25 of the Evidence Act, he held that the statements of the petitioner in question did not amount to a confession and at the highest the petitioner could be said to have made an admission of a gravely incriminating fact and, therefore, the statements were not hit by s. 25 of the Evidence Act. As regards the bar of s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he took the view that the Central Excise Officers, who had recorded the statements of the petitioner were not in the position of police officers, nor was investigation carried out by them under Chapter 14 of the Criminal Procedure Code and in that view of the matter, he held that the statements in question were not hit or rendered inadmissible under s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Consequently, he ordered that the statements objected to should be admitted in evidence. It is against this order of the learned Magistrate that the present revisional application has been preferred by the petitioner-accused to this Court.

At the outset Mr. Gumaste, the learned Additional Government Pleader, raised a preliminary objection against the maintainability of the revisional application on the ground that the order complained of merely decides the question of admissibility or otherwise of certain evidence at a trial which is still pending before the learned Magistrate and he, therefore, urged that at such interlocutory stage this Court should not interfere with the order in exercise of revisional jurisdiction. He further pointed out that the order of the learned Magistrate dealt with procedural points by overruling the objections raised by the petitioner to the admissibility of certain statements and it would not only be open to the petitioner but would be proper for him to raise these points in appeal after the trial before the learned Magistrate is concluded. On the other hand Mr. Porus Mehta contended that one of the objections raised to the admissibility of the evidence pertained to the fundamental right guaranteed to a citizen under art. 20(3) of the Constitution and, therefore, it was but proper for the petitioner to approach this Court at the earliest possible opportunity for vindicating his said right. Mr. Mehta fairly conceded that the objections to the admissibility of the evidence and the statements in question under s. 25 of the Evidence Act and s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code, may be regarded as procedural and he would not be in a position to ask this Court to interfere with the trial Court's order on those grounds, but since the objection to the admissibility of the statements under art. 20(3) of the Constitution had been raised before the Court and had been decided against his client by the trial Court, he should be permitted to argue that point and this Court would be perfectly justified in deciding that point in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction. I accepted the contention of Mr. Mehta in this behalf and I allowed him to argue the point in so far as the objection to the admissibility of evidence was based upon the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution only. I must mention here that Mr. Mehta was not allowed by me to raise objections to the admissibility of evidence in question under s. 25 of the Evidence Act and s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

In order to substantiate his contention that at the material time, that is to say, when the statements of the petitioner were recorded, the petitioner had been accused with the commission of an offence, Mr. Mehta strongly relied upon the recitals as well as the operative part of the Search Authorisation

(exh. A) issued on April 5, 1963, pursuant to which the premises of the petitioner were raided by the Central Excise Officers. He also relied upon certain recitals which are to be found in the Panchnama (exh. O) itself, but before I discuss the contents of these documents, it would be convenient to set out the provisions of art. 20 of the Constitution and then to refer to the three decisions of the Supreme Court, which are of importance and have a bearing on the correct interpretation of cl. (3) of art. 20 and which decisions also set out the conditions which must be fulfilled before the immunity or privilege contained in that article could be invoked. Turning to the article itself, the marginal note is "Protection in respect of conviction for offences" and the three clauses run as follows:

"(1) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.

(2) No person shall be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once.

(3) No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself."

Reading the aforesaid art. 20 as a whole, it is clear that it deals with and confers various privileges upon a person either in the conduct of a criminal proceeding itself or in respect of a criminal proceeding and cl. (3) of the article clearly confers a privilege upon an accused person that he shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself. In other words, it confers an immunity upon an accused person against testimonial compulsion.

Turning to the decisions of the Supreme Court, which have a bearing on the interpretation of cl. (3) of art. 20, there are three decisions which were cited before me. The first one is in M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra.² In this case Mr. Justice Jagannadhadas, while dealing with the provisions of cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution has made the following observations (p. 303):

"Analysing the terms in which this right has been declared in our Constitution, it may be said to consist of the following components. (1) It is a right pertaining to a person 'accused of an offence'; (2) It is a protection against 'compulsion to be a witness'; and (3) It is a protection against such compulsion resulting in his giving evidence 'against himself'....

Broadly stated the guarantee in Art. 20(3) is against 'testimonial compulsion'. It is suggested that this is confined to the oral evidence of a person standing his trial for an offence when called to the witness-stand. We can see no reason to confine the content of the constitutional guarantee to this barely literal import. So to limit it would be to rob the guarantee of its substantial purpose and to miss the substance for the sound as stated in certain American decisions.... A person can 'be a witness' not merely by giving oral evidence but also by producing documents or making intelligible gestures as in the case of a dumb witness... or the like. 'To be a witness' is nothing more than 'to furnish evidence', and such evidence can be furnished through the lips or by production of a thing or of a document or in other modes....

The phrase used in Art. 20(3) is 'to be a witness' and not to 'appear as a witness'. It follows that the protection afforded to an accused in so far as it is related to the phrase 'to be a witness' is not merely in respect of testimonial compulsion in the Court room but may well extend to compelled testimony previously obtained from him. It is available therefore to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled which in the normal course may result in prosecution."

It is true that in the above case the question which directly arose for consideration was whether search and seizure of documents upon a search warrant having been issued was unconstitutional and the Supreme Court held that the same was not unconstitutional as that would not amount to compulsory production of incriminating evidence. It may also be pointed out that in this case a regular first information report had already been lodged with the Inspector General, Delhi, Special Police Establishment by the Registrar of the Joint Stock Companies, Delhi, that Messers. Dalmia Jain Airways Ltd. had committed various offences and then after obtaining permission from the District Magistrate, Delhi, for investigation in respect of some of the non-cognizable offences mentioned in the First Information Report, an application for issue of search warrant was made on the basis of the First Information Report and pursuant to the search warrant issued, a search had been made and documents seized and on those facts the Court held that such search and seizure of documents was not unconstitutional as being hit by the constitutional guarantee contained in art. 20(3) of the Constitution, and in that sense the observations which I have quoted above were really not necessary for the decision of the case. But, as I shall point out presently, in its two subsequent decisions the Supreme Court quoted the above observations with approval though they were regarded as unnecessary for the decision of the case.

The second decision of the Supreme Court, cited was in Mohamed Dastagir v. The State of Madras.³ In this case the facts were that the appellant went to the bungalow of a Deputy Superintendent of Police and offered him a bribe in a closed envelope with a request that he might drop action registered against him but the police officer threw the envelope at the appellant; the envelope fell down and was picked up by the appellant; later while the appellant was still in the bungalow, he was asked by the police officer to produce the envelope which the latter had thrown down and the appellant took out of his pocket some currency notes and placed them on a table without the envelope; the notes were seized by the police officer and his office rubber stamp seal was placed on them. At the trial for the offence of offering a bribe, evidence of the police officer as to what transpired at his bungalow was given and the High Court, after accepting that evidence convicted the appellant and in the appeal before the Supreme Court, it was contended that on the aforesaid facts, the appellant must be regarded as a person who was accused of an offence at the time the police officer asked him to produce the money and that the circumstances also showed that the appellant did so on compulsion. That contention was negatived by the Supreme Court on the ground that there was no formal accusation against the appellant relating to the commission of the offence inasmuch as it did not appear from the evidence of the police officer that he had ever accused the appellant of having committed any offence and it was further held that even if it were assumed that the appellant was a person accused of an offence, the circumstances did not establish that he was compelled to produce the money which he had on his person. It was observed that no doubt the appellant was asked to do so but it was within his power to refuse to comply with the police officer's request. The Court, therefore, held that on the facts established in the case, the appellant-accused had not been compelled to produce the currency notes and, therefore, the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution were not attracted. In support of the contention urged on behalf of the appellant-accused, reliance was placed upon the observations of Mr. Justice Jagannadhadas, which I have quoted above from Sharma's case and with reference to those observations the Supreme Court said as follows (p. 126):

"...These observations were unnecessary in Sharma's case, having regard to the fact that this Court held that the seizure of documents on a search warrant was not unconstitutional as that would not amount to a compulsory production of incriminating evidence. In the present case, even on what was stated in Sharma's case there was no formal accusation against the appellant relating to the commission of an offence."

It will thus appear clear that in Mohamed Dastagir's case the Supreme Court did not dissent from the observations of Mr. Justice Jagannadhadas in Sharma's case but proceeded to distinguish the instant case before it from Sharma's case by pointing out that there was no formal accusation against Mohamed Dastagir relating to the commission of an offence as required under the observations of Mr. Justice Jagannadhadas. In other words, Mohamed Dastagir's case was decided on the peculiar facts obtaining in that case but there is no doubt that the observations which I have quoted above from Sharma's case were not dissented in that case. Further the Supreme Court has indicated what conditions must be fulfilled before art. 20(3) of the Constitution could come into play by observing as follows (p. 125):

"...Before this provision of the Constitution comes into play two facts have to be established (1) that the individual concerned was a person accused of an offence and (2) that he was compelled to be a witness against himself. If only one of these facts and not the other is established, the requirements of Art. 20(3) will not be fulfilled."

The third decision of the Supreme Court is State of Bombay v. Kathi Kalu.⁴ The question that arose in that case was whether by giving his specimen handwriting or impressions of his fingers or palms or foot, the accused person could be said to be furnishing evidence against himself within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution and the majority judgment held that giving thumb impressions or impressions of foot or palm or fingers, or specimen handwriting or showing parts of body by way of identification are not included in the expression "to be a witness" and it may be stated that the observations of Justice Jagannadhadas in Sharma's case were set out in extenso and approved. At the end of his judgment Chief Justice Sinha enlisted seven conclusions to which he arrived after considering the entire case law on the point and conclusion No. 7 which has material bearing on the question before me, was stated by him in the following words:

"To bring the statement in question within the prohibition of Art. 20(3), the person accused must have stood in the character of an accused person at the time he made the statement. It is not enough that he should become an accused, any time after the statement has been made."

In view of the aforesaid decisions it will be clear that before art. 20(3) is brought into play, it must be shown that the person must be accused of an offence at the time he made the statement and that he must have been compelled to make the statement. Therefore, in order to sustain successfully his objection against the admissibility of his statements in question, the petitioner in the present case will have to satisfy three conditions: (1) that at the time when he made those statements there was a formal accusation of commission of an offence against him, (2) that he was compelled to make those statements and (3) that the statements which are now being used against him at the trial are incriminatory in nature.

At this stage, it will be convenient to refer to the relevant provisions of the Gold Control Rules (Part XII-A of Defence of India (Amendment) Rules 1963) and of the Customs Act, 1962. The relevant rules of the Gold Control Rules are Rules 126I, 126L, 126M and 126P. Reference was also made by Mr. Mehta to Rule 142 of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, which contains a general provision for punishing any person, who voluntarily obstructs or offers any resistance to or impedes or otherwise interferes with the performance of any duties by lawful authorities under the said Rules. Rule 126I deals with declaration as to possession of gold other than ornament and sub-r. (1) runs as follows:

"Every person, not being a dealer or refiner required to apply for a licence, or licensed under this Part, shall within thirty days from the commencement of this Part, make a declaration to the Board in the prescribed form as to the quantity, description and other prescribed particulars of gold (other than ornament) owned by him."

Then the material sub-r. is sub-r. (11) which runs as follows:

"(11) Any person in possession or control of any gold, not being ornament, shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, to be the owner thereof."

It will be clear from the above provision that every person (not being a dealer or refiner—and it is not the case that the petitioner-accused is a dealer or a refiner and as such is admittedly covered by this Rule) is bound to make a declaration within the prescribed period of 30 days in the prescribed form as regards the quantity, description and other particulars of gold which is owned by him, to the Gold Board constituted under the Rules and under sub-r. (11) every person who is in possession or control of any gold, until the contrary is proved, shall be presumed to be the owner of such gold and as will be clear from Rule 126P, which deals with penalties, possession of gold by a person without making a declaration in that behalf, has been made a penal offence. Then comes Rule 126L, which deals with power of entry, search, seizure, to obtain information and to take samples and the relevant portion thereof, which is material to the present case is Rule 126L(2) which runs as follows:—

"Any person authorised by the Central Government by writing in this behalf may—

(a) enter and search any premises, not being a refinery or establishment referred to in sub-rule (1), vaults, lockers or any other place whether above or below ground;

(b) seize any gold in respect of which he suspects that any provision of this Part has been, or is being, or is about to be contravened, along with the package, covering or receptacle, if any, in which such gold is found and thereafter take all measures necessary for their safe custody."

Sub-rule (3) of Rule 126L provides that the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code relating to search and seizure shall, so far as they are applicable, apply in relation to search and seizure made under this Rule. Sub-rule (4) of Rule 126L is very material and the same runs as follows:

"(4) Any gazetted officer authorised by the Board in this behalf may hold an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of any of the provisions of this Part has been, is being, or is about to be, committed and shall for the purposes of such inquiry have power to summon any person whose attendance he considers necessary either to give evidence or to produce any document or other thing."

Sub-rule (5) of Rule 126L provides that the Gold Board may call for information from any person for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there has been any contravention of any of the provisions of this Part. Then there is the provision for confiscation of the gold seized and adjudication in the matter of such confiscation which is to be found in Rule 126M. Under sub-r. (1) of Rule 126M any gold seized under Rule 126L is liable to confiscation while under sub-r. (2) a provision has been made for adjudication of confiscation by certain officers and an appeal has been provided to the Board against every adjudication of confiscation made under sub-r. (2); and sub-r. (4) states that every person adjudicating any confiscation under this Rule and the Board hearing any appeal against such adjudication shall have all powers of a civil Court under the Civil Procedure Code in respect of matters like summoning and enforcing attendance of witnesses, requiring the discovery and production of any document, requisitioning any public record, receiving evidence on affidavits and issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses or documents. Then the penalties have been provided by Rule 126P and the relevant provision thereof may be set out:

"126P. Penalties.—(1) Whoever,—

(i) fails or omits to make...any declaration including a further declaration as required by rule 126 I without any reasonable cause, or makes any statement in such return or declaration which is false and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year or with fine or with both;

(ii) fails or omits to keep or to produce any account or other document or to furnish any information when required to do so under any provision of this Part, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term of not less than one month and not more than one year and shall also be liable to fine;

(iii)

(2) Whoever,—

(i) ...

(ii) has in his possession or under his control any quantity of gold in contravention of any provision of this Part,

(iii) sells or otherwise transfers or agrees to sell or transfer, or exposes or offers for sale or transfer, or delivers or otherwise parts with, any gold in contravention of any provision of this Part,

(iv) buys, or otherwise acquires, or accepts gold in contravention of any provision of this Part, ... shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term of not less than six months and not more than two years and also with fine."

In the present case, as I have stated above, the petitioner-accused has been charged for having committed an offence under Rule 126P(2)(iv) inasmuch as according to the prosecution he had acquired certain quantity of gold (12 slabs of gold weighing 6644 grams) in respect whereof no declaration had been made by him as required by Rule 126I (I) of the Gold Control Rules. As regards the offence said to have been committed by the petitioner-accused under the Customs Act, 1962, the allegation against him is that he had acquired possession and was concerned in carrying, removing, harbouring, keeping, concealing and otherwise dealing with the said smuggled gold, which he knew or had reason to believe to be liable to confiscation under s. 111 of the Customs Act, 1962, and that thereby he had committed an offence punishable under s. 135(2) of the Customs Act.

In support of his argument that the petitioner was accused of an offence at the time when he made the statements in question, Mr. Mehta strongly relied upon the recitals and the operative part of the Search Authorisation dated April 5, 1962 (exh. A) as well as on certain statements which are to be found in the Panchanama (exh. O) that was made on that date in the flat of the petitioner. The relevant portion of the Search Authorization No. 11 of 1963 that was issued under the signature and seal of Superintendent Wagh of the Central Excise may be quoted as follows:

"Whereas there is reason to believe that gold, in respect of which provisions of Part XIII A of the Defence of India Rules, 1963, have been, are being or are about to be contravened, is secreted in the premises of

Shri Ambalal Chimanlal

Neeta No. 90, Marine Lines, ... Bombay.

Now Therefore in exercise of the powers conferred on me by the Central Government by Notification No. ... dated 9th January 1963, I hereby authorise

Shri V. B. Rane,

Dy. Supdt. of Central Excise, ... to enter and search the premises mentioned hereinabove for the aforesaid gold and if found to seize and produce the same forthwith before me."

Mr. Mehta also invited my attention to the following recitals which are to be found in the Panchanama:

"The cloth bags together with the 12 (twelve) slabs of yellow metal appearing to be gold and the newspaper wrappings, paper slips, rubber band, have been taken into his possession by Superintendent Shri J. S. Wagh of Central Excise, under the reasonable belief that it is smuggled Gold and also in respect of which the D.I. Rules have been contravened."

Mr. Mehta contended that in view of the language used in the Search Authorization under which the search was carried out and in view of the language used in the recitals of the Panchanama quoted above, it is clear that there was a formal accusation against the petitioner even at the time of that search. In the first place Mr. Mehta pointed out that under Rule 126(2)(b) even if the person authorised by the Central Government in that behalf merely entertained a suspicion that any provision of this Part (meaning Part XIIA) had been, or was being or was about to be contravened, a Search Authorization to make entry, search and seize could be issued, but in the present case, the Search Authorization (exh. A) was issued not on mere suspicion but as the recital therein indicates, on the basis that there was reason to believe that gold in respect whereof a contravention of Part XIIA had been committed or was being committed or was about to be committed, was secreted in the premises of the petitioner and Mr. Mehta urged that the recital "whereas there is reason to believe" is stronger than mere suspicion that may be entertained by officer concerned in that behalf. Secondly, Mr. Mehta contended that though the three alternatives had been disjunctively used with reference to apprehended contravention of Part XIIA of the Defence of India Rules, present tense had been expressly used in regard to the impugned gold by reciting in exh. A as follows: "gold in respect of which... is secreted in the premises....". Thirdly, Mr. Mehta pointed out that the operative part of the Search Authorization expressly authorises Shri Rane, Deputy Superintendent "to seize and produce" the said gold before the Superintendent of the Central Excise. According to Mr. Mehta, these three aspects of the Search Authorization (exh. A) are clearly indicative of the fact that the petitioner was accused of commission of the offence of contravening the Gold Control Rules in respect of the gold that was said to have been secreted by him in his premises. Similarly, since in the Panchanama similar language had been used to the effect that the gold in question was taken into his possession by Superintendent Wagh "under reasonable belief that it is smuggled gold and also in respect of which D. I. Rules have been contravened", it would be clear that at the material time the petitioner was accused of an offence. Mr. Mehta, however, fairly conceded that in terms the Search Authorization was addressed by the Superintendent of Central Excise Shri Wagh not to the petitioner but to Shri V. B. Rane, the Deputy Superintendent of Central Excise, who was authorised to enter and search the premises of the petitioner for gold and to seize the same if found there, but according to him in view of the recitals and the operative part of the Search Authorization (exh. A), it was clear that at the material time information had been laid before the Superintendent of Central Excise, who issued the Authorization, on the basis of which the said officer had reason to believe that gold in respect of which provisions of Part XIIA had been contravened, was secreted by the petitioner-accused in his premises and as such the language of the Search Authorization clearly implies that the petitioner was accused of being in possession of the said gold without making the necessary declaration under Rule 126I and that thereby had committed an offence under Rule 126P(2). On the other hand, Mr. Gumaste, the learned Additional Government Pleader, contended that there are two indications in the Search Authorization itself which clearly show that the officer under whose signature and seal the Authorization was issued, was not certain whether there was a positive contravention of Gold Control Rules on the part of the petitioner at that time. He pointed out that in the first place, the recitals of the Search Authorization, which contain all the three alternatives in regard to the apprehended contravention of Gold Control Rules disjunctively, show that the officer was not sure whether in respect of the gold said to have been secreted by the petitioner, contravention had been committed or was being committed or was about to be committed. Secondly, he pointed out that the officer was not even sure whether the gold said to be secreted would be found in the premises of the petitioner and, therefore, the operative part of the Search Authorization stated that the said gold, if found, should be seized and produced before the Superintendent. He, therefore, contended that the mere use of a strong expression that there was reason to believe that gold was secreted, should not lead to the inference that the petitioner had a formal accusation of the commission of offence made against himself. He further relied upon the fact that throughout the Search Authorization (exh. A), it has nowhere been stated that the gold was secreted by the petitioner but all that has been stated is that gold was secreted in the premises of the petitioner.

In my view, in order to decide the question as to whether the petitioner was accused of an offence at the time when the Search Authorization was issued and the search of his flat was made in pursuance thereof, not only the language used in the Search Authorization but the purpose or the object with which Rule 126L has been framed will have to be taken into consideration. The marginal note of Rule 126L, which is to the effect: "Power of entry, search, seizure, to obtain information and to take samples" clearly indicates that the provisions contained therein have been framed for the purpose of ascertainment of the fact as to whether any contravention of any of the provisions of Part XIIA, has been, or is being or is about to be committed by any person, in respect of gold. This is also clear from the contents of sub-rr. 1, 2, 4 and 5 thereof. Sub-rule (1) deals with the premises of a refiner or a licensed dealer in gold and under that sub-rule, power to enter and search a refinery of a refiner or the establishment of a licensed dealer is conferred upon an officer authorised by the Board in that behalf and power is also conferred upon such officer to seize any gold in respect of which he suspects that any provision of this Part has been, or is being or is about to be contravened. Sub-rule (2) deals with premises of any other person not being a refiner or a licensed dealer and under that sub-rule power is conferred upon an officer duly authorised in that behalf by the Central Government to enter and search such premises and to seize from such premises any gold in respect of which such officer suspects that any provision of this Part has been or is being, or is about to be contravened. The fact that both these sub-rules authorize seizure of gold even when a mere suspicion is entertained that in respect of such gold, contravention has taken place, or is taking place or is about to take place, clearly shows that such power to seize gold is conferred for ascertainment of the fact of contravention. Sub-rule (4) in terms says that the officer authorized by the Board in that behalf "may hold an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of any of the provisions of this Part has been, is being or is about to be committed" and such officer has been given the power to summon any person, either to give evidence or to produce any document for the purpose of such inquiry, that is to say, for the purposes of ascertaining the fact of such contravention. Similarly, sub-rule (5) expressly states that the Gold Board may call for information from any person "for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there has been any contravention of any of the provisions of this Part." In other words, both the marginal note as well as the contents of sub-rules 1, 2, 4 and 5 of Rule 126L clearly indicate that whatever steps or proceedings are taken under this rule, they are for the purpose of ascertainment of the fact whether there has been any contravention of any provisions of Part XIIA or not. In other words, in my view any step or proceeding including a Search Authorization taken under Rule 126L is of exploratory nature for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of Gold Control Rules has been committed or not and is not concerned with any accusation against the person whose premises are being searched or from whose premises gold is directed to be seized under sub-r. (1) or sub-r. (2), or from whom information is sought by an officer under sub-r. (4) or by the Board under sub-r. (5). It may be that as a result of such exploratory measures having been taken, the facts ascertained might disclose some offence and the facts so ascertained might form the basis of a future prosecution, which may be launched under Rule 126P but that would not make the step or proceeding taken under Rule 126L to be a step or proceeding amounting to an accusation of an offence. Having regard to the aforesaid object with which Rule 126L has been framed, therefore, it is clear that the Search Authorization (exh. A) in this case, which has been expressly and in terms issued under the said rule, will have to be regarded as an exploratory step or proceeding taken with a view to ascertaining whether in respect of the gold which is said to have been secreted by the petitioner in his premises, the petitioner has committed, or is committing or is about to commit a contravention of any provision of Part XIIA and that the same was not concerned with any accusation against the petitioner of actual contravention.

Turning to the language used in the Search Authorization (exh. A), in my view the use of present tense to the effect "that gold in respect of which...is secreted" and the further fact that the same was authorised to be seized under exh. A, do not convert the Search Authorization into any accusation of commission of an offence against the petitioner, for under cl. (b) of sub-r. (2) of Rule 126L, even where gold is secreted by a person and a mere suspicion is entertained that in respect of such gold, a contravention of any provision of Part XIIA has taken place, an authorization to seize such gold could be given and the Search Authorization in that behalf, will contain similar provision as is to be found in exh. A. I do not think that if in exh. A instead of the recital "whereas there is reason to believe" the recital were "whereas there is reason to suspect" or "whereas it is suspected" and the remaining portion of the Search Authorization was the same as is to be found in exh. A, it could be seriously contended that such Search Authorization would amount to accusation of an offence against the petitioner. Therefore, merely because present tense in respect of secreting of gold has been used or merely because such secreted gold is directed to be seized it would not convert the Search Authorization into any accusation of an offence. The only ground on which Mr. Mehta strenuously contended that the Search Authorization in this case should be taken to contain an accusation of an offence on the part of the petitioner was that the Search Authorization (exh. A) contained a stronger recital viz. "whereas there is reason to believe." There is no doubt that the word "believe" is a much stronger word than "suspect" and the recital in exh. A is a strong recital but can it be said that because such recital is found in this Search Authorization, there is an implied accusation of the commission of an offence on the part of the petitioner? Unfortunately the materials on which Shri Wagh came to hold the reasonable belief that there might have been a contravention have not come on record. Further since all the three alternatives in regard to apprehended contravention have been disjunctively mentioned, it could be said that Shri Wagh had such materials before him that he could not positively say that there was in fact a positive contravention of the provisions of Part XIIA on the part of the petitioner and if Shri Wagh himself was not sure in that behalf, he could never have thought of accusing the petitioner of such contravention. In any case at the highest such a recital would show that information or material placed before him was such that as a reasonable man he (Shri Wagh) subjectively must have felt convinced that the secreting of the gold was in contravention of the rules which is far from saying that the petitioner was accused of such contravention. All that the Search Authorization at the highest means is that according to the reasonable belief of the issuing officer gold is secreted by the petitioner in his premises and it has been expressly so stated in the Panchanama (exh. O),—but that does not amount to any accusation being made against the petitioner that he has contravened any provision of Part XIIA. I do not think that the mere use of such a recital in the Search Authorization has the effect of converting it into any implied accusation of the commission of an offence on the part of the petitioner. I do not think that mere use of such a recital robs the Search Authorization of its exploratory character. Having regard to the object of Rule 126L under which this Search Authorization was issued and also the language used therein, it is clear to me that it was not concerned with making any accusation against the petitioner.

I may usefully refer to one decision of the Madras High Court in Bhagwan- das v. Union of India.⁵ No doubt it was a case under Foreign Exchange Regulation Act of 1947 and the appellant Bhagawandas Goenka was convicted for contravening certain provisions of the said Act, but there the Reserve Bank had "received information that the accused unauthorisedly acquired dollars in the U.S." and on the basis of such information the Bank had issued certain directives in the form of interrogatories to the accused under s. 19(2) of the said Act and the accused had given replies thereto and the question arose whether the said replies of the accused were inadmissible in evidence under art. 20(3) and the Court held that the directives by the Bank were of exploratory character and were issued for ascertainment of facts and there was no accusation made against the appellant and as such the replies given were admissible in evidence. Head-note (d) of the report runs as follows:

"Even assuming that Art. 20(3) would be applicable not merely to judicial proceedings of any character, but to a multiplicity of situations in which judicial proceedings might be in prospect, it is still impossible to hold that, when certain facts are ascertained, it may be under an obligation to furnish an answer, in order to explore and determine if a person had committed an offence, this exploration itself already places him in the situation of a virtually accused person, and thus renders his explanations inadmissible in evidence. The directives of the Reserve Bank under S. 19, and the replies thereto are not inadmissible in evidence, under Art. 20(3) of the Constitution, as incriminating answers furnished by a party in the virtual position of an accused, under testimonial compulsion. The statements which a party makes under fear of penalties prescribed by the Act are not hit by Art. 20(3) and cannot be excluded from being used in evidence against him after he has become an accused and when he is on trial. The person is not in the position of an accused when he furnishes replies to the directives under S. 19. The protection or immunity under Art. 20(3) is available only to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled."

In view of the aforesaid discussion I am unable to accept Mr. Mehta's contention that at the material time i.e. when the Panchanama was made or when the petitioner's detailed statement was recorded the petitioner was accused of any offence or there was a formal accusation of commission of an offence levelled against the petitioner.

Mr. Mehta next contended that the petitioner was compelled to make those statements in question to the Central Excise Officers and in that behalf he fairly conceded that this was not a case where compulsion or duress in the sense of threats of physical injury or bodily harm or actual beating had been administered to the petitioner before he made the statements in question. In fact, he himself pointed out that at the end of the detailed statement of the petitioner, that was recorded by Deputy Superintendent Parekh under instructions of Superintendent Wagh on April 6, 1963 (exh. Z-10), the petitioner had stated that he had given that statement voluntarily, meaning thereby that there was no physical coercion exerted on him when he made that statement, but Mr. Mehta contended that there was legal compulsion upon the petitioner to make those statements both at the time of making the Panchanama as also on April 6, 1963, when his detailed statement was recorded, inasmuch as having regard to the provisions of Rule 126L(4) and Rule 126P(1)(ii), if he did not make a statement or furnish information as required by the officers concerned when he was interrogated by them, he was liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term of not less than one month and not more than one year and was also liable to be sentenced to pay a fine. In this behalf Mr. Mehta pointed out to me that both these statements which were made by the petitioner, first at the time when the Panchanama was being drawn up and secondly when his detailed statement was recorded by the Deputy Superintendent Parekh, he was interrogated by the two officers, who acted under the powers vested in them by the Defence of India Rules and the petitioner made these statements by way of giving replies to such interrogation. It may be stated that Superintendent Wagh of the Central Excise, who gave evidence at the trial on behalf of the prosecution, clearly admitted in his evidence that at the time of making of the Panchanama, he questioned the petitioner with regard to the gold that was found in the pit (on the ledge) and he also questioned the petitioner about the currency notes and the other things found in the bag in Mody's house and the petitioner made statements in regard to both these items of property that was seized, in pursuance to his questions. Similarly, Superintendent Wagh further admitted that he questioned and interrogated the petitioner-accused on April 6, 1963, and the petitioner-accused gave replies which were recorded in the form of his detailed statement and Superintendent Wagh has further clarified the position by stating that all this inquiry and interrogation and recording of the statements made of the petitioner was done under the powers vested in the officers by virtue of the Gold Control Rules. This is what Superintendent Wagh has stated in his evidence in that behalf:

"I acted in this case under the powers of the Gold Control Rules and the Customs Act. All the enquiries subsequent to the seizure of gold were conducted in this case under Gold Control Rules and even the statements were recorded under Gold Control Rules. Under the powers of Gold Control Rules, I questioned the accused myself. He did give me replies to my questions. After this interrogation I asked Dy. Superintendent Parekh to record his i.e. accused's statement..."

In the course of inquiries in this case under the Gold Control Rules, I questioned Kotak and Mody also."

This evidence of Superintendent Wagh makes it amply clear that it was as a result of the interrogation that was done by the Central Excise Officers in exercise of the powers vested in them by virtue of Gold Control Rules, that the statements of the petitioner-accused both in the Panchanama as well as in his detailed statement came to be recorded and Mr. Mehta has contended that under the relevant provisions of Rules 126L and 126P the petitioner-accused was legally bound to make those statements on pain of being prosecuted if he did not give replies to the interrogation made by the Central Excise Officers and, therefore, there was legal compulsion on the petitioner-accused to make those statements and as such those statements cannot be used in evidence against the petitioner-accused in the case. I find considerable force in this contention of Mr. Mehta. Sub-rule (4) of Rule 126L empowers any gazetted officer duly authorised in that behalf by the Board to hold an inquiry and he has been further authorised to summon any person whose attendance he considers necessary either to give evidence or to produce any document for the purpose of such inquiry and Rule 126P(1)(ii) clearly provides that if any person so summoned by that gazetted officer, either fails to produce any document required to be produced or fails to furnish any information when required to do so under any provision of this Part (which would obviously include s. 126L(4)), he is liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term mentioned therein and also liable to pay fine. Mr. Gumaste, the learned Additional Government Pleader, contended that sub-rule (4) of Rule 126L authorises a gazetted officer, who is holding an inquiry to summon any person "to give evidence or to produce any document or other thing" and as such will not apply to a case of a person failing to furnish information when required to do so under any provisions of this Part as is contemplated under Rule 126P(1)(ii). He further pointed out that there are other provisions in this Part which require a person to furnish information and as an instance he pointed brought to my notice the provision of sub-r. (5) of Rule 126L itself, which provides that the Gold Board may call for information from any person for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there has been any contravention of any provision of this Part and according to Mr. Gumaste, it was only when a person was required "to furnish information" either by the Board as per sub-r. (5) of Rule 126L or by any other officer, who has been empowered to call for information, and if he failed to furnish any such information that he comes within the mischief of Rule 126P(1)(ii). I do not think that the expression "to give evidence" has been used in sub-r. (4) of Rule 126L in the narrow technical sense of giving evidence on oath either by affidavits or making statements on oath but that expression has been used in a wider sense so as to include the act of furnishing the statements or information. This is clear from the fact that sub-r. (4) not only uses the expression "to give evidence" but also the further expression "or produce any document or other thing" and it is clear that by producing a document or a thing a person furnishes information to the officer concerned. The marginal note of Rule 126L, which is to the effect "power of entry, search, seizure, to obtain information and to take samples" also makes this position clear. In my view, even under sub-r. (4) of Rule 126L the officer duly authorized in that behalf, who is holding an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of any of the provisions of this Part has been, or is being, or is about to be committed, is authorized to collect or gather information by means of obtaining statements or documents. In this view of the matter, it is clear that the penal provisions of Rule 126P(1)(ii) would be attracted if a person fails to furnish information by omitting to make statements when he is interrogated by the officer concerned under Rule 126L(4). It is, therefore, clear that since the petitioner-accused in the present case was interrogated by the Central Excise Officer, who were conducting the inquiries under powers vested in them by virtue of Gold Control Rules and was bound to give answers or replies to such interrogation, he was legally compelled to make the statements in question to the Central Excise Officers and, therefore, the relevant condition required by art. 20(3) of the Constitution for the applicability thereof could be said to have been fulfilled in this case.

On the point as to whether the statements in question, which are being used against the petitioner at the trial, are self-incriminatory or not, I do not think that there could be any doubt that those statements which are being sought to be proved against the petitioner are self-incriminatory. It was urged by Mr. Gumaste that actually in his statement, the petitioner had completely disowned any connection with the gold in respect whereof he is being prosecuted, while in regard to the currency notes, in respect whereof, there is no charge levelled against him, the petitioner has in his statement claimed that the money belonged to him and stated that the cloth bag which contained the currency notes had been put by him in his neighbour's flat across the balcony without the knowledge of that neighbour and that, therefore, it could not be said that the petitioner's statements were self-incriminatory. It is difficult to accept Mr. Gumaste's contention in this behalf. It is true that in regard to the gold in question the petitioner disclaimed any connection with the same but the latter part of the petitioner's statement in regard to the currency notes wherein he stated before the officers that he had put the cloth bag containing the said notes in his neighbour's flat across the balcony without the neighbour's knowledge, is being expressly relied upon by the prosecution for the purpose of rendering highly probable a similar conduct on the part of the petitioner in regard to the gold in question, for it is the prosecution case that just as he put the cloth bag containing currency notes in his neighbour's flat across the balcony the petitioner must have also thrown the gold in question on the ledge outside the balcony of another neighbour of his viz. Mr. Kotak and in fact as I have indicated earlier, in the complaint that has been lodged by the respondent against the petitioner in this case, it is in this manner that the possession of gold with the petitioner in contravention of Gold Control Rules is sought to be established by the prosecution. (See para. 16 of the complaint quoted above). There could be no doubt that this conduct on the part of the petitioner in throwing the bag containing the currency notes (which money is claimed by him as his) into his neighbour's flat across the balcony, which emerges from the statement made by him to the Central Excise Officers, is gravely incriminating and it is clear that his statements which contain an admission of this conduct will have to be regarded as self-incriminatory statements. I may point out that even the learned Magistrate, while holding that the statements of the accused in question did not amount to a confession under s. 25 of the Evidence Act, took the view that those statements contained an admission of a gravely incriminating fact. There is no doubt, therefore, that the statements in question will have to be regarded as self-incriminatory.

Since however, I have held that the petitioner was not accused of an offence at the material time when the statements in question were made by him to the Central Excise Officers, it is clear that the privilege or the immunity claimed by the petitioner cannot be availed of by him. The statements in question, therefore, cannot be regarded as inadmissible in evidence under art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

The rule in the revision application is, therefore, discharged.

Rule discharged.

Bombay High Court Appellate Side Rules, 1960. Chapter XVII. Rule 15-A—Constitution of India, Arts. 133, 225, 14—Validity of r. 15-A—Source of power of High Court to make rules—Nature, scope and extent of such power.

Rule 15-A in Chapter XVII of the Bombay High Court Appellate Side Rules, 1960, is valid and therefore all matters such as are specified in it are liable to be heard and disposed of by a single Judge on or after July 15, 1964.

NINE applications under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India were made to the Nagpur Bench of the High Court at Bombay challenging the validity of the amended rule 15A of Chapter XVII of the Bombay High Court Appellate Side Rules, 1960. These applications which arose out of orders made by the Revenue Tribunal, came up for hearing before Tambe J., who referred these to a larger Bench on July 16, 1964, observing as follows:—

TAMBE J. These nine applications under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution arise out of orders made by the Revenue Tribunal. Facts material for the purpose of considering the question in these applications are similar though not identical and I would be presently adverting to the facts of one of these nine applications. Under the amended r. 15A which came into force from July 1, 1964, these nine matters and some other similar writ matters were being placed before me for hearing as a single Judge. I was informed by the Office that a number of petitioners who had filed writ applications against the orders of the Revenue Tribunal were challenging the validity of the rule. I had, therefore, directed the Office to place the matter for hearing before me as regards the objection to the validity of the rule, and I had also directed the Office to inform counsel in such cases who were raising similar objections. These nine petitioners have appeared before me who challenge the validity of the rule.

Now, the facts in Special Civil Application No. 92 of 1964 are these. The impugned order of the Revenue Tribunal was made on January 22, 1964. The petition was filed on February 20, 1964. Rule was issued by a Division Bench of this Court on March 2, 1964. On July 9, 1964, this petition and some other petitions were being placed before me for disposal when I was informed that petitioners in some other cases were challenging the validity of the rule. On my directions as aforesaid these petitions have come up to-day.

Now, the rule under which these petitions were placed before me for disposal reads as follows:

"15A. Notwithstanding anything contained in Rules, 1, 4 and 15 of this Chapter, applications under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution or under Article 227 read with Article 226 of the Constitution arising out of the orders passed by the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal... may be heard and finally disposed of by a single Judge to be appointed in this behalf by the Chief Justice

2. The above amendment shall come into force on and with effect from the 1st of July 1964, and shall be applicable to applications heard on and after the 1st of July 1964, notwithstanding that the applications were instituted prior to the 1st of July 1964, or that the applications arise from proceedings instituted prior to the 1st of July 1964."

Mr. Natu, learned counsel for the petitioner in Special Civil Application No. 92 of 1964, has formulated the following points on which he challenges the validity of this rule. According to him, the points so formulated are covered by the application jointly filed by the petitioner as well as the respondent on July 9, 1964. Mr. Natu stated before me that the petitioner was not challenging the rules that were in force prior to the date of amendment. His challenge is to the amended r. 15A. His grounds of challenge are:

- (i) After the promulgation of the Constitution the High Court has no power to make rules in respect of applications falling under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution;
- (ii) at any rate, the rule made is in excess of its rule-making power inasmuch as the High Court has no power to make rules retrospective in operation;
- (iii) the rule is ultra vires of the provisions of arts. 133 and 14 of the Constitution; and
- (iv) on construction it has no application to the hearing of petitions which had already been admitted by a Division Bench prior to the date of the amendment coming into force.

After Mr. Natu had formulated his grounds of attack as to the validity of the rule I asked counsel appearing in other cases whether they wanted to urge any additional ground of attack. Mr. Sanghi, learned counsel appearing in Special Civil Application No. 440 of 1962, stated that the petitioner wanted to raise some additional grounds. The petitioner, however, has not filed any application stating his grounds. I have directed the learned counsel to draft an application and file it by 2.15 P.M. when I would proceed with this order.

Mr. Sanghi has now filed an application adding one more ground to the challenge as to the validity of the rule. The ground is in the following terms.

"Rule-making power under the Letters Patents of the Bombay High Court did not extend to making rules regarding 'writ jurisdiction' since thereunder, the High Court had no writ jurisdiction at all and thus the impugned rule is ultra vires."

The petitioners in other seven cases have not filed any applications stating the grounds on which they challenge the validity of the rule. I, therefore, asked counsel in the remaining seven cases, what the nature of challenge raised by the petitioners in these cases is. Counsel in those cases stated before me that they raise the same grounds which have been raised by the petitioners in the aforesaid two applications. They state that they have no additional grounds to raise.

Having regard to the fact that the challenge is as to the validity of the rule, in my opinion, it would be better if the preliminary objection raised as to the jurisdiction of the single Judge to hear these applications under r. 15A is decided by a larger Bench.

I direct that the papers be placed before my Lord the Chief Justice for constitution of a larger Bench.

Notice be issued to the Advocate-General.

The applications were heard by a Bench composed of V. S. Desai and Wagle JJ.

V. S. DESAI J. By these applications, the petitioners challenge r. 15-A in Chapter XVII of the Bombay High Court Appellate Side Rules, 1960. Chapter XVII, in which the said rule appears, contains rules made by the High Court for dealing with the applications under the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon it by arts. 226, 227 and 228 of the Constitution. The impugned rule which was published in Part IV-C of the Maharashtra Government Gazette, Extraordinary, on July 2, 1964, is as follows:

"Rule 15-A. Notwithstanding anything contained in Rules 1, 4 and 15 of this Chapter, applications under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution or under Article 227 read with Article 226 of the Constitution arising out of the orders passed by the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal under any enactment or out of the orders passed by any other authority or tribunal under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 or the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch Area) Act, 1958 or the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950 may be heard and finally disposed of by a single Judge to be appointed in this behalf by the Chief Justice."

The position under the rules, before this rule was added, was that under r. 1 of the said rules, an application for the issue of a direction, order or writ under art. 226 of the Constitution, if the matter in dispute was or had arisen substantially outside Greater Bombay, was to be heard and disposed of by a Division Bench to be appointed by the Chief Justice. Under r. 4, such application had to be heard and disposed of by a Division Bench, but a single Judge was entitled to grant a rule nisi though he could not pass any final order on that application. Under r. 15, an application invoking the jurisdiction of the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution or under art. 227 read with art. 226 of the Constitution was required to be filed on the Appellate Side of the High Court and was to be heard and disposed of by a Division Bench to be appointed by the Chief Justice. It will thus be seen that, under the said rules, applications coming to the High Court under art. 227 or under art. 227 read with art. 226 of the Constitution from decisions of the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal, or from decisions under various Tenancy Acts in force in the State, were required to be heard and disposed of by a Division Bench of the High Court on the Appellate Side. By the added r. 15-A, such matters are made capable of being heard and finally disposed of by a single Judge to be appointed in that behalf by the Chief Justice. Under para. 2 of the Notification, the amendment effected by the rule is made to take effect from July 15, 1964, and has been made applicable to all applications heard on and after July 15, 1964, notwithstanding that the applications were instituted prior to July 15, 1964, or that the applications arose out of proceedings instituted prior to that date. The grounds, on which the rules are challenged, may be summarised as follows:

(1) The power of the High Court to make rules is subject to the provisions of the Constitution. The High Court, therefore, cannot make any rule which is inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Constitution. The present rule made by the High Court is inconsistent with art. 133 of the Constitution inasmuch as it interferes with and affects the right given under the said article. The rule, therefore, is invalid.

(2) Even assuming that the High Court could have made a rule, like r. 15-A, when it first made its rules relating to the disposal of applications under art. 227 of the Constitution, having once made the rule differently, it could not now alter it in the present form. The reason advanced for this argument is, when the rule was first made, it brought in the impact of art. 133 on all proceedings of the nature contemplated by the said rule and thus had the rights under the said article fastened to all such proceedings. The High Court thereafter could have no power to alter the rule, because that will have the effect of affecting the impact of art. 133 on proceedings of the nature to which the rule relates.

(3) The High Court cannot make a rule which can have a retrospective effect, because no organ of the Government except the Legislature, which has the plenary power of legislation, can make a rule or law which can have retrospective effect unless power to make such rule or law is conferred upon it in express terms. The High Court is not a Legislature having plenary power to legislate and the power to make rules, which has been conferred upon it by art. 225 of the Constitution, does not expressly give it the power to make rules having retrospective operation. Inasmuch as the present rule, which the High Court has made, has a retrospective operation, the High Court had no power to make it. It is also contended in this connection that even if the High Court could exercise the power to make a rule having retrospective operation, it could not make it so as to affect the rights created under art. 133 of the Constitution.

(4) The rule as framed is violative of art. 14 of the Constitution and is, therefore, void; and

(5) On the construction of the rule, if it is legal and valid, it can only apply to such matters as would come before the Court for hearing for the first time after July 15, 1964, and cannot apply to matters, which have been already heard for admission, though not finally disposed of before that date.

Before dealing with the several contentions, which are raised by the petitioners, it will be desirable to examine the source of the power of the High Court to make rules and the nature, scope and extent of the said power. The Act of the Parliament 24 & 25 Victoria, Chapter 104, passed on August 6, 1861, provided by s. 1 thereof for the establishment of the High Courts by grant of Letters Patent at Calcutta, Madras and Bombay. Under s. 13 of the said Act, it was provided that the High Court established under the Act may by its own rules provide for the exercise, by one or more Judges, or by Division Courts constituted by two or more Judges of the said High Court, of the original and appellate jurisdiction vested in such Court, in such manner as may appear to such Court to be convenient for the due administration of justice. The power conferred by this section was in terms of the widest amplitude and was made subject only to laws or regulations which may be made by the Governor General in Council. The Letters Patent, which were granted with its subsequent modifications from time to time, provided in cls. 36 and 37 of the said Letters Patent, that functions, which under the Letters Patent were directed to be performed by the High Court in exercise of its original and appellate jurisdictions, may be performed by any Judge or any Division Court thereof, appointed or constituted for such purpose, in pursuance of s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and that it would be lawful for the High Court from time to time to make rules and orders for the purpose of regulating all proceedings in civil cases which may be brought before the said High Court, including proceedings in its Admiralty, Vice-Admiralty, intestate and matrimonial jurisdiction respectively. It may be pointed out that reference to s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, in cl. 36 of the Letters Patent was because the Act of 1861 was repealed by the Government of India Act, 1915, and the latter Act provided for the matters, which were contained in the repealed Act. Under s. 106, sub-s. (1), of the Government of India Act, 1915, the High Courts were constituted Courts of Record having such jurisdiction, original and appellate, including admiralty jurisdiction in respect of offences committed on the high seas, and all such powers and authority over or in relation to the administration of justice, including power to make rules for regulating the practice of the Court, as were vested in them by Letters Patent, and, subject to the provisions of any such Letters Patent, all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as were vested in the Courts at the commencement of the Act. Section 108, sub-s. (1), of the Act provides:

"Each High Court may by its own rules provide as it thinks fit for the exercise, by one or more judges, or by division courts constituted by two or more judges of the High Court, of the original and appellate jurisdiction vested in the Court."

Under sub-s. (2) of s. 108, the Chief Justice of each High Court was empowered to determine what Judge in each case was to sit alone, or what Judges of the High Court whether with or without the Chief Justice, were to constitute the several Division Courts.

Section 223 of the Government of India Act, 1935, provided that the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court, and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court, including any power to make rules of Court and to regulate the sittings of the High Court and of members thereof sitting alone or in Division Bench, shall be the same as immediately before the establishment of the Dominion. Finally, under art. 225 of the Constitution it is provided as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of this Constitution and to the provisions of any law of the appropriate Legislature made by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by this Constitution, the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court, and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court, including any power to make rules of Court and to regulate the sittings of the Court and of members thereof sitting alone or in Division Courts, shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of this Constitution."

It will thus be seen that ever since the creation of the High Court, it has been given the power to make its own rules providing for the exercise of its original and appellate jurisdiction. It will also be seen that the conferment of the said power is in terms of widest amplitude and the only restrictions to which that power is subject, is firstly that it is subject to the provisions of the Constitution and subject to the provisions of any law of the appropriate Legislature made by virtue of the powers conferred on that Legislature by the Constitution. The power given under s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, is preserved by reference to the said section in cl. 36 of the Letters Patent and has been kept alive and re-affirmed by the Government of India Act of 1935 and by the Constitution of India. Under s. 108, the High Court has power to make rules, as it thinks fit, for the exercise, by one or more Judges, of the original and appellate jurisdiction vested in the Court. There can be no doubt whatsoever that the words "vested in the Court" occurring in s. 108 do not mean only such jurisdiction as was vested in the High Court when the Act of 1915 was enacted, but also such jurisdiction as may be vested in it from time to time. As observed by Mahajan J., as he then was, in *N. S. Thread Co. v. James Chadwick & Bros.*¹ (p. 360) :

"It is thus difficult to accept the argument that the power vested in the High Court under sub-s. (1) of S. 108 (of the Government of India Act, 1915), was a limited one, and could only be exercised in respect to such jurisdiction as the High Court possessed on the date when the Act of 1915 came into force. The words of the sub-section 'vested in the court' cannot be read as meaning 'now vested in the court.'"

His Lordship further observed, that s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, conferred power on the High Court which that Court could exercise from time to time with reference to its jurisdiction, whether existing at the coming into force of the Government of India Act, 1915, or whether conferred on it by subsequent legislation. With regard to the range and ambit of the power conferred on the High Court by s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, his Lordship observed (p. 361) :

"...Section 108 is an enactment by itself and is unrestricted in its scope, and covers a much wider field than is covered by S. 106 of the Government of India Act. ...It confers a power on the High Court to make rules in respect not only of the jurisdiction that it enjoyed in 1915 but it also conferred power on it to make rules in respect of jurisdiction which may hereafter be conferred on it by the enactments enacted by the Governor-General in Legislative Council."

As to the effect of the Government of India Act of 1935 and the Constitution of India on the said power conferred under s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915, his Lordship observed (p. 360) :

"...the power that was conferred on the High Court by S. 108 (Government of India Act, 1915) still subsists, and it has not been affected in any manner whatever either by the Government of India Act 1935 or by the new Constitution. On the other hand it has been kept alive and reaffirmed with great vigour by these statutes. The High Courts still enjoy the same unfettered power as they enjoyed under S. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915 of making rules and providing whether an appeal has to be heard by one Judge or more Judges or by Division Courts consisting of two or more Judges of the High Court."

In view of the provisions which we have referred to relating to the power of the High Court to make rules and in view of the observations of Mahajan J. in the Supreme Court case, there can be no doubt whatsoever that the High Court has an unrestricted and unfettered power to make its own rules for the exercise of its several jurisdictions, the only limitations to the power being that the rules will be subject to the provisions of the Constitution and subject to any law made by the State Legislature.

It cannot also be denied that the rules made under the powers possessed by the High Court, are rules of internal management within the High Court and rules of procedure relating to the disposal of the matters which reach the High Court under its several jurisdictions. In *Har Prasad v. Bool Chand*² Sulaiman C. J. and Allsop J. observed (p. 192) :

"...Under section 108(1) of the Government of India Act, this High Court has made its own rules providing for the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction by one or more Judges or by Division Courts constituted of two or more Judges. This rule is exclusively for regulating the procedure in this Court as regards the constitution of Benches. We are unable to hold that the appellant has any vested right in such a constitution."

In *Mahendra v. Darsan*³ it was observed :

"A rule laying down the powers of a Single Judge is a rule of practice and procedure as to the internal arrangement within the Court for disposal of cases. No party can say that he has a right to be heard by a particular number of Judges. If, therefore, a change is made in the rules and an appeal is heard by a single Judge instead of by two Judges, no party can object unless some vested right is affected, it being clearly understood that there is no vested right that an appeal to the High Court must be heard by a particular number of Judges."

In First Appeal No. 32 of 1962,⁴ decided by a Division Bench of this Court, of which one of us was a member, it was observed:

"There cannot be any doubt that whether or not an appeal should be heard by a single Judge or by a Division Bench is a matter of internal arrangement of the High Court."

The rules made by the High Court directing whether certain matters should be decided by a Division Bench or by a single Judge being thus rules of internal arrangement and rules of procedure, it cannot possibly be argued that these rules have the effect of creating any vested rights in the litigant. It is well settled that there can be no vested right in procedure. As was observed in *The Attorney General v. Sillem*⁵ (p. 764):

"The right of the suitor is to bring the action, and to have it conducted in the way and according to the practice of the Court in which he brings it; and if any act of the Parliament, or any rule founded on the authority of the Act of the Parliament, alters the mode of procedure, then he has a right to have it conducted in that altered mode. That, therefore, takes away nothing. The right of action does not constitute a title to keep all the consequences of the right as they were before. It gives the right to have the action conducted according to the rules then in force with respect to the procedure."

In *Anant Gopal Sheorey v. State of Bombay*⁶ it was observed:

"No person has a vested right in any course of procedure. He has only the right of prosecution or defence in the manner prescribed for the time being by or for the Court in which the case is pending and if by an Act of Parliament the mode of procedure is altered he has no other right than to proceed according to the altered mode. In other words a change in the law of procedure operates retrospectively and unlike the law relating to vested right is not only prospective."

It would, therefore, follow that if the rules made by the High Court are merely rules of procedure which gives no rise to any vested rights, the litigant will not be entitled to complain of any change made in the rules.

Having thus stated the source of the power of the High Court to make rules and the nature, scope and extent of the power, we will now come to the various grounds of attack which have been urged by the petitioners. With regard to the first complaint made by the petitioners with regard to the said rules, what is contended is that the power of the High Court to make rules is subject to the provisions of the Constitution, which necessarily include art. 133. The High Court, therefore, has no power to make a rule which is inconsistent with, or which affects the right given by art. 133 of the Constitution to the litigant. Since the impugned rule affects that right, the High Court has no power to make such rule. In order to understand the validity of this ground, it is necessary to consider the provisions of art. 133 of the Constitution. That provision, no doubt, relates to the right of a litigant to go in appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree or final order of the High Court in a civil proceeding. A right of appeal to go to a particular forum is undoubtedly a substantive right. It is also now well-settled that such a right comes into existence and vests in the litigant as soon as the lis commences. It is, however, to be remembered that a right of appeal is not an inherent right but is a creation of the statute. The right, which is a creation of the statute, will be available to the litigant only in the manner in which the law relating to the right makes it available. Now, the right of appeal to go to the Supreme Court, which is created by art. 133 of the Constitution, is conditioned by the very same article as being available only in the circumstances as mentioned therein. It is not, therefore, a clear and crystallised right, right from the inception of the commencement of the lis, but is a right which is made available only on the fulfilment of certain conditions. An examination of the article would show that, in order that the said right may be available, the civil proceeding must, in the first place, reach the High Court and a judgment, decree or final order in the said civil proceeding must be passed by the High Court. Secondly, the civil proceeding must satisfy one or more of the further conditions which are laid down in the said article, namely, that if it is a civil proceeding reaching the High Court in appeal from a decree in a suit in the subordinate Court, the value of the subject-matter in dispute in the Court of the first instance and in dispute on appeal, must be in excess of certain specified pecuniary limits; if it is a proceeding reaching the High Court otherwise than in appeal from a decree of the subordinate Court, the judgment, decree or final order of the High Court must, directly or indirectly, involve some claim or question respecting property of the value exceeding certain specified pecuniary limits; or else, it must be a case fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court, with the additional condition that it must also involve a substantial question of law when the decree or final order of the High Court affirms the decision of the Court immediately below. Clause (3) of this article further provides that even though the other conditions specified in art. 133(1) are satisfied, there would be no right of appeal to the Supreme Court if the matter in the High Court is decided by a single Judge of that Court. It will be clear from the provisions of this article that although a right to go in appeal to the Supreme Court has been provided to the litigant, he will not be in a position to say, as soon as the lis commences, that the right will be available to him. It is a right, which he may have or he may not have, depending upon circumstances which exist at the time when the availability of that right or the exercise of that right comes to be considered. Article 133 provides for the circumstances in which the right to go in appeal to the Supreme Court will be available to the party. It says nothing with regard to how or in what manner the conditions entitling the litigant to go to the Supreme Court will be secured for him. It says that if a matter is decided by a Division Bench of the High Court, a right of appeal may be available to the party under this article. But if the matter is decided by a single Judge of the High Court, the right will not be available. It gives no directions as to which matters will be decided by a single Judge and which will be decided by a Division Bench. As we have already seen, that matter is left entirely to the High Court to be determined by rules made by the High Court as it deems fit. No doubt, the making of the rules is subject to the provisions of the Constitution and also subject to Acts of the appropriate Legislature. Indeed, some of the Acts of the Legislature have made such provisions, for instance, the Income-tax Act, the Press Emergency Act, the Stamp Act and the Divorce Act. The Constitution undoubtedly could make a provision with regard to the matter, and a reference to art. 145 will show that it has made such a provision in cl. (3) of the said article. There is no such provision made by the Constitution so far as the hearing of matters in the High Court is concerned. It is, however, argued on behalf of the petitioners that although no express provision is made by art. 133 providing that civil proceedings of any kind or type should be heard by a Division Bench of the High Court, it is implicit in the provisions of art. 133 that, matters of certain kinds should only be heard by a Division Bench. The argument in that connection is that the items (a), (b) and (c), enumerated in cl. (1) of art. 133, are matters where the Constitution has given a right to the litigant to go to the Supreme Court, as of right. Such a right exists where the value of the subject-matter in dispute, both in the original Court and on appeal, exceeds Rs. 20,000, or where the judgment, decree or final order, sought to be appealed from, involves directly or indirectly some claim or question in respect of property worth more than Rs. 20,000, or where a case is a fit one for appeal. The Constitution having intended that a right of appeal, as of right, should exist in such cases, any rules, which the High Court can make, must be so made as to effectuate and carry out that intention and not to frustrate it. A rule made by the High Court, leaving even such matters to be decided by a single Judge, would have the effect of denying the right of appeal to the litigant and thus frustrating the intention clearly indicated by the provisions of the article. It is argued that, in matters coming to the High Court from the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal or under the several Tenancy Acts, claims and questions involving, directly or indirectly, amounts exceeding Rs. 20,000 are quite capable of being involved, and inasmuch as the rule made by the High Court by allowing such matters to be disposed of by a single Judge, deprives the litigant of his right under art. 133, the rule is inconsistent with the said article and is, therefore, such as the High Court could not have made. In our opinion, the argument is not sound. The intention of art. 133 must be gathered by a perusal of the whole of the article. It is no doubt true that in cl. (1) of the said article, the conditions, on the fulfilment of which the right of appeal may be made available to a party, have been specified. Ordinarily, therefore, if the conditions in cl. (1) are satisfied, the party could have a right of appeal. Clause (3), however, is a overriding provision which starts with the non obstante clause "notwithstanding anything contained in this article". By cl. (3) of the said article, it has been made clear that notwithstanding the fulfilment of the conditions under cl. (1) of the same article, a party will have no right to go to the Supreme Court if his case is decided by a single Judge of the High Court. As we have already pointed out above, the right of the High Court to make rules, deciding which matters will be decided by a single Judge or by a Division Bench, is an unfettered right unless fetters are to be found on the said right, either in the Constitution or in any law made by the appropriate Legislature. So long as there is nothing said either in the Constitution or in any law of the appropriate Legislature limiting the said right, the right could be exercised by the High Court as it deems fit for the convenience of administration of justice. At the time of drafting the Constitution, the Constitution makers could not be said to be unaware of this very wide power of the High Court, and the possibility of the High Court making rules assigning any matters before it for decision and disposal to a single Judge. Even then, by cl. (3) of art. 133, it has been provided that there would be no appeal to the Supreme Court if the matter is decided by a single Judge of the High Court. If it was intended that, in any kind of specified matters, the right of the litigant to go to the Supreme Court should be secured and preserved for him, an appropriate provision could have been made providing that matters of any specific kind may not be heard by a single Judge. Having regard to the provisions of cl. (3) of art. 133, we do not think that it is possible to say that it is intended under the said article that in every case where the conditions specified in (a), (b) and (c) of cl. (1) of art. 133 are satisfied, a right, as of right, is intended to be conferred on the litigant. The conditions specified in (a), (b) and (c) are, no doubt, intended to specify the category of cases in which the right of appeal to go to the Supreme Court may be available to the litigant. But in view of cl. (3) of the article, from the said category are expressly excluded cases which are decided by a single Judge. The rules made by the High Court for disposal of cases, whether by a single Judge or a Division Bench, are rules made for the purpose of administration of justice and are made after having due regard to the considerations which are relevant in that connection. It would not, therefore, be unreasonable to suppose that, when art. 133, by cl. (3) thereof, made a provision that in matters decided by a single Judge, no appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court, it was intended that the fact that the matter was decided by a single Judge of the High Court was sufficient to characterise it as a matter not worthy of going on appeal to the Supreme Court as of right. In our opinion, therefore, the argument advanced on behalf of the petitioners that the provisions of art. 133 of the Constitution impliedly indicate that the High Court shall not make a rule, so as to assign a case which may fulfil the conditions in cl. (1) of the said article for disposal to a single Judge cannot be sustained. The first contention raised by the petitioners, therefore, that the impugned rule made by the High Court is inconsistent with the provisions of art. 133 of the Constitution, and, therefore, invalid, cannot be accepted.

The second objection raised is that although the High Court may have the power to make a rule assigning applications arising under art. 227, or art. 227 read with art. 226, for hearing and disposal to a single Judge, at the time when it first makes the rule, if it once makes a rule assigning such matters to a Division Bench, it cannot subsequently change the rule because of the impact of art. 133 on the matters of the nature governed by the rule already made. The argument advanced in this connection is that once a rule assigning any such matters to a Division Bench is made, the civil proceedings of the nature covered by the said rule become categorised as civil proceedings which when they reach the High Court must be disposed of by a Division Bench. They thus acquire a character of being free of the disability which is introduced by sub-cl. (3) of art. 133 which attaches to matters decided by a single Judge of the High Court. A subsequent change in the rule has the effect of destroying the character obtained by the proceedings which qualifies them for being taken in appeal to the Supreme Court under art. 133 and this the High Court has no power to do. We think that the argument is much too ingenuous to deserve any serious consideration. A right of appeal, as we have already stated, is a creature of statute. It comes into existence at the earliest when the lis commences but at no time earlier than that. It is impossible to say that a right of appeal exists in the litigant in respect of proceedings which he has not even commenced. The question whether the change of rule affects the right of appeal can be considered only in respect of the right of appeal, then existing. There is no right of appeal until the proceedings, in which the right of appeal arises, has commenced. The argument, therefore, that a rule once made cannot be thereafter altered because it affects the right of appeal under art. 133 in respect of the civil proceedings of the nature to which the rule applies, cannot be accepted.

It is then argued that even if the High Court has power to make a change in the rule, the change which it can make, can have only prospective operation and cannot be made so as to have retrospective effect. In other words, it is argued that the new rule made by the High Court can only apply to applications coming to the High Court in proceedings in which lis commences after the making of the rule. It is argued that the right of appeal is a substantive and vested right and the point of time when it gets vested is the commencement of the lis. The right of appeal, which thus vests at the commencement of the lis, is governed and regulated by the law in existence at the time when the lis commences. Any change in the law made subsequently cannot affect that right unless the change of law could be made retrospectively. It is argued that the rule by providing that it will apply to all matters which will be heard in the High Court on or after July 15, 1964, has given the rule a retrospective operation inasmuch as it will apply to a large number of proceedings in which the lis had commenced before July 15, 1964, and in which the right of appeal had already accrued to and vested in the party. The argument that the High Court cannot make a rule having retrospective operation, is advanced on two different grounds. It is said in the first place that the rule made by the High Court has the force of law and, therefore, is law made by the High Court. The only organ of the Government, which can make a law which could have retrospective or retroactive operation, is the Legislature which has the plenary power to legislate. No other organ of the Government can have such power unless such power is expressly conferred upon it. The High Court, it is said, is not a Legislature, and art. 225 of the Constitution, which confers the power to make rules on the High Court, does not in express terms give it a power to make rules retrospectively. The High Court, therefore, cannot make the present rule. The second line of argument advanced in this connection is that the High Court, by making a rule which has a retrospective or retroactive operation, can only affect the rights which have been created under its own rules. It cannot, however, by such rules affect any rights which the party affected by the rules, has under any other statute. The rule made by the High Court has the effect of affecting the rights of the litigant, not only under the rules made by it formerly but under art. 133 of the Constitution, and therefore, the High Court cannot make such a rule.

With regard to the first submission in this connection, namely, that no organ of the Government, excepting the Legislature, has power to make a legislation having restrospective and retroactive operation, reliance is placed on the decision of the Mysore High Court reported in Govindaraju v. State of Mysore.⁷ In that case, it was held that a Governor acting under the proviso to art. 309 of the Constitution does not have the power to make a rule which takes away from Government servants a right already acquired by them under the pre-existing rules or previous transactions as from a date anterior to the promulgation of that rule or to make a rule validating what was invalid at its inception. The power to make rules under art 309 was derived by the Governor under the Constitution and not as a delegate of the Legislature. The exercise of the powers of the Governor was, therefore, an exercise of primary powers possessed by the Governor and not under powers derived by him through or delegated to him by the Legislature. It was held by the learned Judge of the Mysore High Court that even then there was a difference between the powers of a legislative body and those of any other rule-making body which was not a Legislature. Whereas the legislative body can always legislate retrospectively unless there is any prohibition under the Constitution, any other rule-making body cannot exercise the power retrospectively unless the law conferring that power expressly mentions that such power can be exercised retrospectively. The principle on which this distinction is founded is that in democratic constitutions where the law-making power of the body politic is vested in Legislatures, the Legislatures acting within the sphere of legislative power allotted to them by the Constitution exercise a defined portion or part of the supreme sovereign power of the body politic. There was no such assumption possible in the case of non-legislative bodies or any other organ of Government by reason only of the fact that such bodies or organs may be invested with the power of making rules having the force of law although while exercising those powers they are really exercising the power of legislation. In taking this view, the learned Judges relied on an earlier decision of the Mysore High Court reported in India Sugars & Refineries Ltd. v. State.⁸ That decision, however, related to powers of a delegate from the Legislature and did not deal with the case where the power exercised was not as a delegate of the Legislature but directly under the Constitution itself.

A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in *Ram Anwar v. State of U.P.*⁹ has taken a contrary view. It has been held in that case:

"The rule-making power conferred by Art. 309 on the Governor or his nominee is not confined to prospective rule-making and appears to be wide enough to include the making of rules with retrospective effect. The Legislature can legislate prospectively as well as retrospectively. The powers of the Governor under the proviso to Art. 309 being identical with that of the legislation under the main article the Governor can make rules with similar effect."

The Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court was cited before the Mysore High Court. The learned Judges of the Mysore High Court, however, did not agree with the said decision. We do not propose to go into the conflict of decisions between the Mysore High Court and the Allahabad High Court on the question whether the legislative power of any other organ of the Government, apart from the Legislature, which is derived by it not as a delegate of the Legislature but directly under the Constitution is identical with that of the Legislature so far as it relates to the making of a law having a retrospective or retroactive effect, although we may observe that we feel ourselves inclined to agree with the view taken in the Allahabad High Court in preference to that enunciated by the Mysore High Court in the case referred to by us. Even if it were assumed that the rule made by the High Court has retrospective operation and that the High Court, not being a Legislature, does not possess the power to make a retrospective rule unless it is given such power, in our opinion, the power to make a retrospective rule has been given to it under art. 225 of the Constitution, if not expressly, at any rate, by necessary intendment.

In *Indramani v. W. R. Natu*¹⁰ the view of the Court as per the majority of the Judges, who decided that case, is that even when a rule making authority which derives its power to make rules by an Act of the Legislature exercises that power it can make a rule having retrospective effect if such power is delegated to it under the Act not only by express words but even by necessary implication. The argument advanced before the Court was that while the Legislature, which had plenary power, could enact a statute having a retrospective operation, subordinate legislation, be it a rule, a by-law or a notification, could not be made so as to have retrospective operation and that to that extent the rule, bye-law or notification would be ultra vires and would have to be struck down, and reliance was sought to be placed on Indian Sugars & Refineries Ltd. v. State which was the case relied upon by the Mysore High Court in a subsequent decision to which we have already referred. In the majority judgment, their Lordships observed (p. 286):

"...We do not, however, consider it necessary to canvass the correctness of this decision or the broad propositions laid down in it. It is clear law that a Statute which could validly enact a law with retrospective effect could in express terms validly confer upon a rule-making authority a power to make a rule or frame a bye-law having retrospective operation and we would add that we did not understand Mr. Pathak to dispute this position. If this were so the same result would follow where the power to enact a rule or a bye-law with 'retrospective effect' so as to affect pending transactions, is conferred not by express words but where the necessary intendment of the Act confers such a power."

When a rule making body which does not derive its power directly under the Constitution but has the power entrusted to it by an Act of the Legislature can exercise the power so as to make a rule having a retrospective effect if the Act of the Legislature confers such power either in express words or even by necessary implication there can be no doubt whatever that a body deriving its power to make rules directly under the Constitution could have the power to make rules having retrospective effect if the provision of the Constitution confers such power upon it either by express words or by necessary intendment. Mr. Natu has invited our attention to the observations in the dissenting judgment of Justice Subba Rao in the said case. His Lordship has observed as follows (p. 290):

"...Learned counsel for the respondents contends that, as the Legislature can make a law with retrospective operation, so too a delegated authority can make a bye-law with the same effect. This argument ignores the essential distinction between a Legislature functioning in exercise of the powers conferred on it under the Constitution and a body entrusted by the said Legislature with a power to make subordinate legislation. In the case of the Legislature, Art. 248 of the Constitution confers a plenary power of legislation subject to the limitations mentioned therein and in other provisions of the Constitution in respect of appropriate entries in the Seventh Schedule. This Court, in The Union of India v. Madan Gopal Kabra,^{10a} held that the Legislature can always legislate retrospectively, unless there is any prohibition under the Constitution which has created it. But the same rule cannot obviously be applied to the Central Government exercising delegated legislative power, for the scope of their power is not co-extensive with that of the Parliament."

Mr. Natu has relied on these observations of Subba Rao J. in support of his proposition that the powers of the Legislature are different from the powers of any other rule-making body, and while the Legislature can legislate retrospectively, no other rule-making body can do so. We are afraid that the observations relied on by Mr. Natu do not yield the result, such as is contended for by him. The difference in the powers considered by Subba Rao J. was a difference in the power possessed by the Legislature and the delegate from the Legislature. It has been pointed out by his Lordship that while the Legislature derives its power under the Constitution, the delegate from the Legislature derives its power not primarily but as subordinate to the Legislature, and the view expressed is that while a legislative body deriving its power to legislate directly under the Constitution can exercise such power retrospectively unless there is any prohibition under the Constitution which has conferred the power upon it, a delegate from the Legislature cannot do so unless that power is given to it in express words. According to Subba Rao J., therefore, while legislative power derived directly under the Constitution can be exercised retrospectively, in the absence of prohibition, delegated legislative power cannot be so exercised unless it is given in express words. The source of the power possessed by the High Court is, after the Constitution, under art. 225 of the Constitution. That is the primary power possessed by the High Court and flows directly from the Constitution and not as the delegate of the Legislature. There is nothing in art. 225 or any other provision of the Constitution which prohibits its exercise with retrospective effect. Even on the view taken by Subba Rao J., therefore, the High Court can make a rule having a retrospective effect under its power under art. 225 of the Constitution.

Secondly, as we have already said, art. 225, which confers the power on the High Court, by necessary implication and intendment, gives power to make rules having retrospective effect. As we have already pointed out earlier, art. 225 preserves and reaffirms the power possessed by the High Court under s. 108 of the Government of India Act, 1915. That power is unfettered and unrestricted in its ambit and, as observed by Mahajan J. in N. S. Thrad Co. v. James Chadwick & Bros. had got to be conferred upon the High Court in such widest terms in the very nature of things. The making of rules by the High Court for the exercise of its several jurisdictions is for the purpose of administration of justice and, in the exercise of its power, the High Court is empowered to assign matters to single Judges or Division Benches as it may deem fit for the purpose of due and proper administration of justice. It is impossible to say that the High Court can decide once and for all times which matters will be decided by a single Judge and by a Division Bench or Division Court. That will have to be decided from time to time as circumstances may change and especially so as far as the applications under art. 227, or art. 227 read with art. 226, are concerned. At the time, when the jurisdiction under arts. 226 and 227 was conferred for the first time upon the High Court by the Constitution, the High Court thought it fit to make a rule directing that matters arising under this jurisdiction which was conferred upon it by the Constitution for the first time, should be dealt with by a Division Bench as several new and complicated points were likely to arise until certain principles governing such matters get properly settled. The High Court advisedly, therefore, made a rule that all such matters should be decided by a Division Bench. When the rule came to be changed in July 1964, there can be no doubt whatsoever that the rule was changed in the context of the changed circumstances between the time the jurisdiction was first conferred and the time when the change was thought desirable. The High Court has now thought it fit that it is no more necessary for the Division Bench to deal with such matters and the matters can as well be disposed of by a single Judge. The power to make rules granted to the High Court, ever since it has come to be established, has been always contemplated to be exercised by the High Court as it deems fit from time to time. In the exercise of the powers, in our opinion, it is implied in the very nature of things that the power should also be exercised, if necessary, so as to have retrospective operation. The argument, therefore, that the High Court cannot make a rule having retrospective operation, cannot be sustained.

With regard to the other branch of the argument relating to this point, the rule made by the High Court, as we have already pointed out, is a rule of procedure in which there can be no vested rights. It was not possible for the petitioners or any litigant to say that it could have a vested right to have his proceeding, after it had reached the High Court, heard by a particular number of Judges. His substantive right is to go in appeal to the High Court. How his appeal would be dealt with will depend upon the practice and procedure of the High Court which may vary from time to time. No complaint possibly, therefore, could be made by the litigants that their right to have the appeal decided by a Division Bench which existed at the time when they entered the High Court, or when the lis out of which the proceeding in the High Court had resulted, had commenced, because there was no such vested right in the party at any time. The other argument is that the rule has the effect of taking away the vested rights under art. 133 of the Constitution. In our opinion, no vested rights under art. 133 have been taken away. We are, in that respect, in complete agreement with the view expressed by the Special Bench of the Patna High Court in Mahendra v. Darsan. Dealing with the similar argument, the learned Judges of the Patna High Court observed:

"Such a rule cannot be said to have affected the right of appeal given under Art. 133 of the Constitution of India read with Sections 109 & 110, Civil P. C. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court is granted either when the case fulfils the requirements of Section 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure or when it is otherwise a fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court. In either case, the petitioner has to apply for a certificate and has to satisfy the Court that the requisite conditions are fulfilled. The right is thus a limited right, . . . The right is to ask for a certificate that the appeal fulfils the requirements of Section 109 or Section 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but the right is only given in such cases as are heard in the High Court by two or more Judges: There is no such right in a case which is heard by a Single Judge, there being a different right of appeal with regard to Single Judge decisions under clause 10 of the Letters Patent. If it is conceded that no party has a vested right to be heard by two or more Judges in the High Court it follows as a necessary corollary that a change of Rules with regard to the powers of a single Judge does not affect the right of appeal given by the Statute. That right still remains the same as before. All that happens is that the statutory prohibition under Section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, now clause (3) of Art. 133 of the Constitution comes into operation."

A similar view has also been taken by a Division Bench of this Court in First Appeal No. 32 of 1962. We are aware that there is a conflict of views on this point, and a contrary decision has been taken by the Full Bench of the Punjab High Court in Gordhan Das-Baldev Das v. G.-G.-In-Council.¹¹ There is also a decision from the Nagpur High Court in Radhakisan v. Shridhar.¹² Having regard, however, to the Division Bench decision of this Court and the decision of the Patna High Court in Mahendra v. Darsan with which we find ourselves in agreement, we are of the opinion that the contention raised by Mr. Natu that the rule framed by the High Court is invalid in so far as it affects proceedings in respect of which the lis has commenced prior to the date on which the rule comes into operation, because in respect of such matters, it affects the vested rights of the litigants under art. 133 of the Constitution, cannot be sustained.

The next point urged before us is that the rule contravenes art. 14 of the Constitution and is, therefore, void. In our opinion, the point is utterly devoid of any substance. The argument in this connection is advanced on two grounds. It is said that while all decisions under the Tenancy Acts of any authority are brought under the purview of the new rule, so far as some other Local Acts are concerned, not all decisions but only decisions of the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal under the said Acts are governed by the rule. We do not understand how any ground of discrimination can be urged on this basis. It is well settled that if there is any reasonable or clear classification, an attack on the ground of discrimination under art. 14 cannot be available. Different treatment of matters arising out of different Acts dealing with different subjects cannot give rise to any challenge on the ground of discrimination, nor can the fact that the application from the different Acts decided by different authorities ultimately reach the High Court under its jurisdiction under art. 227 require all such matters to be treated alike by the High Court in their disposal. The second argument is that under certain provisions of some of the Acts from which matters go to the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal, under the same provisions, matters also go to the Commissioner and whereas matters dealt with by the Revenue Tribunal are brought under the rule, those that do not go to the Revenue Tribunal but to some other authority are not brought under the rule. It is contended that while matters, which after going to the Revenue Tribunal, come to the High Court on an application under art. 227 of the Constitution, will be treated under the new rule as liable to be disposed of by a single Judge, similar matters, which go to the other authorities under the said Act and thereafter enter the High Court on an application under art. 227, will be treated differently by being disposed of by a Division Bench. This, it is urged, constitutes discrimination under art. 14 of the Constitution. We do not think that the contention is tenable. Even though the matters, which arise under the same provisions are similar, at their inception they are processed differently before they reach the High Court. The provisions of the various Acts, which permit these different processes and different channelling of the matters before they reach the High Court, have not been challenged and must, therefore, be regarded as good and valid law. The different processes to which the cases have been subjected will be a sufficient reason to regard them as requiring different treatment when they come to the High Court. Thus while cases which have proceeded through the channel of the Revenue Tribunal have the advantage of the decision of the members of the Revenue Tribunal and the procedure prescribed by the Revenue Tribunal, the matters, which have been dealt with by the other authorities, have not that advantage. It cannot be denied that the manner in which the matter comes to be treated in its earlier processes will be a relevant matter to be considered how it should be treated at subsequent stages. Thus, for instance, a monetary claim may, at the initial stage, be tried as a small cause suit if the Judge trying it is invested with the necessary Small Cause Court powers. A similar claim may also have to be treated by a Judge as a regular suit where he has not the requisite Small Cause Court powers. In one case, the claim having been tried as a small cause claim, no appeal will lie to the superior Court and the remedy available will be by way of a revision under the Small Cause Courts Act. In the other case, there will be a regular appeal to the District Court. It cannot be argued that because of this different treatment of similar claims resulting in different consequences, there is discrimination which offends against art. 14 of the Constitution. It is obvious that, where the claim is allowed to be treated as a small cause claim, adequate care is taken to see that a person, who is allowed to try it as a small cause, has the necessary suitability and experience. The fact that the matter has been treated by a Judge, who has been considered as sufficiently suitable and experienced to treat it as a small cause, has given the matter a character which does not require to be taken further in appeal to the District Court. On the other hand, when the claim is considered by a Judge who has not been given the necessary powers which imply that he has not the necessary suitability and experience to try it as a small cause matter, it is thought advisable that the matter should be decided as a regular suit and the right of appeal to the District Court should be given to the litigant. It would thus be seen that the further different treatment of similar claims is based on the reasonable basis and, therefore, involves no discrimination. In making the rule the matters which come to the High Court from the decisions of the Revenue Tribunal should be disposed of by a single Judge due regard has been given to the earlier stages through which these matters have passed. In our opinion, therefore, the argument urged under art. 14 of the Constitution also fails.

Coming now to the last point which relates to the construction of the rule framed, what is urged is that r. 15-A provides that all matters, which are specified in the said rule, will be heard and finally disposed of by a single Judge. The words "heard and finally disposed of" contemplate the preliminary hearing by way of admission and the final hearing at the time of the disposal. Under r. 15-A, therefore, what is contemplated is that the hearing at both stages will be done by a single Judge. Paragraph 2 of the notification provides for coming into operation of this rule as from a certain date and the applicability of the rule to the pending matters. What is stated in para. 2 is that the new rule will come into effect from July 15, 1964, and will apply to all applications which will be heard on and after that date. The contention is that having regard to the use of the word "heard" in r. 15-A and having regard to the meaning which it has under the rule, that word must be understood as having the same meaning even in para. 2 and, therefore, what is meant by the word "heard" in para. 2 is "heard for the purpose of admission." In other words, the new rule is made applicable to all such matters which come for preliminary hearing on or after July 15, 1964, and cannot apply to matters which have already been heard for admission before that date. In our opinion, the argument advanced require the word "heard" to be understood as meaning "heard for the first time". We do not think that any such restricted meaning of the word "heard" is intended in making the rule. "Heard," in our opinion, would mean "heard at any time in the process of hearing until the matter is finally disposed of". A matter before it is finally disposed of may come for hearing a number of times. After the rule comes into operation, all matters governed by the rule are directed to come for hearing before a single Judge. The mere circumstance that a matter has been heard for admission by a Division Bench, will not make it a matter which is not thereafter capable of being heard by a single Judge if it is actually within the list of matters which is capable of being disposed of by a single Judge. Undoubtedly, if a matter is before a Division Bench and has been part-heard by the Division Bench, the Division Bench no doubt, will be entitled to retain the matter before it and dispose of it itself without sending it to the file of the single Judge, because matters in the list of a single Judge are also capable of being disposed of by a Division Bench, the rule empowering a single Judge to dispose of the matters being only an enabling one. There is, however, nothing to prevent a Division Bench even in matter which it has heard for sometime to send it to the file of a single Judge if it finds that the matter is capable of being disposed of by a single Judge. We do not, therefore, think that the fact that the matter has been heard for admission by a Division Bench will require it to be retained as a Division Bench matter or that the rule has intended that such matters should not be disposed of by a single Judge. In our opinion, therefore, under the rule as it is framed, all matters such as are specified in the said rule will be liable to be heard and disposed of by a single Judge on or after July 15, 1964.

In the result, therefore, all the contentions, which have been raised by the petitioners challenging the validity of the rule, fail and the applications, therefore, must be dismissed. We accordingly discharge the rule issued on these applications. There will be no order as to costs.

Applications dismissed.

KAMALABAI HARJIVANDAS PAREKH v. T. B. DESAI.*

Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act (XXX of 1952), Sec. 8(3)(b) — Constitution of India, Arts. 31, 226—Whether s. 8(3)(b) ultra vires art. 31—Petition under art. 226 raising constitutional validity of legislation—Delay in presenting such petition whether affects its maintainability.

Clause (b) including the words "whichever is less" of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 of the Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act, 1952, is ultra vires of art. 31 of the Constitution of India (as it stood prior to its amendment in 1955), and is, therefore, void.

Where a constitutional objection to the validity of a legislation is in question, question of mere delay will not affect the maintainability of a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution of India.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

S. J. Sorabji, with A. J. Rana, instructed by Jestharam & Co., for the petitioner.

H. G. Advani, instructed by G. M. Divekar, for the respondents.

KOTVAL J. The petitioner claims to be the owner of a piece of land admeasuring 2 gunthas 5 annas, out of S. No. 29A at Juhu. The land originally belonged to her husband, and after his death she claims to have succeeded to it by virtue of a will. The respondents have not admitted her title, but the question is hardly material to the points raised in the present petition.

On May 2, 1942, this piece of land was requisitioned for the purposes of the Union, under r. 75A(1) of the then existing Defence of India Rules. The notification (exh. 1) stated that it was required for military purposes, and it has now been explained that it was required for the construction of a road leading to the military aerodrome at Juhu during the period of the emergency occasioned by the last war. The owner of the plot was receiving the usual compensation for requisitioning until December 29, 1952, when a notification was issued under s. 7 of the Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act, 1952 (XXX of 1952). That Act had been enacted by the Parliament on March 14, 1952, and by virtue of s. 24 thereof, it replaced several enactments which were passed after the operation of Defence of India Rules expired. The notification under s. 7 of the Act stated that the land, which was part of a much larger area at one time, and which had been requisitioned on May 2, 1942, was now being acquired by the Government of India, Ministry of Works, Housing and Supply. The land would ordinarily vest in the Government of India from the date of the notification under s. 7 and the notification itself so declared the land to have vested in the Central Government.

Consequent upon this notification, the only right which the owner of the land had, was to claim compensation, and accordingly compensation was offered by the Collector of Bombay, respondent No. 2 to the petition, by his letter dated February 20, 1961, at the rate of Rs. 11 per sq. yd. According to this valuation, the petitioner would have got Rs. 3,080 for the land. The petitioner, however, wanted compensation for the land at a much higher rate. She claimed it at the rate of Rs. 100 per sq. yd.; which would give her an amount of Rs. ... plus the usual 15 per cent. solatium for compulsory acquisition. Since there was no agreement, the Chief Judge, Court of Small Causes, Bombay, Mr. T. B. Desai, who is respondent No. 1 to this petition, was appointed the Arbitrator under s. 7. The Arbitrator gave notice to the petitioner to put in her claim, and also to respondent No. 3, the Government of India, to put in its statement of valuation. Accordingly, the petitioner put in a statement claiming compensation at the rate of Rs. 75 per sq. yard, plus 15 per cent. solatium for compulsory acquisition and the State offered in its statement compensation at the rate of Rs. 11 per sq. yd. which according to it was the "fair value according to the said Act". Respondent No. 3 also denied the petitioner's claim for the 15 per cent. solatium for compulsory acquisition. Before the matter could proceed much further before the Arbitrator, the petitioner preferred the present Miscellaneous Petition in this Court on September 18, 1962.

In this petition, the petitioner challenges these provisions of the Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immoveable Property Act, 1952, whereby the compensation is to be assessed. We will first refer to the provisions of the Act, and then indicate the precise nature of the objection and the question raised in the present petition.

Act XXX of 1952 was enacted to provide for the requisitioning and acquisition of the immoveable property for the purposes of the Union, and it was brought into force for a limited duration. By an amendment to s. 1 made by another Central Act No. XLVIII of 1963, the Act was to cease to have effect on March 14, 1970, with certain exceptions in favour of the things done or omitted to be done in the past. Section 3 deals with the power to requisition immoveable property, and s. 4 prescribes that consequent upon requisitioning the competent authority may take possession of the property by such force as may be necessary after requiring the owner to deliver possession by a notice served on him. Section 5 confers rights on the State to use the property for the purpose for which it was requisitioned and provides for repairs to the requisitioned property. Section 6 provides for the release of the property from requisitioning when the purpose for which it was requisitioned has been fulfilled.

Then follow the provisions regarding acquisition. Section 7(1) says that where any property is subject to requisition, the Central Government may, if it is of opinion that it is necessary to acquire the property for a public purpose, at any time acquire such property. In order to do that, it has to publish a notice in the Official Gazette, which we have stated was done in the instant case, on April 2, 1953. There is proviso to s. 7(1) which provides the usual safeguard of hearing the person interested before issuing the notification, and considering the cause shown by him, if any, against acquisition. Sub-section (2) of s. 7 declares that upon the notification being issued under sub-s. (1), the property vests in the Central Government absolutely and free from all encumbrances, and from the date of vesting, the period of requisition of such property shall end. There are certain conditions to the acquisition of property under s. 7, and these are indicated in sub-s. (3) thereof. Sub-section (4) enacts that the decision or determination of the Central Government in regard to whether the property should be acquired or not is final.

Next follow the provisions as to the award of compensation and it is with those provisions that we are principally concerned in the present petition. It will be convenient to reproduce here the provisions of s. 8 entirely in order to appreciate the points argued:—

“8. (1) Where any property is requisitioned or acquired under this Act, there shall be paid compensation the amount of which shall be determined in the manner and in accordance with the principles hereinafter set out, that is to say,—

(a) where the amount of compensation can be fixed by agreement, it shall be paid in accordance with such agreement;

(b) where no such agreement can be reached, the Central Government shall appoint as arbitrator a person who is, or has been, or is qualified for appointment as, a Judge of a High Court;

(c) the Central Government may, in any particular case, nominate a person having expert knowledge as to the nature of the property requisitioned or acquired to assist the arbitrator and where such nomination is made, the person to be compensated may also nominate an assessor for the same purpose;

(d) at the commencement of the proceedings before the arbitrator, the Central Government and the person to be compensated shall state what in their respective opinion is a fair amount of compensation;

(e) the arbitrator shall, after hearing the dispute, make an award determining the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just and specifying the person or persons to whom such compensation shall be paid; and in making the award, he shall have regard to the circumstances of each case and the provisions of sub-sections (2) and (3), so far as they are applicable;

(f) where there is any dispute as to the person or persons who are entitled to the compensation, the arbitrator shall decide such dispute and if the arbitrator finds that more persons than one are entitled to compensation, he shall apportion the amount thereof amongst such persons;

(g) nothing in the Arbitration Act, 1940 shall apply to arbitrations under this section.

(2) The amount of compensation payable for the requisitioning of any property shall consist of—

(a) a recurring payment, in respect of the period of requisition, of a sum equal to the rent which would have been payable for the use and occupation of the property, if it had been taken on lease for that period, and

(b) such sum or sums, if any, as may be found necessary to compensate the person interested for all or any of the following matters, namely:—

(i) pecuniary loss due to requisitioning;

(ii) expenses on account of vacating the requisitioned premises;

(iii) expenses on account of reoccupying the premises upon release from requisition; and

(iv) damages (other than normal wear and tear) caused to the property during the period of requisition, including the expenses that may have to be incurred for restoring the property to the condition in which it was at the time of requisition.

(3) The compensation payable for the acquisition of any property under section 7 shall be—

(a) the price which the requisitioned property would have fetched in the open market, if it had remained in the same condition as it was at the time of requisitioning and been sold on the date of acquisition, or

(b) twice the price which the requisitioned property would have fetched in the open market if it had been sold on the date of requisition, whichever is less."

Sections 10 and 11 make the usual provisions regarding right of appeal. No right of appeal is prescribed against an order of acquisition though a right of appeal is prescribed in s. 10 from an order of requisitioning.

Now, it will be noticed that s. 8(1), in its opening clause, enacts that compensation shall be paid of an amount which is to be determined (a) in the manner and (b) in accordance with the principles hereinafter set out. The section, therefore, in express terms, deals with the manner of determination of compensation and the principles on which the compensation is to be determined—both being the plenary requirements of art. 31(2) of the Constitution. Sub-section (1) mostly deals with the procedure to be followed by the Arbitrator in arriving at the figure of compensation, excepting cl. (e), to the important provisions of which we will presently refer. Sub-section (2) deals with the principles of compensation when the property is requisitioned. Actually we are not concerned in the present petition with sub-s. (2), but reference was made to it only on a matter of construction of the other sub-sections of s. 8.

Sub-section (3) is the crucial provision by which the petitioner's case is governed. It opens with the words: "The compensation payable for the acquisition of any property under section 7 shall be" and then prescribes two modes of ascertaining that compensation. Clause (a) prescribes that the compensation shall be the price which the property would have fetched in the open market, "if it had remained in the same condition as it was at the time of requisitioning and been sold on the date of acquisition." In other words, all that cl. (a) of sub-s. (3) enacts, is that the property should be valued at the market value on the date of acquisition, but in the condition in which it was on the date on which it was requisitioned. Clause (b) of sub-s. (3) however introduces a wholly different principle. It refers to twice the price which the requisitioned property would have fetched in the open market, if it had been sold on the date of requisition. Thus sub-s. (3)(b) has reference to the price on the date of requisition and it says that the compensation shall be twice that price. It is clear that the two clauses of s. 8(3) lay down two radically different principles for the determination of compensation. Clause (a) speaks of the market price on the date of acquisition, while cl. (b) speaks of the market price on the date of requisition. The provision for twice the price in the latter case affects merely the quantum of the compensation but not the principle of determination.

Now, between these two radically different principles of assessing compensation the choice is in favour of the State and not in favour of the person whose property is acquired. By sub-s. (3) the two principles are made alternative by the use of the word "or", but what is of prime importance in considering the constitutionality of these provisions are the concluding words of sub-s. (3) "whichever is less". The total effect, therefore, of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 is that substantially the valuation has to be made for the purposes of compensation upon one of the two alternative principles—(a) either the value on the date of acquisition, or (b) twice the market value on the date of requisition, but the person whose property is being acquired is to be paid that amount "whichever is less".

It is cl. (b) of sub-s. (3), which is attacked as being ultra vires of the provisions of art. 31 of the Constitution. We may add that originally in the petition the attack was against both the cls. (a) and (b) of sub-s. (3), but Mr. Sorabjee on behalf of the petitioner has with much discretion limited the argument to cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) only. For the purposes of the decision of the constitutional question, which has been raised, it may be stated here that it is contended by counsel for both the parties before us that the constitutionality of the provisions affected falls to be determined under art. 31 as it stood prior to the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955. Prior to that amendment, cls. (1) and (2) of art. 31 ran as follows:

"(1) No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law.

(2) No property, moveable or immovable, including any interest in, or in any company owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes under any law authorising the taking of such possession or such acquisition, unless the law provides for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired and either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined and given."

Now, it is argued that cl. (2) of art. 31 says that no property shall be taken possession of or acquired for public purposes unless two conditions are fulfilled viz., (1) that the law provides for compensation for the property, and (2) either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and given. In any case, what is to be given under cl. (2) of art. 31 is "compensation", and it has been urged that upon the interpretation placed upon the word by the Supreme Court, it is clear that it means the just equivalent of the property to be taken, or, in other words, the fair market value of the property. It is further contended that the provisions of cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 make it impossible to give fair compensation or a true market value.

Reliance has been placed in this respect upon the leading case—The State of West Bengal v. Bela Banerjee.¹ That also was a case in which art. 31 prior to its amendment by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, came up for consideration before the Supreme Court. In that case, the provisions of s. 8 of the West Bengal Land Development and Planning Act, 1948, were challenged. It provided for the determination of the amount of compensation, and it was challenged as ultra vires of art. 31. The proviso (b) to that section limited the compensation payable to an amount not exceeding the market value of the land on December 31, 1946, and it was urged on behalf of the owners that fixation of assessment of compensation as on December 31, 1946—a completely arbitrary date—and having regard to the fact that the State may actually acquire the property much later, the compensation payable would not be a full and fair money equivalent of the property to be taken. It was argued on behalf of the State in that case that compensation could not mean the full cash equivalent, but that it would mean such compensation as was determined on principles laid down by the law enacted in exercise of the legislative power conferred by Entry 42 of List III (the Concurrent List). The learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Court, repelled the latter argument as follows (p. 563):

"We are unable to agree with this view. While it is true that the legislature is given the discretionary power of laying down the principles which should govern the determination of the amount to be given to the owner for the property appropriated, such principles must ensure that what is determined as payable must be compensation, that is, a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. Within the limits of this basic requirement of full indemnification of the expropriated owner, the Constitution allows free play to the legislative judgment as to what principles should guide the determination of the amount payable. Whether such principles take into account all the elements which make up the true value of the property appropriated and exclude matters which are to be neglected, is a justiciable issue to be adjudicated by the court."

Having regard to this important pronouncement of the Supreme Court, it must be taken now as settled beyond any controversy that the word "compensation" as used in art. 31, cls. (1) and (2), prior to the fourth amendment, means nothing more or less than the just equivalent of the property taken by acquisition. We shall show that in a subsequent judgment, the latter expression has been used interchangeably with the "just equivalent". Therefore, any law for acquisition of property which made a provision, whereby it was possible that the just equivalent would not be paid to a citizen prior to the Fourth Amendment would necessarily be ultra vires of art. 31.

The other point that was raised in Bela Banerjee's case, and which is also of importance in the present petition, was that the fixation of an arbitrary date on which the compensation is to be assessed, which has no reference to the point of time when the property is actually acquired, is prima facie bad and it must be assumed that it would result in the "just equivalent" not being given to the citizen. In this respect, the Supreme Court did not in terms say that the fixation of an arbitrary date of this kind would in every case be bad, but the principle which they laid down was stated thus (p. 564):

"...Considering that the impugned Act is a permanent enactment and lands may be acquired under it many years after it came into force, the fixing of the market value on December 31, 1946, as the ceiling on compensation, without reference to the value of the land at the time of the acquisition is arbitrary and cannot be regarded as due compliance in letter and spirit with the requirement of article 31(2). The fixing of an anterior date for the ascertainment of value may not, in certain circumstances, be a violation of the constitutional requirement as, for instance, when the proposed scheme of acquisition becomes known before it is launched and prices rise sharply in anticipation of the benefits to be derived under it, but the fixing of an anterior date, which might have no relation to the value of the land when it is acquired, may be, many years later, cannot but be regarded as arbitrary."

We have quoted not merely the principles laid down but also the illustration given by the learned Chief Justice in extenso, because, as we shall presently show, giving of the illustration to indicate a possible exception has resulted in giving rise to a large volume of discussion in subsequent authorities. The true principle, however, is as indicated by the learned Chief Justice in the first sentence of the passage we have quoted, that "the fixing of the market value on December 31, 1946, (an arbitrary date), as the ceiling on compensation, without reference to the value of the land at the time of the acquisition is arbitrary and cannot be regarded as due compliance in letter and spirit with the requirement of article 31(2)".

The statement of the principle in Bela Banerjee's case declared the fixing of an arbitrary date as not in compliance with the letter and spirit of art. 31 (2), but in subsequent decisions, it is made clear that the effect of mentioning an arbitrary date of this kind as the date on which compensation is to be assessed gives rise, so to say, to a presumption that the just equivalent is not being paid unless the State establishes aliunde that what it is paying is the just equivalent. Subsequent to the decision in Bela Banerjee's case, several High Courts have applied it. Some of those decisions were cited and they are: Than Singh v. Union of India,² H. P. Khandewal v. State of U. P.,³ and Chhaya Devi v. State of Bihar.⁴ The decision was also applied by this Court in *Ramdas Nathubhai Shah v. P. M. Shahane*⁵ a judgment to which my learned brother was a party. In that case, this Court was concerned with the provisions of the recent enactment necessitated by the bursting of the Panshet dam at Poona. Consequent upon that disaster, it became necessary to provide for the reconstruction of the devastated area and controlling the developed area by acquiring the lands on the two banks of the Mutha river. The Act known as the Poona Mutha River Flood Limits (Prohibition of Building) and Provision for Alternative Building Sites Act, 1961, was passed on September 25, 1961. In that Act the principle of compensation was laid down in s. 7 read with s. 23 of the Land Acquisition Act. The provision made was that the property should be valued and compensation paid in accordance with the value prevailing on the date on which a declaration is made in the Act or January 1, 1948. It was argued that the fixation of such a date was arbitrary, and this Court accepted the argument and struck down the provision. The important difference, however, between that case and the present one was that, in that case the Division Bench was concerned with a law which was passed subsequent to the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955. By that Act, an important change was made in cl. (2) of art. 31, by the addition, inter alia, of the following clause:

"...and no such law shall be called in question in any Court on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate."

Thus, after the amendment, mere deficiency or inadequacy of compensation is not a question which can go to show the unconstitutionality of any Act dealing with the acquisition of property. Despite that fact the Division Bench in that case took the view that the fixation of the arbitrary date as the date on which the value for the purposes of the compensation has to be assessed was unconstitutional, and the reasoning was thus stated by Mr. Justice Patel, who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Division Bench:

"In our view, once the interpretation put upon the word 'compensation' by the Supreme Court is accepted, it would not be possible to sustain this contention. It may not be the exact equivalent but it must in fairness amount to compensation before it can be declared valid. There would, therefore, be no difference in the approach to the case merely because in this case the principles have been fixed. If any thing that is called a principle of valuation is arbitrary then it ceases to be a principle and must be declared to be invalid."

It was contended in that case also that the fixation of the value of the property acquired by reference to a date much anterior to the date of acquisition is a recognised mode of doing it, at least in national emergencies, but after considering several foreign and other authorities, the learned Judges stated the principle thus:

"It seems that article 31 with the amendment embodies these principles only and is not intended to permit expropriation of property by providing the payment of nominal compensation... such compensation as cannot reasonably be called compensation."

Accordingly, the Division Bench held that s. 7 of the Act before them offended against art. 31, and was, therefore, ultra vires and void.

The decision shows that even after the amendment of art. 31 by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, the law still is that what is to be paid for the acquisition of property by the State is the true equivalent or the market value of the property to be acquired, and that fixing of an arbitrary date, on which such property is to be valued, which date is anterior to the date of acquisition, is bad. Thus, whether before or after the amendment of art. 31, the view has been taken that what is to be paid for the acquisition of property is a just equivalent; and that if a date is fixed arbitrarily on which the valuation is to be reached, which date is anterior to the date of acquisition, then, by the fixation of such date, fair market value or full equivalent cannot be paid and so would be hit by art. 31.

We may at once say that it is not necessary for us, in the present case, to consider the position after art. 31 was amended in 1955, for, in the present case, the acquisition is of 1952, and under an enactment which is also of 1952. The decisions also show that the principle of Bela Banerjee's case is not affected by the Fourth Amendment.

On behalf of the respondents, strong reliance was placed by Mr. Advani on a recent decision of the Supreme Court in M/s W. R. E. D. Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras,⁶ to urge that the principle is not as stated above but is different.

In that case, the provisions of Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings (Acquisition) Act, (29 of 1954), were challenged. By s. 5 of that Act provision was made for the payment of compensation to licensees whose undertakings were acquired under the provisions of the Act, and Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar, as he then was (now Chief Justice), who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Court, indicated the bases laid down in s. 5 for the payment of compensation in paras. 22, 23 and 24 of his judgment. It appears that the compensation was payable at the option of the licensee under any one or more of the three bases prescribed by s. 5. The three bases A, B and C were, to state them briefly, that compensation was to be paid (A) at 20 times the average net annual profit of the undertaking during a period of five consecutive account years immediately preceding the vesting date, (B) the aggregate value of the shares constituting the share capital of the undertaking reckoned in a certain manner, and (C) the aggregate value of the amount of the book value of all works in gross, the book value of all stores, the book value of all other fixed assets, of all plants and equipment, the book value of all intangible assets, and the amount due from consumers subject to certain limitations prescribed. The over-riding provision, however, was that it was for the licensees i.e. the party whose property has been taken, to avail of the option given to choose any one or more of the three bases. These provisions were attacked as unconstitutional on the ground that they did not afford a just equivalent of the property to be taken or, in other words, the market value.

Now, it has to be noticed that here again the Supreme Court was dealing with a pre-amendment statute. The Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings (Acquisition) Act was Act 29 of 1954 and was, therefore, passed prior to the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, and the case, as their Lordships in terms pointed out, fell to be determined upon the provisions of the unamended art. 31. The Supreme Court did not in any way comment upon or touch the principle laid down in Bela Banerjee's case, that by the word 'compensation' is implied a just and fair equivalent of the property to be taken, or, in other words, the market value. Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar, after considering all the provisions of the Act impugned before him, and particularly s. 5 thereof, held in para. 25 that the legislation itself showed that it was possible thereunder to give a fair and just equivalent of the property to be taken, or in other words, the market value. The learned Judge held thus (para. 25):—

"It is true that in none of the three bases does the Legislature refer to the market value of the undertaking, but that itself cannot justify the argument that what is intended to be paid by way of compensation must necessarily mean much less than the market value. The failure of the legislature to refer to the fair market value cannot, in our opinion, be regarded as conclusive or even presumptive evidence of the fact that what is intended to be paid under S. 5 does not amount to a just equivalent of the undertaking taken over. After all, in considering the question as to whether compensation payable under one or the other of the bases amounts to just equivalent, we must try to assess what would be payable under the said basis."

Then the learned Judge pointed out that the real difficulty in the way of the appellant-company in the case before him was that the company had produced no material before the Court on which its plea could be sustained, and that in the absence of any satisfactory material, it would be difficult for the Court to come to any definite conclusion on the question whether just equivalent is provided for by s. 5 or not. It may, first of all, be noticed that in the whole of this case, the Supreme Court, after noticing the decision in Bela Banerjee's case, did not say a word in modification of any principle laid down therein, but, on the other hand, reaffirmed it. In para. 20, the Supreme Court said (p. 1762):

"...In support of his argument, Mr. Nambiar has relied on the decision of this Court in State of West Bengal v. Mrs. Bela Banerjee. In dealing with the question about the scope and effect of the provisions of art. 31(2) in so far as they referred to the payment of compensation, this Court observed that though entry 42 of List III conferred on the Legislature the discretionary power of laying down the principles which should govern the determination of the amount to be given to the owner of the property acquired, art. 31(2) required that such principles must ensure that what is determined as payable must be 'compensation', that is, a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. That is why in considering the validity of any statute in the light of art. 31(2) it would be open to the Court to enquire whether all the elements which make up the true value of the property acquired have been taken into account in laying down the principles for determining compensation".

In this particular case upon the facts we have shown that the Supreme Court held that in that case the impugned statute had made it possible for a citizen to receive the just and true equivalent of the property to be taken from him. As to whether that was so or not in fact, the Supreme Court said that there was no material placed before it. Therefore, the West Ramnad case, in our opinion, did not alter the principle in Bela Banerjee's case. On the other hand, it affirmed it. Of course, in that case, the statute was held to be intra vires because those provisions were held not to infringe the provisions of art. 31(2) as interpreted in Bela Banerjee's case. We may also point out here that the West Ramnad case was a case where the provisions of the impugned statute were radically different from the provisions of the statute which is impugned before us, or the statute in Bela Banerjee's case. In West Ramnad's case, no question of the statute laying down an arbitrary date ever arose for consideration. There is one circumstance, however, which we may note here while we are discussing that authority, and that is the provisions in the Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings (Acquisition) Act, 1954, challenged in that case, laying down three alternative principles upon which compensation would be assessed, but unlike the Act before us, offering an option, to accept any one alternative, to the citizen or the third party, whose property has been acquired, and not, as in the present case, providing that only compensation under that alternative should be paid "whichever is less". That was one of the important considerations which weighed in the decision of that case, and which also serves to distinguish the facts of that case from the facts of the present case.

Thus, barring the decision of this Court in the Poona Mutha River case (Spl. C.A. No. 121/62 and others), all the decisions to which we have so far referred were decisions turning upon the provisions of art. 31(2) before its amendment by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955.

We now turn to an important case which considered all these previous decisions and resulted in the latest decision by the Supreme Court on this question. That is the decision of the Supreme Court in State of Madras v. Nama Sivaya Mudaliar.^{7a} The appeals were against the decision of the Madras High Court in Namasivaya v. State of Madras.⁸ In that case, the Court was concerned with the acquisition of certain land, which was lignite bearing land, and the State Government, with a view to controlling lignite resources, proceeded to acquire the lignite bearing areas. To enable the State to do so, the Madras Lignite (Acquisition of Land) Act XI of 1953 was passed. That Act directed that compensation was to be paid on the basis of the value of the land on April 28, 1947. The provisions as to the payment of compensation and the fixation of that date were challenged. It was explained that as soon as valuable lignite was discovered there was a great boom in the value of the lands and speculators were dealing in it, and therefore, on October 6, 1948, Government had issued a press-note warning the speculators that the lands would be taken over by Government, and advising the owners not to part with them. It was argued on behalf of the State that the decided on March 3, 1964 (Supreme Court).

date in the Act was fixed with reference to the date when lignite was first discovered in the area, and that, therefore, it was not just an arbitrary fixation of any date, but the date was referable to an intelligible principle. Nonetheless the Madras High Court struck down the fixation of that arbitrary date, observing (p. 551):

"...This is a date which has no bearing on the value of the land at the time it was acquired. It is a wholly irrelevant circumstance. Since that date the value of the land—leaving out all speculative elements—may have gone up owing to quite legitimate causes. To deprive a person of the value that has accrued to his property owing to natural and lawful causes is also unconstitutional."

This decision of the Madras High Court was confirmed by the Supreme Court in State of Madras v. Nama Sivaya Mudaliar, and after pointing out that the result of the Madras Act in that case was to freeze for the purpose of acquisition the prices of land in the area to which it applied, and to deprive the owners of the benefit of the appreciation of land-values since April 28, 1947, Mr. Justice Shah, who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Court, re-affirmed the principle in Bela Banerjee's case, saying that the principles laid down in an enactment for compensation must ensure that "what is determined as payable must be a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of", and that "subject to this basic limitation the Constitution allowed free play to the legislative judgment as to what principles should guide the determination of the amount payable." The Supreme Court also emphasized another point, viz., that the impugned Act was a permanent Act, and that under it lands may be acquired many years after it came into force, and many years after the freezing of the market value on a particular date. Both these important considerations are, as we shall presently show, applicable to the enactment impugned before us. As regards the fixation of the date, the Supreme Court observed in the case referred to above:

"It would be impossible to hold that a law which authorises acquisition of land not for its true value, but for value frozen on some date anterior to the acquisition, on the assumption that all appreciation in its value since that date is attributable to purposes for which the State may use the land at some future date must be regarded as infringing the fundamental right."

Elaborating this, the learned Judge observed a little further in the judgment:

"But any principle for determination of compensation denying to the owner all increments in value between a fixed date and the date of issue of the notification under s. 4(1), prima facie, must be regarded as denying to him the true equivalent of the land which is expropriated and it is for the State to show that fixation of compensation on the market value on an anterior date does not amount to a violation of the constitutional guarantee. No materials have been placed by the State before this Court which would support any such case."

It will be noticed that the rule here stated is in less wide terms than the rule stated in Bela Banerjee's case. There, the Supreme Court did not advert to any possibility of the State providing anything otherwise if an arbitrary date was fixed by the Legislature but in Namasivaya's case, the Supreme Court has stated that fixation of an arbitrary date like this is to be regarded prima facie as denying to the citizen a true equivalent of the land which is expropriated. What is more, the last sentence in the passage quoted above indicates that the state could have shown that the fixation of compensation on the market value on an anterior date does not amount to a violation of the constitutional guarantee by reason of sufficient material before the Court. In Bela Banerjee's case, no doubt the Chief Justice Patanjali Shastri did give an illustration of a possible exception in the second sentence of the passage from his judgment, which we have already quoted, and presumably the principle as stated in Namasivaya's case is based upon that illustration.

The principles that these cases lay down, therefore, are well settled and clear. These principles as they appear to us on an analysis of these decisions are as follows:—

1. In all cases governed by art. 31 prior to its amendment by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955, the compensation payable for acquisition of any land must be the just equivalent of what is being taken or the market value of the property on the date of acquisition. That in its turn means that a citizen, whose property has been taken, is entitled to a just indemnification for loss and for the appreciation in the market value of the land till the date of acquisition.

2. That where the law fixes a date for the assessment of compensation anterior to the date of acquisition and leaves the State free to acquire property at any time it chooses, then, prima facie, the law does not ensure a fair and just equivalent, and therefore in such a case, it is for the State to show that the legislation does nonetheless give a fair and just equivalent of the property to be taken.

3. That the mere use or non-use of the words "market value" or "fair or just compensation" in a legislation does not make it just or fair or vice versa but in every case the fair and just equivalent must be objectively established.

We turn then to apply these principles to the provisions of s. 8, and particularly to the provisions of sub-s. (3), cl. (b). It is quite clear that, so far as cl. (a) of sub-s. (3) is concerned, what is provided to be paid by that clause is the price which the requisitioned property would have fetched in the open market on the date of acquisition, as if the property had remained in the same condition as on the date on which it was requisitioned. There can be no quarrel with that principle. It clearly gives the compensation on the basis of a fair market value or the "just equivalent". That is precisely what the authorities show should be given under art. 31. But cl. (a) is followed by cl. (b), and the two clauses are connected by the word "or"; and cl. (b) provides an alternative principle for payment of compensation viz., twice the market price on the date of requisition. Now, it is quite clear that though a date is prescribed in cl. (b), it is not a date with reference to acquisition, and there appears no particular reason in fastening upon the date of requisition as the date on which to freeze the compensation payable.

We have already referred to the provisions of ss. 4 and 5 of the Act. The only effect of requisitioning is that the State or its officers can take possession of the property and use it for the public purposes for which it was acquired, but the property actually vests in the State not by virtue of its requisitioning, but by virtue of its acquisition, that is, by the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 7. Therefore, although the requisitioning only goes to justify the taking possession of the property, its ownership still remains with the party from whom it is requisitioned until the notification is issued, stating that it is being acquired. It is from the date of that notification that the property vests in the State. If then the true principle is that the citizen from whom the property is being taken is entitled to compensation which is the just and fair equivalent of what is being taken from him on the date of acquisition, we can see no point in arbitrarily fixing the date of requisition as the date for the purpose of assessing the compensation. That would be, in our opinion, as arbitrary as if the actual date had been fixed. Since requisitioning does not result in the property vesting in Government and the property vests only on the date of acquisition, it is with reference to that date that compensation must be provided. Thus, the provision of cl. (b) of sub-s. (3), which awards compensation on the date of requisition is, in our opinion, arbitrary, and prima facie, indicates that the law is not awarding a just and fair compensation thereby. The arbitrariness lies in this that it all depends upon the whim of the particular officer requisitioning the property and fixing a date for requisitioning, while the actual taking or acquisition of the property would be later on a date which is wholly uncertain.

But the matter becomes much worse when we turn to consider the impact of the total provisions of the entire sub-s. (3) of s. 8. As we have shown, cl. (a) gives a fair market price on the date of acquisition, but cl. (b) gives twice the price on the date of requisition. We presume that by these clauses it was intended to provide a fair equivalent of the property to a citizen whose property is acquired, and indeed that was the contention of Mr. Advani on behalf of the State. If then both the cls. (a) and (b) give what the Legislature consider a fair or just equivalent of the property which is being taken, then we can see no point whatsoever in the law providing further that of the two alternative principles of assessment indicated in the sub-section that compensation is to be paid to the citizen "whichever is less". The very fact that as between two alternative modes of assessment of compensation that mode is to be preferred by the law which results in the lesser payment being made to the citizen, shows clearly, in our opinion, that the fair or just equivalent of the property is not being paid to the citizen. This is the second ground on which the provisions of s. 8(3)(b) would be rendered unconstitutional under art. 31(2).

We may here emphasise that in the case before the Supreme Court in M/s. West Ramnad Electric Distribution Co. Ltd. the provision of the Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings (Acquisition) Act, was the exact reverse. There, of the three alternatives provided as the bases on which compensation was to be assessed, it was the citizen who was given the option to accept the basis which he preferred; whereas here the legislation has itself provided that as between the two standards of computation of compensation, that standard is to be preferred, which gives less to the citizen. It seems to us that nothing could be more eloquent than this that the just or fair equivalent is not being paid to the citizen when of two alternatives that alternative is to be preferred which gives less to the citizen. In that view, it seems to us clear that under art. 31(2) read in the light of the authorities to which we have referred, cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 must be declared to be ultra vires of art. 31 of the Constitution.

Nothing moreover turns upon the fact that this Act is only put into force for a limited period, that is to say, up to March 14, 1970. In so far as the constitutional guarantee given by art. 31 is being infringed by the law, it is immaterial that it results in any infringement only up to a limited time and not for ever; and the offending clause would all the same be ultra vires. Where acquisition takes place the citizen loses his property or property right for all time and it profits him little to know that the Act is of temporary duration.

Realising these difficulties, Mr. Advani on behalf of the respondents, sought to steer clear of all the constitutional objections by seeking to give to the section an interpretation, which, if accepted, would obviate all the said constitutional objections. The argument is based upon the provisions of s. 8(1)(e). We have already shown that sub-s. (1) of s. 8 begins with the preamble that it is enacting the manner in which and the principles in accordance with which the compensation will be determined, and in cl. (e) of sub-s. (1), the arbitrator, assessing the compensation, is enjoined to determine "the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just." Then follow the words: "and in making the award, he shall have regard to the circumstances of each case and the provisions of sub-section (2) and (3), so far as they are applicable." What Mr. Advani says is that the opening words of cl. (e): "the arbitrator shall.... make an award determining the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just...." are the key words which govern all subsequent principles laid down in the rest of the provisions of s. 8. He, therefore, urges that there is a clear direction to the arbitrator that he must award the amount of compensation which is just, and if that be so, then every requirement of art. 31 as also all the conditions indicated by the authorities, to which we have referred, are fulfilled, and it is immaterial, therefore, if subs. (3) provides for some other mode of evaluating the compensation. When this argument was advanced, Mr. Sorabjee, on behalf of the petitioner, pointed out that if this is the stand which the State wishes to take and if it is prepared to concede that position, then the petitioner would have nothing more to say and would consider withdrawing the petition, for, he urged, the substance of the grievance which brought the petitioner to the Court would be met by the concession. He says that if the State were to say that that compensation will be determined which is just, in spite of the other provisions of s. 8, and the arbitrator would act upon that principle, he would accept the compensation so determined. Mr. Advani on behalf of the State was not prepared to state it as a concession but he stated that he was merely urging it as legal argument on the basis of the statute before the Court, and that he on his part would leave it to the Court to determine what is its true construction. In that view of the matter, it seems to us that we must consider the construction put forward as a matter of argument by Mr. Advani.

An analysis of cl. (e) shows that it refers to three things—(1) firstly, the amount of compensation which appears to the arbitrator to be just; (2) secondly, the circumstances of each case, and (3) thirdly, the provisions of sub-s. (2) and (3). In the first sub-clause of cl. (e), the arbitrator is directed to determine the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just; but, in the second sub-clause, he is not merely directed, but enjoined that in making the award (1) "he shall have regard to the circumstances of each case", and (2) that he shall have regard to the "provisions of sub-sections (2) and (3)". We do not think that the language of cl. (e) at all indicates that one or other of these three conditions is overriding, governs or controls the others. On the other hand, the clause appears to be dealing with these three concepts in equal terms. The effect of this clause, therefore, is, firstly, that the arbitrator must determine the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just, but in making his award he must have regard to the circumstances of each case and to sub-ss. (2) and (3).

We have already referred to the provisions of sub-s. (3), and to its alternative clauses. Considering sub-s. (3) in the light of the provisions of cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 8, it is clear that the arbitrator, though enjoined to determine the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just, cannot act outside the scope of sub-s. (3). If he has to have regard to sub-s. (3)(b) as sub-s. (1)(e) directs him to do it, he must award to the person whose property has been acquired, twice the price on the date of requisition, and within the principle of Bela Banerjee's case, that is prima facie not just compensation. Therefore, though cl. (e) directs him to be just, in awarding compensation, in following sub-s. (3)(b), he cannot but be unjust.

The contention of Mr. Advani that the opening words of s. 8(1)(e) "determining the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just" are plenary and govern the rest of the provisions of s. 8 fails if we consider the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 8. It is clear that cl. (e) refers to sub-s. (2) in the same breath as sub-s. (3). Clause (b) of sub-s. (2) says that the amount of compensation payable for the requisitioning of any property shall consist of such sum or sums, if any, as may be found necessary to compensate the person interested for all or any of the following matters, and then follow the four clauses which provide, inter alia, for (1) pecuniary loss due to requisitioning; (2) expenses on account of vacating the requisitioned premises; (3) expenses on account of re-occupying the premises upon the release from requisition, and (4) damages, and other normal wear and tear. Now, cl. (b) of sub-s. (2) in terms says that such sum or sums of money shall be awarded as may be found necessary to compensate a person interested for all or any of the following matters etc. We cannot understand how, if the opening words of cl. (e): "determine the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just" are plenary and all pervasive, the Land Acquisition Officer can award only such sum or sums of money as may be found necessary for the four matters specially stated. There is a vast difference between finding out a sum which is just and finding out a sum which is necessary to compensate for our stated items only. Thus, the provisions of sub-s. (2) clearly show that the injunction in cl. (e) to find out the just compensation, cannot possibly control sub-s. (2). On the other hand, sub-s. (2) controls sub-s. (1)(e), just as we have shown that sub-s. (3) controls sub-s. (1)(e). We have referred to the provisions of sub-s. (2) only in order to indicate a point of construction. We are not concerned with them as such here. It seems to us that cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) cannot control the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 also. No doubt, sub-s. (3) is referred to in cl. (e), but it is referred to in cl. (e) only in order to indicate that in his duty to award just compensation one of the matters which the arbitrator shall have regard to is the provision of law in sub-s. (3). The other matter he shall have regard to is the circumstances of each case. We have already shown that the provisions of cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) are such that they cannot possibly result in the assessment of just compensation. The construction, therefore, for which Mr. Advani contends cannot be accepted.

In order to reinforce the argument, reference was made to the words in cl. (e) "shall have regard to". Mr. Sorabjee on behalf of the petitioners urged that the words meant "shall not disregard", whereas Mr. Advani said that it simply implies that he must be guided by those principles, but is not bound by them. He referred in this respect to two decisions—one of this Court in *Bai Dahi v. Ghanashyam*⁹ and another of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Ryots of Garabandho v. Zemindar of Parlakimedi.¹⁰ We accept it that the true construction is as indicated by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Garabandho's case at pages 169-170. At page 170, their Lordships said:

"...The expression 'have regard to', or expressions very close to this, are scattered throughout this Act, but the exact force of each phrase must be considered in relation to its context and to its own subject-matter. Any general interpretation of such a phrase is dangerous and unnecessary, but it is fairly clear, as a matter of English, that the view taken by the majority of the Collective Board is nearer to the ordinary meaning of the phrase 'have regard to', when it appears in a statute, than is that of the dissentient member."

In that case, their Lordships held that the words occurring in the statute before them meant that the authority was only "to be guided by" those provisions. Their Lordships have themselves indicated that the exact force of each phrase "must be considered in relation to its context and to its own subject-matter." We do not think that the enactment before us, namely, the Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act, is in any sense in pari materia with the Act before the Privy Council in Garabandho case. That was an Act providing for the enhancement of rent fixed by a settlement, whereas, the present Act is an Act providing for compensation payable for property acquired, which property is protected by the constitutional guarantee of a fundamental right. We have no doubt here that the word "shall" in the expression "shall have regard to" shows that the arbitrator cannot in any case disregard sub-ss. (2) and (3). But even assuming that we are wrong and that the words "shall have regard to" occurring in cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 8 mean that "the arbitrator shall be guided by," still it is clear that he has to be guided by the circumstances of each case and by the provisions of sub-ss. (2) and (3) as much as by the principles of determining the amount of compensation which is to be just, and this in itself would result in inequity in the award of compensation for if sub-s. (3)(b) results in the award of compensation which is not just being "guided by", it will have the same result. There is also another consideration which we may here emphasise: where the arbitrator is enjoined to fix the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just, the whole clause is also preceded by the word "shall". The composite expression used (shorn of inapplicable verbiage) is "shall...make an award determining the amount of compensation which appears to him to be just". Upon the argument advanced on behalf of the State, the word "shall" in this clause indicates a mandate which cannot be disobeyed. Any other argument would destroy their case that just compensation is compulsorily to be given. If so, is it to be supposed that the word "shall" in the subsequent expression "shall have regard to" occurring in the same sub-section imports only a direction which may or may not be obeyed? and that it really means "may". We cannot accept such a construction. We have already said that the provisions of sub-s. (3)(b) must result in the award of some compensation which is not just upon the meaning given to it by the Supreme Court. If so, making use of sub-s. (3)(b) in any particular case must result in compensation which is not just. Now if the expression "shall have regard to" means as is contended "may be guided by", then, having regard to its vitiating tendency which we have pointed out, it must always be disregarded, otherwise the award of just compensation is not possible. That would render the provisions of sub-s. (3)(b) nugatory. Such a construction, therefore, cannot be placed.

At any rate, if sub-s. (3) is to be a guiding principle for the arbitrator in assessing the compensation, then, having regard to the provisions of cl. (b) thereof, it is clear that the arbitrator will have to take it into consideration, at least, and the moment he takes it into consideration, we think that he cannot but reach a conclusion where the compensation which he awards will not be the just equivalent of the property acquired.

In answer to this point as to the construction of sub-s. (3) read with cl. (e) of sub-s. (1), Mr. Sorabjee referred to the opening words of sub-s. (1) and he pointed out that the opening words in terms say that they are providing for two matters—(1) the manner in which the amount of compensation shall be determined, and (2) the principles in accordance with which the compensation shall be determined. He says that the perusal of the remaining provisions of s. 8 indicate that sub-s. (1) in substance deals only with the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and it is only the provisions of sub-ss. (2) and (3) which deal with the principles in accordance with which the compensation shall be determined. In other words, the counsel argues that there is no principle involved in sub-s. (1) at all. It only deals with the manner of determination of compensation, and, therefore, any provision of that sub-section can have no effect so far as the principles laid down in sub-s. (3) are concerned.

Curiously enough, the opening words of sub-s. (1), upon which reliance has been placed, give no indication as to what subsequent portions of the section each of its clauses refers to. It rather seems to us on a perusal of the sub-section as a whole that the draftsman made several provisions both of procedure and principle, and did not incorporate them disjunctively or separately in different clauses of sub-sections. It seems to us that he relegated the principles of payment of compensation for requisitioning to sub-s. (2) and the principles for the payment of compensation for acquisition to sub-s. (3), but because of those provisions we cannot hold that he did not state any principles in sub-s. (1) at all. On the other hand, the provision in cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) enjoining on the arbitrator to determine the amount of compensation which appears to be just, could well be said to be a principle, and so too the direction to the arbitrator that he shall have regard to the circumstances of each case as well as the direction that he will have regard to sub-ss. (2) and (3). We cannot say that that clause, therefore, is not concerned with any principle at all. If it was the intention of the Legislature that sub-s. (1) was only a sub-section dealing with the manner of determining the compensation, then, nothing could have been easier than to say in the opening words of sub-s. (1) "there shall be paid compensation, the amount of which shall be determined in the manner prescribed in sub-section (1) and in accordance with the principles prescribed in sub-sections (2) and (3)." But that clear-cut demarcation was not possible for the reason that the draftsman realised that some principle is intermingled with the provisions as to the manner in which the compensation shall be determined, and therefore, he generally stated in the opening words of sub-s. (1) the provisions both regarding the "manner" as well as regarding the "principles". What the counsel urged is no doubt true so far as the other clauses of sub-s. (1) of s. 8 are concerned, but not so far as cl. (e) is concerned.

There then remain to be considered two other short points which were raised on behalf of the respondents. It was urged that the petitioner has come to the Court prematurely, since the arbitrator has not even proceeded to consider the claim to compensation, or the objection to the valuation by the State. It was argued that the petitioner could only come when compensation was assessed in accordance with certain principles and she had a grievance against some definite amount assessed. It was urged that she may get the compensation which she asks for, in which case there would be no likelihood to approach this Court. A shade of the same argument is that so far as the constitutional objection is concerned, the unconstitutionality, which is being pointed out upon the provisions of s. 8 (3) (b), arises because cl. (b) gives a compensation which may be different from the figure of compensation arrived at under cl. (a). But it was urged that it may be possible that the actual amount arrived at, whether under cl. (a) or under cl. (b), would be the same, in which case, the constitutional objection would fail.

We do not think that where the question involved is as to the constitutionality of a provision of law, we can have regard to any particular case or make it dependent upon the determination of the amount of compensation. It is clear that even if the amount was the same as is to be found under sub-cl. (a) if it is given on the basis that it is twice the price on the date of requisition, it would all the same infringe art. 31 of the Constitution. We do not think that simply because no actual assessment has been made by the arbitrator, a constitutional objection of this kind cannot be sustained in limine, when the aggrieved party approached this Court under art. 226.

The other objection is as to the delay in approaching this Court. It was urged that the petition is filed after inordinate delay. The original acquisition was made on December 29, 1952, when the notification under s. 7 (2) was promulgated. So far as the compensation is concerned, it was urged, that the arbitrator was appointed on June 21, 1961, and when pursuant to the provisions of s. 7, the arbitrator was appointed for the purpose of assessment of compensation, whatever constitutional objection the petitioner had, arose, and therefore, she should not have waited till September 18, 1962, to file the present petition. This argument is the very reverse of the argument which we have just disposed of. There the objection was that the petition was premature, here the objection is that it is delayed. It seems to us that where a constitutional objection of this kind to the validity of a legislation is in question, what is involved is infringement of a fundamental right under the Constitution. In such a case, question of mere delay would hardly affect the maintainability of the petition, for, whether we consider the infringement of a fundamental right or consider the question of ultra vires, the objection is fundamental and omnipresent. It must be met and negatived or it remains at all future stages of a proceeding. It must be met at any subsequent stage of the litigation between the parties. In that view, we do not think that delay as such would be a good ground to defeat a constitutional objection of that kind.

Moreover, in the circumstances of the present case, we do not think that there has been in fact any delay. On behalf of the petitioner, it has been explained that the ground upon which the constitutional challenge arose was disclosed only when the respondents filed their statement before the arbitrator in reply to the petitioner's claim for compensation. That was on July 2, 1962. It was only when the Collector valued the compensation, and on behalf of respondent No. 3 it was offered to the petitioner at the rate of Rs. 11 per sq. yard, and the petitioner knew the basis upon which that valuation was made, that she realised that it was being valued contrary to the principles of art. 31. If July 2, 1962 is the date on which the constitutional objection arose from which to approach this Court, the petition filed on September 18, 1962, can hardly be said to be delayed. In any case, having regard to the importance of the points raised, and assuming that there was any delay, we would certainly condone the delay.

For the reasons given, therefore, we allow the petition and make the rule absolute. We hold that cl. (b) including the words "whichever is less" of sub-s. (3) of s. 8 of the Requisitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act, 1952 (XXX of 1952) is ultra vires of art. 31 of the Constitution, and is, therefore, void. The assessment of compensation will, therefore, have to be made subject to this declaration.

The petitioner will be entitled to her costs from the respondents. We quantify these costs at Rs. 500.

Petition allowed. Rule made absolute.

Sub-clause (2) of s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, added by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, which includes certain purposes within the definition of public purpose are within the connotation of that expression in art. 31 of the Constitution of India.

Section 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, read with s. 3(f)(2) of the Act as amended by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, does not infringe art. 14 of the Constitution of India.

A discretion given under a law, however wide it may be, cannot necessarily be equated with discrimination, and in so far as there is a possibility of the misuse of a discretion the normal presumption of law is that the authority invested with a discretionary power will act fairly and honestly and not abuse it. If it does however abuse it in a given case, that is an indication of human frailty rather than the power being discriminatory.

The definition of "public purpose" in s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, as amended by the inclusion of cl. (2) therein by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, is intra vires of art. 31 of the Constitution of India as well as s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act.

The question whether there is a public purpose or not does not fall to be considered merely upon the recitals of the particular notification impugned, but must be gathered from the facts and circumstances before the Court.

When moneys are advanced by the State to a Corporation for the payment of compensation for lands acquired by the Corporation, the compensation to be awarded cannot be said to be paid "wholly or partly out of public revenues" within the meaning of that expression in the proviso to s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.

The conditions in s. 17(1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, namely (1) the existence of urgency, (2) a direction from the appropriate Government or Commissioner, (3) waste or arable land, (4) need for a public purpose and (5) need for a company, are all conditions prescribed for the exercise of the power or jurisdiction of the Collector to take the citizens' property under those provisions. Upon the non-fulfilment or non-existence of any one of those conditions the exercise of the power must be interdicted. The conditions must be strictly fulfilled and are not left to the subjective satisfaction or opinion of the authority concerned.

Agricultural land cannot be said to be arable land within the meaning of s. 17(1) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.

In considering whether any land is "waste or arable" it is the nature of the land and its substantive use that one must have regard to and not what it is formally dubbed in archaic revenue records.

KOTVAL J. In this Special Civil Application there are challenged two Notifications under the Land Acquisition Act whereby the land of the petitioner has been taken by the State of Maharashtra, respondent No. 3 before us. On January 24, 1963, a Notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, was issued under the signature of the Commissioner of Bombay Division, respondent No. 1 before us. Since almost every paragraph of this Notification has given rise to one or more of the points argued before us it is worthwhile to reproduce the whole of this Notification. It runs as follows:—

"No. LAQ-B. 7244-B. Whereas it appears to the Commissioner, Bombay Division, that the lands specified in the Schedule hereto (hereinafter referred to as the said lands) are needed for a public purpose viz. for development and utilisation of lands as an industrial area.

It is hereby notified under the provisions of section 4 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 (I of 1894), that the said lands are needed for the public purpose specified above.

All persons interested in the said lands are hereby warned not to obstruct or interfere with any surveyors or other persons employed upon the said lands for the purpose of the said acquisition. Any contracts for the disposal of the said lands by sale, lease, mortgage, assignment, exchange or otherwise, or any outlay or improvements made therein, without the sanction of the Collector, after the date of this notification, will, under section 24 (seventhly) of the said Act, be disregarded by the Officer assessing compensation for such parts of the said lands as may be finally acquired.

And whereas the Commissioner, Bombay Division, is of the opinion that the said lands are waste or arable lands and that their acquisition is urgently necessary; he is further pleased to direct under sub-section (4) of section 17 of the said Act, that the provisions of section 5-A of the said Act, shall not apply in respect of the said lands.

Under clause (c) of section 3 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, the Commissioner, Bombay Division, is pleased to appoint the Special Land Acquisition Officer, Ulhas Valley Project, Thana, to perform the functions of a Collector under section 4(1) of the said Act, in respect of the said lands.

Schedule.

District Thana, Taluka Thana, village Pachpakhadi.

Block No.	Survey No.	Hissa No.	Approximate area of the lands required. A. G. a.

It will be clear from this Notification that a plot of land admeasuring 7 acres and 32 gunthas belonging to the petitioner was sought to be acquired for a public purpose. The declaration in the Notification under s. 6 is "for development and utilization of lands as an industrial area". One of the several points that have been raised in this petition is that this does not constitute a public purpose and, therefore, the Notification is bad. In the Notification under s. 4 the Commissioner has stated that those lands were in his opinion waste or arable lands and their acquisition was urgently necessary. They were, therefore, taken without recourse to the provisions of s. 5A of the said Act. This dispensation of the provisions of s. 5A of the Act was by virtue of sub-s. (4) of s. 17 of the Act. The Notification under s. 4 was followed by a Notification under s. 6 on March 28, 1963. Since the Notification under s. 4 had dispensed with the intermediate procedure provided by s. 5A, Notification under s. 6 was issued without reference to that section. In the Notification under s. 6 the "public purpose" is specified in the Schedule as "for the development and utilisation of lands as an industrial area".

On April 30, 1963, the Special Land Acquisition Officer, Ulhas Valley Project, served a Notice on the petitioner under s. 4 of the Act. That notice was actually dated April 19, 1963, but was served upon the petitioner on April 30, 1963. It was followed by a notice to hand over possession on May 6, 1963, because of the application of s. 17(4). It was the petitioner's case that this notice, though dated April 19, 1963, and calling upon him to attend at the time of taking possession i.e. at 12 noon on May 6, 1963, was actually served on him on May 7, 1963, after possession was taken. On April 30, 1963, a further notice was served upon the petitioner by the Special Land Acquisition Officer, respondent No. 2, to appear before him on May 15, 1963, and to lodge his claim for compensation. In the meanwhile, pursuant to the notice dated April 19, 1963, informing the petitioner that possession of the land would be taken on May 6, 1963, the petitioner's land was taken possession of on May 6, 1963. It is also admitted that on the same day possession was handed over by the State to respondent No. 4, the Maharashtra State Industrial Development Corporation. All this was pointed out in a letter dated May 14, 1963, written by the petitioner's attorneys complaining that the acquisition was illegal. The present petition was filed on June 12, 1963.

Now it is the petitioner's case that the Notifications under ss. 4, 6 and 9 of the Land Acquisition Act are illegal for several reasons and that, therefore, the acquisition of the petitioner's land is also illegal. The grounds, briefly stated are as follows:—That the notifications purport to have been signed by and issued under the authority of respondent No. 1 Mr. J. H. Patwardhan, Commissioner of Bombay Division. Mr. Patwardhan purported to sign these Notifications by virtue of the authority conferred on him by an Amendment made in the Land Acquisition Act by a Notification issued by the State Government under s. 3(4) of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act VIII of 1958. It has been argued before us that the power thus delegated to the Commissioner is improperly delegated and that the State Legislature which conferred the power by virtue of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act, upon the State Government to amend by Notification the Land Acquisition Act did not make a valid delegation of its legislative power to the State Government.

Next it has been objected by the petitioner that on the merits the Notifications are bad, because they do not comply with the requirements of the Land Acquisition Act, particularly ss. 4 and 6 thereof which prescribe as an essential condition to the exercise of the power conferred by them that there must be a "public purpose". The petitioner says that the Notifications do not disclose on the face of them any "public purpose" at all, but assuming that a purpose is there it does not amount to a public purpose as interpreted by several authorities. Even having regard to the definition in the Land Acquisition Act contained in s. 3(f)(2) as locally amended there does not appear any public purpose upon the Notifications, and so the acquisition is bad. The further challenge was that the definition of "public purpose" in s. 3(f)(2) which was amended so far as the State of Maharashtra is concerned by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1953, is no "public purpose" as understood upon the authorities and in any case, the Bombay Amendment is illegal and void under arts. 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution. Ipsa facto the Notifications issued pursuant to the powers given by the new definition would also be illegal.

An alternative objection against the three Notifications has been taken that in fact and in substance the acquisition in the present case is not at all an acquisition for a public purpose, but that having regard to the circumstances it was an acquisition for a Company viz. the Maharashtra State Industrial Development Corporation. As a result, it has been urged that two consequences follow, firstly, that the Notifications issued under ss. 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act declaring that the land is required for a public purpose are a mere colourable exercise of the power granted under these sections and, secondly, that the procedure followed for the acquisitions is vitiated. The correct procedure which ought to have been followed is that prescribed in Part VII of the said Act which deals with acquisitions for Companies or Chapter VI of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Act which deals with acquisition for that Corporation.

Next attack was levelled against what has been concisely dubbed the "urgency" clause in the three Notifications whereby respondent No. 1 announced his intention to take the petitioner's lands because they were "waste or arable" lands and their acquisition was "urgently necessary" under the powers vested in him under sub-s. (4) of s. 17 of the Act. By virtue of that sub-section respondent No. 1 dispensed with the provisions of s. 5A of the Land Acquisition Act and declared that it shall not apply to the said land. It is the petitioner's case that thereby he was deprived of a very valuable right viz. the right to take objection and try to persuade the authorities that there was no "public purpose" involved or that the land was not needed or likely to be needed for a contemplated public purpose. The petitioner says that the urgency clause has, therefore, been wrongly applied on the ground that the petitioner's lands were neither "waste" nor "arable" lands and unless they were lands falling within those categories, s. 17(1) would be inapplicable. In reply to this point on behalf of the State it was argued that the question whether they are waste or arable lands under s. 17(1) is a matter to be decided in the opinion of the authority concerned and that the Courts are precluded from considering on what basis such an opinion was formed.

It may be noted here that of the above pleas, which we have stated in brief, the Constitutional objections were not in the petition as originally filed but by an amendment permitted by this Court they were allowed to be incorporated as part of the petition. Similarly, the objection that the powers under s. 17(4) read with s. 5A of the Land Acquisition Act were wrongly exercised, was also incorporated by way of amendment. The petitioner originally relied upon the Notifications which are impugned in this petition and upon the document of sale in his favour dated September 17, 1960, (exh. A to the petition) to show his ownership. But later considerable developments took place, which it was said was a test case.

In reply to the original petition respondent No. 1 the Commissioner of Bombay Division, filed a return on November 4, 1963, and followed it up by a supplemental return on April 23, 1964, in order to meet the amendments in the petition. In this return respondent No. 1 affirmed that in all the Notifications issued by him and impugned in the petition, there was a public purpose involved and that in any event the question whether there was a public purpose or not, was not open to be raised by the petitioner because of the provisions of s. 6(3) which makes the declaration of the public purpose conclusive evidence that the land sought to be acquired was needed for the public purpose declared therein. In elaboration of this plea it was urged in the arguments before us that the Court is precluded from inquiring whether in fact there exists a public purpose or not. The respondent traversed the various Constitutional grounds and urged that neither the Notifications nor the provisions of s. 3(f)(2) as amended were liable to be set aside on the ground of unconstitutionality. The Commissioner also pointed out that he had issued the Notification under s. 4 after he had satisfied himself that the said lands were acquired for the purpose of "developing and utilising the same as an industrial area" and he asserted

"I say that as the said lands were waste or arable lands and as their acquisition was urgently necessary I directed that the provisions of section 5A of the Land Acquisition Act would not apply to the said acquisition."
He added that he was satisfied that the said lands were needed for the aforesaid public purpose before he issued the declaration under s. 6 and that he had similarly satisfied himself as to the requirements of s. 9(1) when he issued the Notification under that section.

In order to meet the point taken by the petitioner that the acquisition was for a Company, viz. the Maharashtra State Industrial Development Corporation, the Commissioner stated in para. 10 of his return,

"I say that the said land is to be acquired from the funds of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation which is a Government of Maharashtra Undertaking financed by the State Government from public funds and are intended to be developed from the said funds and to be subsequently dealt with by lease or sale in order to develop the said area as an industrial area".

We have reproduced this part of the pleading of the Commissioner here because it was the subject of most of the affidavits subsequently filed by way of amendment or elucidation. The amendment of respondent No. 1's pleading resulted in the petitioner asking a number of particulars and being furnished with replies to those particulars and in the filing of a number of documents to prove whether the original statement was correct or otherwise. In subsequent affidavits filed by certain officers of the State, the said statement of the Commissioner has been dubbed as incorrect and further averments made which are contrary to the statement quoted above.

The Commissioner further stated that the object of acquiring lands for and developing industrial areas was to procure orderly and planned development of industries in and around Greater Bombay and elsewhere in the State and that such development was necessary not merely "to encourage and remove the growth of industry but also in order to avoid future concentration of industry and to ameliorate (sic) the consequence of concentration of industry which has occurred in the past".

He alleged that the

"concentration led to congestion and consequently to bad conditions of housing, educational and medical facilities etc. and that by laying out areas in a deliberately planned manner for development as an industrial area and by ensuring a proper development of such areas with space reserved for social services, recreational facilities etc. all the disadvantages of haphazard and unplanned development" would be avoided for the future.

In order to meet the plea taken by the petitioner that the lands were not waste or arable lands and, therefore, s. 17(4) read with s. 5A was not attracted, the Commissioner re-asserted that the lands were waste or arable and further stated in para. 13

"With reference to ground (d) contained in the said Paragraph (para. 8) I say that the said lands are agricultural lands described as such in the Record of Rights. I say that the said lands are being assessed to land revenue as agricultural lands. I say that the said lands are waste or arable lands within the meaning of Section 17 of the Land Acquisition Act. I am not aware of and do not admit the allegations that the petitioner's land was fit for immediate use for non-agricultural industrial or building purposes or that the land had been surveyed or that plans had been prepared for construction thereon before the issue of the impugned Notifications".

He also asserted in answer to the point raised by the petitioner that he had satisfied himself after fully considering all the facts that the said lands were urgently required for development as an industrial area. On the question of delegation of authority to the Commissioner, he stated that the delegation was proper and legal and that he himself acted under the powers thus delegated to him by s. 3(4) of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act, 1957, and the Government Notification No. LAQ-2558/V dated September 5, 1958. The second affidavit which the Commissioner filed merely negatived all the pleas as to the unconstitutionality of the notifications as well as s. 3(f)(2), of the Land Acquisition Act as locally amended.

Matters stood at this, when on June 24, 1964, an affidavit came to be filed by an Under-Secretary in the Industries and Labour Department of the Government of Maharashtra, Mr. Hanumant Shrinivas Nargund. That affidavit purports on the face of it to have been filed "in order to correct a mis-statement of fact occurring in the said affidavit filed in Court on 15-11-1963 sworn by the same Mr. Patwardhan". In para. 3 of his affidavit Mr. Nargund stated:

"In paragraph 10 of the said affidavit dated 4th October, 1963 (the date it is admitted is wrongly stated. It should be the affidavit filed on 15-11-1963), it has been stated 'the said land is to be acquired from the funds of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation'. I say that the said statement is incorrect and was made under a misapprehension of the true facts. I say that the said lands are being acquired by the State Government for the development of the lands as an industrial area and the compensation payable for the said lands was intended to be paid and is to be paid from public revenue out of the consolidated fund of the State of Maharashtra and the necessary provision therefor has been made in the Annual Budget Estimates of the Industries and Labour Department of the State Government".

Mr. Nargund further alleged that

"the sanctioned amount will be paid by the Government to the Special Land Acquisition Officer concerned for payment of compensation according to his Award to the interested persons".

Mr. Nargund also raised a point in para. 4 of this affidavit that after the acquisition of the said lands and their vesting in the State Government they would be placed at the disposal of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation as provided in s. 40 of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Act, 1961. Along with this affidavit Mr. Nargund filed copies of extracts from the detailed estimates from the Budget for the year 1964-65. This affidavit filed by the Under-Secretary set in motion a process which accounts for the bulk of the pleadings in this petition. It resulted in several affidavits being filed by the petitioner to counter the new stand taken and as we have said, in further affidavits being filed by various officers of the State and the M.I.D.C. and in the filing of a large number of documents by both the parties. It will be noticed that the stand taken in the affidavit of Mr. Nargund is in direct conflict with that taken by Mr. Patwardhan in his first affidavit. We shall deal with the remaining affidavits, when we deal with the question raised upon the documents.

Before we proceed, therefore, to discuss the several points raised, it is necessary to say a word about the local amendments that have been effected in the Land Acquisition Act. The provisions of the Land Acquisition Act have been several times amended by local legislation. We are concerned in this petition with two such amendments. The first is the amendment made by Act XXXV of 1953 in the definition of "public purpose" contained in sub-s. (f) of s. 3 of the Land Acquisition Act. The definition as it stands after amendment is as follows:—

"(f) the expression 'public purpose' includes

(1) the provision of village sites in districts in which the (appropriate) Government shall have declared by notification in the Official Gazette that it is customary for the Government to make such provision (and a housing scheme as defined in the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1948); and

(2) the acquisition of land for purposes of the development of areas from public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority and subsequent disposal thereof in whole or in part by lease, assignment, or sale, with the object of securing further development".

In this definition the word "Appropriate" before the word "Government" was added by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950, and the following words in sub-cl. (1) of cl. (f) were added by the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1948 (Act IV of 1948):

"and a housing scheme as defined in the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1948".

The other amendment made was to add sub-cl. (2) to cl. (f) of s. 3 containing the definition of "public purpose" as follows:—

"(2) the acquisition of land for purposes of the development of areas from public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority and subsequent disposal thereof in whole or in part by lease, assignment, or sale, with the object of securing further development".

It is this definition of "public purpose" as amended by the Bombay Act that is the subject of attack on the ground of unconstitutionality and other grounds.

The other amendment made which is material for our purpose was, as we have in passing indicated by the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act, 1957, s. 3(4). That sub-section—we shall presently advert to its detailed provisions—gave power to the State Government to "confer and impose on the Commissioner powers and duties under any other enactment for the time being in force and for that purpose may, by a notification in the Official Gazette, add to or specify in the Schedule the necessary adaptations and modifications in the enactment to be amended" and it was provided that upon such notification being issued every such enactment shall accordingly be amended and have effect subject to the adaptations and modifications so made and the Schedule to the Act shall be deemed to be amended by the inclusion therein of the said provision for amending the enactment. It appears that pursuant to this power the State Government issued the notification already referred to in the affidavit of Mr. Patwardhan viz. Government Notification Revenue Department No. LAQ-2558/V dated September 5, 1958.

We may also at this stage refer to the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation and the law under which it was established.

The Maharashtra Industrial Development Act, 1961 (Act III of 1962) was brought into force on March 1, 1962. It applies to the whole of the State of Maharashtra but sub-s. (3) of s. 1 thereof provides that Chap. VI shall take effect in such area, from such date as the State Government may, from time to time, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint in that behalf. Accordingly, the State Government has from time to time actually applied Chap. VI to several areas under its jurisdiction, but it is conceded on both sides that Chap. VI has not been brought into force so far as the area in which the lands in dispute are situated. Therefore, for the purposes of this petition Chap. VI does not apply at all. The preamble of the Act recites that it is expedient to make special provision for securing the orderly establishment in industrial areas and industrial estates of industries in the State of Maharashtra, and to assist generally in the organisation thereof, and for that purpose to establish an Industrial Development Corporation, and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid. In sub-s. (g) of s. 2 "industrial area" has been defined to mean an industrial area so declared by the State Government in the Official Gazette, which is to be developed and where industries are to be accommodated. Section 3 deals with the establishment and incorporation of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation. Sub-section (2) says that the Corporation shall be a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal, and may sue and be sued in its corporate name, and shall be competent to acquire, hold and dispose of property, both moveable and immoveable, and to contract, and do all things necessary for the purposes of the Act. Section 4 provides for the constitution of the Corporation. A perusal of the several categories of its members will indicate that excepting three members to be nominated by Government on the ground of certain special experience or ability they are all officers under the State Government or connected with one or more Boards established by the State Government. The Chairman of the Corporation is to be appointed by the State Government and if it thinks fit a Vice-Chairman. The Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation is appointed under s. 12 also by the State Government though subordinate officers and servants are to be appointed by the Corporation under s. 12(2). Sub-section (1) of s. 13 provides that the Corporation shall take over and employ such of the existing staff serving for the purposes of the Board of Industrial Development constituted by Government Resolution in the Industries and Labour Department No. IDL. 2360/140755-IND-I, dated October 1, 1960, as the State Government may direct, and every person so taken over and employed shall be subject to the provisions of this Act and the rules and regulations made thereunder. Then follow the provisions for the terms of employment of these persons. Sub-section (3) of s. 13 provides that

"All obligations incurred, all contracts entered into and all matters and things engaged to be done, before the first constitution of the Corporation, by, with or for the State Government or the Board of Industrial Development aforesaid for any of the purposes of this Act, in respect of any schemes for the development of industrial estates or industrial areas entrusted to the Corporation, shall be deemed to have been incurred, entered into or engaged to be done by, with or for the Corporation" and the sub-section further provides for suits and other legal proceedings which may be continued or instituted only against the Corporation. Sub-section (4) of s. 13 is somewhat important, because of the stand taken that the expenditure for the acquisition in this case was really an expenditure of the Corporation. Sub-section (4) says:

"All expenditure which the Board of Industrial Development may have incurred before the date of the coming into force of this Act in connection with any of the purposes of this Act shall be deemed to be a loan advanced to the Corporation under section 21 on that date, and all assets acquired by such expenditure shall vest in the Corporation".

It is also not in dispute that the erstwhile Board of Industrial Development which was a Board set up by Government itself was replaced by the Corporation on August 1, 1962, by a Notification No. IDC-1062-IND-1 dated August 1, 1962, in the Official Gazette. Sections 14 and 15 indicate the functions of the Corporation and its powers. Section 14 mentions the functions as follows:—

"14. The functions of the Corporation shall be—

(i) generally to promote and assist in the rapid and orderly establishment, growth and development of industries in the State of Maharashtra, and

(ii) in particular, and without prejudice to the generality of clause (i), to—

(a) establish and manage industrial estates at places selected by the State Government;

(b) develop industrial areas selected by the State Government for the purpose and make them available for undertakings to establish themselves;

(c) assist financially by loans industries to move their factories into such estates or areas;

(d) undertake schemes or works, either jointly with other corporate bodies or institutions, or with Government or local authorities, or on an agency basis, in furtherance of the purposes for which the Corporation is established and all matters connected therewith".

Section 15 delineates its powers; principally the power to acquire and hold property and to dispose it of, to enter into agreement and take property on lease, to erect buildings and execute such other works as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out its duties and functions. Clause (j) of s. 15 gives power to the Corporation "to enter into and perform all such contracts as it may consider necessary or expedient for carrying out any of its functions". Section 18 lays down that the State Government may issue to the Corporation such general or special directions as of policy as it may think necessary or expedient for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of this Act, and the Corporation shall be bound to follow and act upon such directions.

Chapter IV deals with finance, accounts and audit and in this connection one point which was made in the arguments may be noted here, that the Corporation has to maintain its accounts not like any other company but in accordance with the public account rules, and they are to be audited by an auditor appointed by the State Government (s. 27(2)) in consultation with the Comptroller and Auditor General of India. These accounts moreover are to be laid before the House of the State Legislature annually (s. 27(4)). By virtue of s. 21 all moneys received by the Corporation from the State Government by way of grants, subventions, loans, advances or otherwise become part of the fund of the Corporation among other things. Chapter VI, which we have already said was not brought into force so far as the area which is the subject-matter of this petition is concerned, provides for acquisition and disposal of land. Having regard to this Chapter it is conceded that there is a special provision for acquisition of lands for this Corporation provided the Chapter is made applicable to the area in question.

In the affidavit made on behalf of the Commissioner a reference is to be found to s. 40 of the Act which gives power to the State Government upon such conditions as may be agreed upon between it and the Corporation to place at the disposal of the Corporation any lands vested in the State Government "for the furtherance of the objects of this Act" and that after such land has been developed by, or under the control and supervision of the Corporation, it shall be dealt with by the Corporation in accordance with the regulations made and directions given by the State Government. The affidavit averred that the petitioner's land would be dealt with under s. 40, but obviously in view of the fact that Chap. VI has not been brought into force in the area in which this land is situated, that reference is irrelevant. The miscellaneous and supplemental provisions contained in Chap. VII amply indicate that the State Government has a very rigid control over the Corporation and if it so decides can even dissolve the Corporation itself (vide s. 58) subject to it being satisfied that its purposes have been substantially achieved. Despite this provision in the Corporation Act there has been no dispute raised here that the Maharashtra Industrial Corporation is a "company". It was conceded that it would be a company having regard to the definition in s. 3(e) of the Land Acquisition Act as locally amended. The powers and functions of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation have a material bearing on the question whether the acquisition in the instant case was for a public purpose or for a company as stated in s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act.

The questions, therefore, which arise for determination in this Special Civil Application are broadly speaking as follows:—

(1) Whether the delegation of the State Government's power to acquire land particularly under ss. 4, 6, 9 and 17, to the Commissioner (respondent No. 1) by the local amendments effected by the Commissioners of Divisions Act, was in excess of the powers of the State Legislature and whether that delegation, which gives the State Government the power to bring into force any amendment of any Act by a notification is a valid delegation of authority; if not, what would be the consequence upon the Notifications issued in this case under ss. 4, 6 and 9 by respondent No. 1?

(2) Whether ss. 4 and 6 or any parts of those sections read with the amendment made in s. 3(f)(2) of the Land Acquisition Act of the definition of "public purpose" by the local amendment, infringe arts. 31, 14 or 19 of the Constitution and whether, therefore, the notifications under ss. 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act are bad?

(3) Whether the acquisition in the instant case is not for a "public purpose" in the context of s. 6(1) and more particularly its proviso?

(4) Whether the declaration in the notification under s. 6 of the existence of a public purpose is in the circumstances conclusive under s. 6(3) of the Land Acquisition Act?

(5) Whether the acquisition is for a company within the meaning of Part

VII of the Land Acquisition Act and if so whether the omission to follow the procedure laid down in that part would vitiate the acquisition proceedings?

(6) Whether the petitioner's lands were waste or arable lands and could be taken possession of without observance of the provisions of s. 5A? If they cannot be so taken what is the effect on the notification under s. 4.

(7) Whether the opinion of the authority under s. 17 would be merely a subjective opinion which the Court cannot scrutinise or whether it should be objectively proved that the requirements of s. 17(1) have been fulfilled?

We may first of all dispose of the objections to the notifications that the Commissioner could not promulgate them as he had no valid power. We have already indicated that the notifications under ss. 4, 6 and 9 were all signed by Mr. J.H. Patwardhan, the Commissioner of Bombay Division, who is respondent No. 1. The first of these two notifications also contains the necessary declaration under sub-s. (4) of s. 17 of the Act, dispensing with the provisions of s. 5A. In the Land Acquisition Act, as it originally stood, the power under each of the ss. 4, 6, 9 and 17 was only entrusted to the Local Government. After the Constitution by an amendment made by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950, instead of the word "local" the word "appropriate" was substituted. It was only the appropriate Government which could exercise all the relevant powers under the Act. A definition was added of the words "appropriate Government" in s. 3(ee) as follows:—

"The expression 'appropriate government' means, in relation to acquisition of land for the purpose of the Union, the Central Government, and, in relation to acquisition of land for any other purposes, the State Government".

Thus matters stood until by the local amendment the words "or the Commissioner" were added in s. 3(a), 4, 5A, 6, 9 and 17 after the words "appropriate Government". This amendment was made under somewhat peculiar circumstances which give rise to the argument that there has been an excess of delegation. The amendment to the Land Acquisition Act was not directly made by any Legislature. What was amended was a local Act, Act VIII of 1958, viz. the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act, 1957. This Act was already in force since 1958. It was brought into force in order to provide for the offices of the Commissioners of Divisions in the State of Bombay and prescribing their powers and duties and to make ancillary provisions consequent upon a policy decision to resuscitate the office of Divisional Commissioner which had been abolished soon after Independence. In this Act provision was made by the Bombay Legislature for the amendment of several Acts. Section 3, sub-ss. (1) and (4) provide as follows:—

"3. (1) For the purposes of constituting offices of Commissioners of divisions and conferring powers and imposing duties on Commissioners and for certain other purposes, the enactments specified in column 1 of the Schedule to this Act shall be amended in the manner and to the extent specified in column 2 thereof, and sub-s. (4) thereof is as follows:—

"The State Government may confer and impose on the Commissioner powers and duties under any other enactment for the time being in force and for that purpose may, by a notification in the Official Gazette, add to or specify in the Schedule the necessary adaptations and modifications in that enactment by way of amendment; and thereupon—

(a) every such enactment shall accordingly be amended and have effect subject to the adaptations and modifications so made, and

(b) the schedule to this Act shall be deemed to be amended by the inclusion therein of the said provision for amending the enactment".

It may be noticed at the outset that the Land Acquisition Act was not one of the Acts mentioned in the Schedule and the amendment of that Act could, therefore, be made only under sub-s. (4) of s. 3 of the Commissioners of Divisions Act which says that "the State Government may confer and impose on the Commissioner powers and duties under any other enactment for the time being in force..."

Purporting to act under these powers the State Government issued a notification on September 5, 1958, Notification No. G.N.R.D. No. LAQ-2558/V dated September 5, 1958, inserting the words "or the Commissioner" in the said sections of the Land Acquisition Act in the then State of Bombay excluding the transferred territories under the Reorganisation of States Act. By virtue of sub-s. (4) of s. 3 the Schedule to the Commissioners of Divisions Act accordingly stood amended and that in its turn incorporated those amendments in the Land Acquisition Act.

Now, it has been urged on behalf of the petitioner that this was a very devious method of amending the Land Acquisition Act. It is not disputed that the State Legislature could with the requisite assent of the President have directly legislated to amend the Land Acquisition Act to give the necessary powers to the Commissioners. It is also not in dispute that the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act has received the assent of the President and that would mean in the context of s. 3(4) that the President has assented to those powers being conferred upon and being entrusted to Commissioners in such enactments as are within the competence of the State Legislature to enact. What is argued, however, is that the State Legislature could not by enacting s. 3(4) delegate in this manner its legislative function to the State Government and give the State Government an omnibus power to amend any other enactment for the time being in force by a simple notification in the Official Gazette. That, it was argued, virtually amounts to entrusting to the Executive the whole function of the Legislature in the matter, and to that extent, therefore, the delegation was bad. It was also urged that it was an excessive delegation for the reason that the State Government had been armed with the power to amend any and every Act and virtually to become a Legislature in itself.

On this question reference was made to *In re the Delhi Laws Act, 1912*¹ and to the principles laid down therein by the highest Court upon which questions of delegated legislative authority must be judged. The subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in which that leading case was substantially summarised was also referred to namely Rajnarain Singh v. The Chairman, Patna Administration Committee, Patna.² After the analysis of the opinions in the Delhi Laws Act case made in Rajnarain's case the principles are now well settled. In dealing with the Delhi Laws Act case Mr. Justice Bose made the following propositions in Rajnarain Singh's case (p. 298):

"The Court had before it the following problems. In each case, the Central Legislature had empowered an executive authority under its legislative control to apply, at its discretion, laws to an area which was also under the legislative sway of the Centre. The variations occur in the type of laws which the executive authority was authorised to select and in the modifications which it was empowered to make in them. The variations were as follows:

(1) Where the executive authority was permitted, at its discretion, to apply without modification (save incidental changes such as name and place), the whole of any Central Act already in existence in any part of India under the legislative sway of the Centre to the new area:

This was upheld by a majority of six to one.

(2) Where the executive authority was allowed to select and apply a Provincial Act in similar circumstances:

This was also upheld, but this time by a majority of five to two.

(3) Where the executive authority was permitted to select future Central laws and apply them in a similar way;

This was upheld by five to two.

(4) Where the authorisation was to select future Provincial laws and apply them as above:

This was also upheld by five to two.

1 [1951] S.C.R. 747.

2 [1955] 1 S.C.R. 290.

(5) Where the authorisation was to repeal laws already in force in the area and either substitute nothing in their places or substitute other laws, Central or Provincial, with or without modification:

This was held to be ultra vires by a majority of four to three.

(6) Where the authorisation was to apply existing laws, either Central or Provincial, with alterations and modifications; and

(7) Where the authorisation was to apply future laws under the same conditions:

The views of the various members of the Bench were not as clear cut here as in the first five cases, so it will be necessary to analyse what each Judge said."

The authorisation under s. 3(4) of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act is in substance an authorization to amend any other enactment with a view to confer powers and impose duties on Commissioners under those enactments. It would, in our opinion, properly fall within the sixth category in the passage quoted above, "Where the authorisation was to apply existing laws either Central or Provincial, with alterations and modifications".

As to that category at page 301 of the Report Mr. Justice Bose summed up the result of the Delhi Laws Act case as follows:—

"In our opinion, the majority view was that an executive authority can be authorised to modify either existing or future laws but not in any essential feature. Exactly what constitutes an essential feature cannot be enunciated in general terms, and there was some divergence of view about this in the former case, but this much is clear from the opinions set out above: it cannot include a change of policy".

In Rajnarain Singh's case there were impugned two notifications issued under ss. 3(1)(f) and 5 of the Patna Administration Act of 1915 (Bihar & Orissa Act I of 1915) as amended in 1928 whereby the Local Government was empowered in effect:

(1) to cancel or modify any existing municipal laws in the Patna Administration area;

(2) to extend to this area all or any of the sections of the Bihar & Orissa Municipal Act of 1922 subject to such restrictions and modifications as it considered fit;

(3) to add to the Patna Administration area other areas not already under Municipal control.

What the State Government did was to add by a notification a new area to the Patna Administration area and bring the new area under municipal control. Besides it picked s. 104 out of the Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act of 1922, modified it and extended it in its modified form to the Patna Administration and the new areas. That section was with regard to assessment of taxes and the petitioner in the case who was a resident of the new area contended that such a delegation was a delegation of an essential function of the Legislature and, therefore, the provisions of the Act which authorized such a delegation were void. It was held that the action of the Governor in subjecting a resident of the new area to municipal taxation without observing the formalities imposed by ss. 4, 5 and 6 of the Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act, 1922, cut across one of its essential features touching a matter of policy and was bad to that extent, but so far as s. 3(1)(f) of the Act which authorised the delegation of powers to the Government is concerned, it was a valid delegation. Dealing with that point the Supreme Court ruled in Rajnarain's case (p. 303):—

"Now the only difference between that case (the Delhi Laws Act case) and this is that whereas in the former case the whole of an enactment, or a part of it could be extended, here, any section can be picked out... It follows that when a section of an Act is selected for application, whether it is modified or not, it must be done so as not to effect any change of policy, or any essential change in the Act regarded as a whole. Subject to that limitation we hold that section 3(1)(f) is intra vires, that is to say, we hold that any section or sections of the Bihar and Orissa Municipal Act of 1922 can be picked out and applied to "Patna" provided that does not effect any essential change in the Act or alter its policy".

Judged in the light of this principle we are unable to find that any essential change was made or any change of policy effected when after the words "appropriate government" the words "or the Commissioner" were added in the several sections of the Land Acquisition Act. The original policy of the Legislature remained untouched; the power originally conferred on the State Government remained in all its pristine plenitude; only the Commissioner was given those powers pari passu with the State Government. In so far as the Commissioner was a subordinate of State Government and could always be controlled by it, the State Government's power was not affected. The Commissioner in his turn was a responsible officer and in normal course would always be consulted by Government when acquiring property in his division. Thus, in fact, he would always be influencing the decisions in the matter of acquisitions. This de facto state of affairs was legally recognised by the amendment. It seems to us that the amendment was made only for administrative convenience and not for any change which can be termed essential much less in order to effect a change of policy.

In the case last cited reference was made to the leading case of The Queen v. Burah.³ On the power of the State Legislature to effect an amendment of this kind that case is instructive. In that case an Act passed by the Indian Legislature (Act XXII of 1869) which was a validly enacted piece of legislation by the then Governor-General in Council. It empowered an executive authority viz. Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to apply "any law or any portion of any law now in force...or which may hereafter be enacted" to a certain district of the then Province of Bengal at his discretion. It was urged that the Indian Legislature could not have thus delegated its own power of legislation to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and that in so far as it empowered the Lieutenant-Governor to determine whether the said laws or any part of them shall be applied in a certain district, the delegation of the legislative authority of the Governor-General-in-Council to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal was in excess of the legislative powers of the Governor-General-in-Council. The High Court held that the 9th Section of the Act of 1869 which purported to empower the Lieutenant-Governor to extend the Act to the Khasi and Jaintia districts was in excess of the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council. Repelling this view, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council observed (p. 193):

"But their Lordships are of opinion that the doctrine of the majority of the Court is erroneous, and that it rests upon a mistaken view of the powers of the Indian Legislature, and indeed of the nature and principles of legislation. The Indian Legislature has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament which created it, and it can, of course, do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But, when acting within those limits, it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, and was intended to have, plenary powers of legislation, as large, and of the same nature, as those of Parliament itself. The established Courts of Justice, when a question arises whether the prescribed limits have been exceeded, must of necessity determine that question; and the only way in which they can properly do so, is by looking to the terms of the instrument by which, affirmatively, the legislative powers were created, and by which, negatively, they are restricted. If what has been done is legislation, within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited (in which category would, of course, be included any Act of the Imperial Parliament at variance with it), it is not for any Court of Justice to inquire further, or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions."

Here again the Judicial Committee stressed the point that where a delegation takes place what one has to see is whether looking to the terms of the Act granting legislative power both in the extent of what it gives as well as what it restricts, any essential legislative power has been conferred or surrendered.

The Judicial Committee also drew another distinction. It distinguished between essential legislative function and the conditions attached to a legislation. They pointed out that so long as the essential function is not delegated to the Executive a legislative authority can permit the Executive to fulfil any of the conditions attached to a legislation. The distinction was thus indicated by their Lordships (p. 194) :—

“Their Lordships agree that the Governor-General in Council could not, by any form of enactment, create in India, and arm with general legislative authority, a new legislative power, not created or authorized by the Councils’ Act. Nothing of that kind has, in their Lordships’ opinion, been done or attempted in the present case. What has been done is this. The Governor-General in Council has determined, in the due and ordinary course of legislation, to remove a particular district from the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts and offices, and to place it under new Courts and offices, to be appointed by and responsible to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; leaving it to the Lieutenant-Governor to say at what time that change shall take place; and also enabling him, not to make what laws he pleases for that or any other district, but to apply by public notification to that district any law, or part of a law, which either already was, or from time to time might be, in force, by proper legislative authority, ‘in the other territories subject to his government’. The Legislature determined that, so far, a certain change should take place; but that it was expedient to leave the time, and the manner, of carrying it into effect to the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor; and also, that the laws which were or might be in force in the other territories subject to the same Government were such as it might be fit and proper to apply to this district also; but that, as it was not certain that all those laws, and every part of them, could with equal convenience be so applied, it was expedient, on that point also, to entrust a discretion to the Lieutenant-Governor...

Their Lordships think that it is a fallacy to speak of the powers thus conferred upon the Lieutenant-Governor (large as they undoubtedly are) as if, when they were exercised, the efficacy of the acts done under them would be due to any other legislative authority than that of the Governor-General in Council. Their whole operation is, directly and immediately, under and by virtue of this Act (XXII. of 1869) itself. The proper Legislature has exercised its judgment as to place, person, laws, powers; and the result of that judgment has been to legislate conditionally as to all these things. The conditions having been fulfilled, the legislation is now absolute. Where plenary powers of legislation exist as to particular subjects, whether in an imperial or in a provincial Legislature, they may (in their Lordships’ judgment) be well exercised, either absolutely or conditionally.”

Having regard to these principles and particularly the distinction adverted to between the delegation of essential legislative function and the delegation of powers to give effect to legislation on the fulfilment of certain conditions we do not think that we can hold that what has been authorised in the instant case is in excess of the powers of the State Legislature. The State Legislature had the power to create offices under it and to say which of its officers shall perform which functions. That legislative determination or judgment is expressed in the very terms of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 when it says that

“the Commissioner of a division, appointed under the law relating to land revenue as amended by the said Schedule, shall exercise the powers and discharge the duties conferred and imposed on the Commissioner by any law for the time being in force, including the enactments referred to in sub-section (1) as amended by the said Schedule”.

By sub-s. (4) the further determination was made that “the State Government may confer and impose on the Commissioner powers and duties under any other enactment for the time being in force.” In other words, the legislative determination consisted in this that the Legislature felt that powers under any other enactment could fittingly be conferred upon the Commissioner. That determination included in it a determination as to the authority on whom and the powers which were to be conferred, the purpose for which and the manner in which that authority would be conferred upon the Commissioner and the time when it was to be conferred. Once that legislative judgment was exercised the rest was, in our opinion, merely a matter of the conditions upon which the legislative determination was to take effect. Therefore, there was, in our opinion, no parting with the essential legislative functions in the instant case.

It was next argued that the amplitude of the language used in enacting this piece of legislation is so wide that the State Government can by a conceivable notification make amendments which may affect essential legislative functions. It was urged, for instance, that the State Government could by notification amend the legislation taking away the power from Courts. Wherever power of this kind is conferred, undoubtedly it is liable to be exceeded by those entrusted with it or for that matter even to be abused. But the argument does not amount to saying, therefore, that the power conferred is bad but that in the implementation of that power the authority is liable to exceed or overstep its delegated functions. That is a different question. It seems to us that it is not seriously argued here that in adding the words "or the Commissioner" in the several sections of the Land Acquisition Act the State Government has exceeded the powers conferred upon it but that the delegate may abuse those powers. The mere capability of its abuse or mis-use cannot alter the nature of the power. In the instant case, we have already said that that power was only a power to give effect to the conditions attached to a legislation and did not amount to giving any power to make any essential legislative determination. The delegation was, therefore, proper.

It was then urged that though the Commissioners of Divisions Act has undoubtedly received the assent of the President, the subsequent amendments effected by the notifications of the State Government in the Land Acquisition Act as well as the other Acts were not assented to by the President and to that extent the subject of the legislation which admittedly fell in List III of the Constitution would be bad, because it conflicts with an existing Central law viz. the Land Acquisition Act. It was urged that the Central law merely entrusted the functions under ss. 4, 6, 9 and 17 to the State Government whereas the local legislation and that too by notifications of the State Government add the words "or the Commissioner" and to that extent is repugnant to a Central law. The clear answer to the contention is, in our opinion, to be found in the provisions of art. 254, sub-art. (2) of the Constitution which runs as follows:—

"Where a law made by the Legislature of a State with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provisions of an earlier law made by Parliament or an existing law with respect to that matter, then, the law so made by the Legislature of such State shall, if it has been reserved for the consideration of the President and has received his assent, prevail in that State."

The Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act was passed in 1958 and the Land Acquisition Act was passed in 1894. Therefore, for the purposes of sub-art. (2) of art. 254 would be an "existing law" on the date of the Constitution. So far as the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act is concerned, it is not disputed that it has received the assent of the President and, therefore, having received the assent it would prevail so far as the State of Maharashtra is concerned, even though it may be repugnant to the provisions of the earlier law made by Parliament viz. the Land Acquisition Act. The Land Acquisition Act was an existing law having regard to the definition of the term in art. 366(10) of the Constitution. We, therefore, hold that the amendments effected in the Land Acquisition Act by the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act were valid amendments so far at least as this State is concerned. We have already held that there was no excess of delegation of legislative authority by s. 3 of the Bombay Commissioners of Divisions Act. Similar instances of enactments held valid, though not identical with the present case are to be found in the State v. Heman Alreja,⁴ Edward Mills Co. Ltd. v. The State of Ajmer,⁵ Gulam Mohammad v. State of Bombay,⁶ and Patna Improvement Trust v. Lakshmi Devi.⁷

Next we turn to the challenge to the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act and particularly to s. 6 thereof upon constitutional grounds. The provisions of s. 6, it has been said, are ultra vires of art. 19(1)(f) and (g), of art. 31 and of art. 14. So far as arts. 19(1)(f) and (g) are concerned, we may at once point out that the challenge to the Act on the ground of infringement of art. 19 has been answered by the highest Court in Somawanti v. State of Punjab.⁸ At page 160 in the same passage which we quote below the Supreme Court also repelled the argument that it infringed art. 31 of the Constitution. In para. 21 of the judgment, Mr. Justice Mudholkar observed with reference to the Land Acquisition Act (p. 160) :

"...The Act has been in operation since 1894. The validity of the law was challenged before this Court in Babu Barkya Thakur v. The State of Bombay,⁹ on the ground that it infringes the provisions of Arts. 31(2) and 19(1)(f) of the Constitution. But this Court held that the law being a pre-Constitution law is protected from the operation of Art. 31(2) by the provisions of Art. 31(5)(a). It also held, following the decision in *The State of Bombay v. Bhanji Munji*¹⁰ and that in Lilavati Bai v. The State of Bombay,¹¹ that the attack under Art. 19(1)(f) of the Constitution is futile".

In Civil Appeal No. 322 of 1961¹² before the Supreme Court this view was reaffirmed and a further point taken on the strength of the decision of the Supreme Court in Kavalappara Kottarathil Kochuni v. State of Madras,¹³ that the decision in Bhanji Munji's case must be deemed to have lost its authority, was repelled. Mr. Justice Sarkar observed:

"The observation in Kavalappara Kochuni's case that Bhanji Munji's case 'no longer holds the field' has, therefore, to be understood as meaning that it no longer governs a case of deprivation of property by means other than requisition and acquisition by the State. Kavalappara Kochuni's case was not concerned with a law of requisition or acquisition of property governed by art. 31(2), as it now stands, and did not decide that question".

We may also say that art. 19(1)(f) or (g) is no longer available to the petitioner having regard to the provisions of art. 358 of the Constitution and the proclamation of emergency recently made by the President in October 1962. The article in terms says that

"While a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, nothing in article 19 shall restrict the power of the State as defined in Part III to make any law or to take any executive action which the State would but for the provisions contained in that Part be competent to make or to take..."

We hold that neither s. 4 nor s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act can be held to infringe art. 19 of the Constitution.

So far as art. 31 is concerned, we have already referred to the decision in Somawanti's case. In the passage from that decision, which we have quoted above, no doubt Mr. Justice Mudholkar made it clear that the Supreme Court in that case were not concerned with a post-Constitution law, but a pre-Constitution law. Relying on these observations a distinction is sought to be drawn between that decision and the present case. It has been urged that so far as the definition of "public purpose" in s. 3(f)(2) of the Land Acquisition Act is concerned, it was added by the local amendment made by Act XXXV of 1953 and, therefore, would be a post-Constitution law and not a pre-Constitution law as the rest of the Act would be. The conditions necessary to be fulfilled under art. 31 of the Constitution are that no property can be acquired compulsorily except for a public purpose and under authority of law. The law has been enacted and in our opinion is valid. The question then is whether in sub-s. (2) of s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act, (as amended), the purposes mentioned can be held to be public purposes within the meaning of art. 31. We shall presently discuss this question as it arises also in connection with sub-s. (1) of s. 6. We may say here, however, that in our opinion, sub-cl. (2) of s. 3(f) added by the local amendment which includes certain purposes within the definition of a public purpose are within the accepted connotation of that expression.

Turning to the challenge under art. 14 of the Constitution, it is the petitioner's case that he himself is the owner of a small factory manufacturing explosives in close proximity to the residential part of Bombay, that therefore the Government of India had ordered him to shift the factory to other premises outside the limits of Greater Bombay and so he had purchased the plot which is the subject of the present acquisition "specifically for re-establishing the said factory". He also averred that detailed plans of the buildings to be constructed were submitted to the Explosives Department of the Government of India and have been finally approved by the Department on January 24, 1963. The land which he had thus purchased was a "levelled land" and fit for erection of a factory and did not require anything to convert it into land suitable for establishing a factory. It was also land within the industrial area.

The facts stated in this part of the petition were not controverted in the affidavit of the Commissioner dated November 15, 1963, except to deny that the land was levelled or that it was in a fit condition for the erection of a factory or the construction of buildings. It was also denied that it did not require any development to be made for converting it into land suitable for a factory. The facts that the Government of India had asked him to shift this factory and, therefore, that he purchased this plot and the Department of Explosives had approved the petitioner's plans for the new factory building were not controverted. In fact, the petitioner has filed a number of documents from which these facts are abundantly established. The said correspondence appears at pages 78 to 90 of the paper book. It was on January 24, 1963, that the Inspector of Explosives of the Central Government at Bombay approved the plans showing the site and details of construction of the proposed gun-powder factory of the petitioner and informed the petitioner accordingly by his letter No. MR/BY.52/E dated January 24, 1963. That was curiously enough the very day on which the notification under s. 4 and which is impugned in the present petition, came to be promulgated.

Now taking his stand upon these facts Mr. Bhatt has urged on behalf of the petitioner that the petitioner was himself a person engaged in industry, had himself bought the land in dispute for the manufacture of explosives which is an industry and there was no point in the Government starting acquisition proceedings for the same land for an identical purpose stated in the notification under s. 4 as "for development and utilization of lands as an industrial area". The same purpose, though in different words, is also mentioned at the foot of the notification under s. 6 "for the development and utilization of lands as an industrial area". Mr. Bhatt points to the several provisions of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Act, 1961, and the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation for which he says that the acquisition has in fact been made and to the definition in s. 3(f) (2) where the words "and subsequent disposal thereof in whole or in part by lease, assignment, or sale, with the object of securing further development" occur. He says that the whole object, therefore, of the present acquisition is really to take the lands of the petitioner who is himself engaged in industry and dispose them of to another person for profit though ostensibly for a public purpose. This law thus permits the State to take the lands of one citizen held by him upon certain terms and conditions and hand them over to another citizen upon similar terms and conditions and, therefore, it discriminates against the petitioner. He has also urged that the power given by virtue of s. 6 read along with the amendment in s. 3(f) (2) is an arbitrary power conferred upon the State to acquire the lands of the petitioner. There are no safeguards against the exercise of this arbitrary power and, therefore, discrimination is writ large upon the face of the law itself. For these reasons the law infringes art. 14 of the Constitution. In this connection, he also makes an ancillary point that the amendment made by virtue of the power delegated to the State Government under the Commissioners of Divisions Act heightens the discrimination. He urges that whereas the State Government was entrusted with deciding all matters under the Act as it originally stood now even the Commissioner of Division can do so. Therefore, the discrimination is the worse because of the powers being entrusted to a lesser official and a subordinate of the State Government, rather than the State Government itself.

Article 14 refers to "equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India". There is no question here undoubtedly of inequality before the law and the argument of the petitioner is based upon the second part of art. 14 "equal protection of the laws". Now it is difficult to see how merely because the law gives power to the State or the Commissioner upon certain conditions to take or acquire the property of the petitioner, the petitioner ceases to receive the same protection of the laws as any other citizen. The power or authority conferred, whether upon the State Government or the Commissioner, is the same, be it the petitioner or any other citizen. What it seems to us, is really complained against in the arguments, is that the power given to the State or the Commissioner is a very wide and arbitrary power and the very amplitude of the discretion makes for discrimination.

We are, however, unable to accept this argument for a discretion given under a law, however wide it may be, cannot necessarily be equated with discrimination, and in so far as there is a possibility of the misuse of a discretion the normal presumption of law is that the authority invested with a discretionary power will act fairly and honestly and not abuse it. If it does however abuse it in a given case, that is an indication of human frailty rather than of the power being discriminatory. The distinction has been drawn in a number of cases, but the most authoritative of these statements is to be found in the decision of the Supreme Court in Pannalal Binraj v. Union of India.¹⁴ In that case power was given by s. 5(7A) of the Indian Income-tax Act to the Commissioner to transfer the case of any assessee from one officer to another officer. It was urged that the assessee had a right under s. 64(1) and (2) of the Act to have his tax assessed at the place where he carried on his business or resided and that, therefore, the very wide power given to the Commissioner amounted to an arbitrary power which tended to discriminate between one assessee and another. The Supreme Court put the point before them thus (p. 252):

"The position, therefore, is that the determination of the question whether a particular Income-tax Officer should assess the case of the assessee depends on (1) the convenience of the assessee as posited in section 64(1) and (2) of the Act, and (2) the exigencies of tax collection and it would be open to the Commissioner of Income-tax and the Central Board of Revenue who are the highest amongst the Income-tax Authorities under the Act to transfer the case of a particular assessee from the Income-tax Officer of the area within which he resides or carries on business to any other Income-tax Officer if the exigencies of tax collection warrant the same", and the Court answered the point as follows (p. 257):

"...Such discretion would necessarily have to be vested in the authority concerned and merely because the case of a particular assessee is transferred from the Income-tax Officer of an area within which he resides or carries on business to another Income-tax Officer whether within or without the State will not by itself be sufficient to characterize the exercise of the discretion as discriminatory. Even if there is a possibility of discriminatory treatment of persons falling within the same group or category, such possibility cannot necessarily invalidate the piece of legislation..."

This power is discretionary and not necessarily discriminatory and abuse of power cannot be easily assumed where the discretion is vested in such high officials (Vide Matajog Dobey v. H. C. Bharti).¹⁵ There is moreover a presumption that public officials will discharge their duties honestly and in accordance with the rules of law. (Vide New York ex rel. Lieberman v. Van De Carr.)¹⁶

14 [1957] S.C.R. 233.

15 [1955] 2 S.C.R. 925, 932.

Their Lordships also quoted with approval their remarks in *A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkitachalam Potti*¹⁷ as follows:

"...It is to be presumed, unless the contrary were shown, that the administration of a particular law would be done 'not with an evil eye and unequal hand' and the selection made by the Government of the cases of persons to be referred for investigation by the Commission would not be discriminatory".

We may add that the same presumption would prevail here and it cannot be assumed that in the selection of land for acquisition the Government or the Commissioner (and he is as high an officer as in Pannabai Binjraj's case the Income-tax Commissioner was) would act with any particular animus or show discrimination between the petitioner and other citizens.

In another case, where the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, were challenged as ultra vires of art. 14, their Lordships reiterated the same view. The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, gives authority to the State Government in different circumstances and conditions to take different actions to resolve industrial disputes. It has been given one of several alternative powers e.g. of arbitration, of reference, of conciliation. It was urged that these were powers which could be exercised at the whim of the Government. They could exercise them in a given case and not exercise in another case or use one power in one case and another in a similar case and, therefore, those powers tended to work a possible discrimination against certain persons. The argument was negatived in Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd. v. The 2nd Punjab Industrial Tribunal,¹⁸ as follows (p. 349):—

"We are unable to accept these contentions. Having regard to the provisions of the Act hereinbefore set out it is clear that s. 10 is not discriminatory in its ambit and the appropriate Government is at liberty as and when the occasion arises to refer the industrial disputes arising or threatening to arise between the employers and the workmen to one or the other of the authorities according to the exigencies of the situation. No two cases are alike in nature and the industrial disputes which arise or are apprehended to arise in particular establishments or undertakings require to be treated having regard to the situation prevailing in the same. There cannot be any classification and the reference to one or the other of the authorities has necessarily got to be determined in the exercise of its best discretion by the appropriate Government. Such discretion is not an unfettered or an uncontrolled discretion nor an unguided one because the criteria for the exercise of such discretion are to be found within the terms of the Act itself".

Then their Lordships indicated the nature of the safeguards and the criteria indicated in the Act. Now, it seems to us that even in the present Act there are sufficient criteria or safeguards indicated and that the discretion vested in the State Government or the Commissioner is not an arbitrary discretion. The Act itself provides the following among other safeguards: The preamble itself indicates that the purpose is a very limited purpose and can only be a public purpose as defined in the Act. A perusal of the definition shows that though it is wide in connotation still it has definite circumscribed limits. Sections 4 and 6 also indicate that specific conditions have to be fulfilled before the notices of acquisition can issue. The over-riding limitation is of course the public purpose as defined. In s. 6 another alternative is also contemplated by the words "for a company". Now "a company" is defined and so far as acquisitions for a company are concerned, Part VII lays down further limitations, particularly the requirements of s. 40 that the appropriate Government shall not give consent unless it is satisfied as to the conditions mentioned in cls. (a) and (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 40 and unless an agreement with Government is entered into as mentioned in s. 41. So far as s. 17 is also concerned, drastic as its provisions are, there are strict limitations to the taking of land under that section. We shall show when we come to discuss the point raised upon the provisions of s. 17(4) that those safeguards are stringent and partly, in any case, have not been fulfilled. That itself would show that arbitrary powers have not been vested in the authorities nor do they lead to discrimination.

In the next place, upon the facts the land which is being acquired from the petitioner is not an isolated piece of land but part of a very much larger area which the Government have declared an area suitable as an industrial area for development. The whole area is being acquired for a public purpose and the petitioner's land is a small part of it. This is not only clear from the affidavit of the Commissioner dated November 15, 1963, a portion from which we have already quoted, but it is further made clear in the affidavit of Mr. P. C. Nayak (Para. 6) the Chief Executive Officer of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation dated July 15, 1964. The Chief Executive Officer has there indicated that a large block of lands known as the "Wagle Estate" comprising about 310 acres which originally belonged to Government before the Board of Industrial Development was constituted and other large tracts of lands were handed over to the Board and ultimately to the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation for development as industrial areas. Therefore, even assuming that the law permits any discrimination, it seems to us, that in the present case there is no scope for discrimination against the petitioner. His land is part of a very large area of land which is all being acquired. We hold, therefore, that the challenge to the notifications and the provisions of the Act under art. 14 and art. 19 fails.

Then we turn to a more substantial contention urged on behalf of the petitioner that in the notifications as well as in the amendment to s. 3(f) contained in sub-cl. (2) incorporated as a local amendment, there is no public purpose apparent. Therefore, it was argued, the amendment as well as the notifications infringed the requirements both of s. 6 and of art. 31 so far as the amendment is concerned. The definition in s. 3(f) is only an inclusive definition. It does not attempt to delineate what is a "public purpose" but merely includes by an artificial extension of meaning certain matters within it. But the words "public purpose" occurring throughout the Act and particularly in s. 6 have several times received interpretation in this Court. The expression first came up for consideration not in connection with the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act, but in connection with the use of the expression in a lease deed granted by the then East India Company in favour of the defendant in a suit. The decision is to be found reported in Hamabai v. Secretary of State.¹⁹ An appeal from that decision ultimately went to the Privy Council and the decision of the Privy Council is reported in Hamabai Framji Petit v. Secretary of State.²⁰ Their Lordships accepted the definition of "public purpose" given by the trial Judge Mr. Justice Batchelor and they adopted it as their own. That definition, which is now the classic definition of "public purpose" appears in the following passage (p. 102):—

"The argument of the appellants is really rested upon the view that there cannot be a 'public purpose' in taking land if that land when taken is not in some way or other made available to the public at large. Their Lordships do not agree with this view. They think the true view is well expressed by Batchelor J. in the first case, when he says (p. 1119):—

'General definitions are, I think, rather to be avoided where the avoidance is possible, and I make no attempt to define precisely the extent of the phrase "public purposes" in the lease; it is enough to say that, in my opinion, the phrase, whatever else it may mean, must include a purpose, that is, an object or aim, in which the general interest of the community, as opposed to the particular interest of individuals, is directly and vitally concerned.'

That being so, all that remains is to determine whether the purpose here is a purpose in which the general interest of the community is concerned. Prima facie the Government are good Judges of that. They are not absolute Judges. They cannot say: 'Sic volo sic jubeo', but at least a Court would not easily hold them to be wrong. But here, so far from holding them to be wrong, the whole of the learned Judges who are thoroughly conversant with the conditions of Indian life, say that they are satisfied that the scheme is one which will redound to public benefit by helping the Government to maintain the efficiency of its servants."

Thus, this decision which is the basis of all subsequent decisions, lays down two important criteria, firstly that it is not necessary in order that there should be a public purpose that the land which is taken must always be made available to the public at large. It may be that it may benefit only a small section of the community. Secondly, it must be for an object or aim in which the general interest of the community as opposed to the particular interest of individuals is directly and vitally concerned.

The definition of "public purpose" with particular reference to the Land Acquisition Act was also adverted to in a case which we have already referred to, Babu Barkya Thakur v. State of Bombay, and at page 134 Chief Justice Sinha defined it thus:

"...It will thus be noticed that the expression 'public purpose' has been used in its generic sense of including any purpose in which even a fraction of the community may be interested or by which it may be benefited."

In Somawanti's case (sup. cit) the definition given by the learned Chief Justice was verbatim adopted (vide para. 34 at page 164 of the A.I.R. Report).

In Babu Barkya's case a point was raised before the Supreme Court that "public purpose" was not disclosed on the face of the notification impugned in the case—a notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act—and their Lordships held (p. 139):

"It is argued that in terms the notification does not state that the land sought to be acquired was needed for a public purpose. In our opinion, it is not absolutely necessary to the validity of the land acquisition proceedings that that statement should find a place in the notification actually issued. The requirements of the law will be satisfied if, in substance, it is found on investigation, and the appropriate Government is satisfied as a result of the investigation that the land was needed for the purposes of the Company, which would amount to a public purpose under Part VII, as already indicated".

Therefore, it seems to us that the question whether there is a public purpose or not does not fall to be considered merely upon the recitals of the particular notification impugned, but must be gathered from the facts and circumstances before the Court.

In this petition in both the notifications under ss. 4 and 6 the public purpose has been stated as "for the development and utilization of the land as an industrial area." This is further elaborated in the affidavits filed by the Commissioner and the other respondents. The Commissioner has explained that the idea behind and object of acquiring the land in the instant case and developing industrial areas was to ensure orderly and planned development of industries in and around Greater Bombay and elsewhere in the State. It is explained that such development is necessary, because there has been a great growth of industry and concentration thereof in and around Greater Bombay. Therefore, it has become necessary to relieve the congestion and the consequent "bad condition of housing, educational and medical facilities etc." The affidavit further points out that the object of Government is that these areas which are being acquired would be properly laid out and planned with some deliberation so that their development as an industrial area would be a proper development and space would be reserved for social services, recreational facilities and thereby all the disadvantages of "haphazard and unplanned development would be avoided for the future." All this has not been controverted on behalf of the petitioner, and it seems to us that if that be the object, as we have no doubt it is, then the lands sought to be acquired are clearly being acquired for a public purpose. We have no hesitation, therefore, in holding that the purpose mentioned in the notifications is a public purpose as shown therein.

Turning next to the amended definition of "public purpose" in cl. (2) of s. 3(f), the words used there are "for purposes of the development of areas ...and subsequent disposal thereof in whole or in part by lease, assignment, or sale, with the object of securing further development." It was urged that the expression "development of areas" is a very vague expression and what is involved in "development" is not indicated. It was even suggested that if the State were to take the areas, merely remove the weeds and cut the grass growing thereon that could also be said to be "development". Here again the contention only amounts to this that taking advantage of the use of the expression "development of areas" the authorities may be enabled to take advantage and making a pretence of "development" dispose of the lands acquired. The argument, however, does not show that the development of areas from public revenues per se cannot be a public purpose. In fact, without development of areas on a large scale and proper laying out and without proper provision of amenities for sanitation and health, it would not be possible to develop industrial areas at all. Now that is the sole purpose of the definition.

The meaning of the word "development" as given in the Oxford Illustrated Dictionary 1962 is "gradual unfolding; evolution; realisation of potentialities of site or territory by building or mining". It would thus appear that in so far as these activities are undertaken by the State by the very use of the word "development" a public purpose is implicit, for it means "the realisation of the potentialities of land or territory by building or mining". The subsequent words of the clause, which does not find place in any other definition of "public purpose" have been relied on viz. "and subsequent disposal thereof in whole or in part etc." Those words are also qualified by the words "with the object of securing further development". That again, in our opinion, would justify the disposal of these lands only for a public purpose and not otherwise. Therefore, even though by the addition of sub-cl. (2) of s. 3(f) the connotation of the expression "public purpose" has been considerably enlarged by the local amendment, still the new definition has implicit in it the idea of a public purpose. To that extent, therefore, the definition does not conflict with either s. 6 or art. 31 which lays it down as a condition to the acquisition of a citizen's property that there should be a public purpose. In that view, we must hold that the amended definition of "public purpose" is intra vires of art. 31 as well as s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act.

We next turn to the argument advanced on the basis of the proviso to s. 6. Section 6, sub-s. (1) runs as follows:—

"Subject to the provisions of Part VII of this Act when the appropriate Government is satisfied, after considering the report, if any, made under section 5-A, sub-section (2), that any particular land is needed for a public purpose, or for a Company a declaration shall be made to that effect under the signature of a Secretary to such Government or of some officer duly authorised to certify its orders:

Provided that no such declaration shall be made unless the compensation to be awarded for such property is to be paid by a Company, or wholly or partly out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority."

So far as sub-s. (1) is concerned, the acquisition could be for one of two purposes, viz. (a) that any particular land is needed for a public purpose or (b) for a company. These are initially two limitations upon the power to acquire and these limitations have to be decided upon before the issue of notification by the Appropriate Government and/or now the Commissioner. We have already held that there was involved in the notifications impugned a public purpose. The satisfaction of the Commissioner that there exists a public purpose is also endorsed upon the face of these notifications and, though it has been held that that is not essential, so far as sub-s. (1) of s. 6 is concerned, the notifications could be said to be in order. But there is then the proviso to s. 6. The relationship of the proviso to the parent section and its effect has also been indicated in one of the recent cases which came before the Supreme Court Valjibhai v. State of Bombay.²¹ After considering the proviso to sub-s. (1) Mr. Justice Mudholkar who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Court observed in para. 7 as follows:

"We must, however, point out that before effect can be given to a notification under sub-sec. (1) of s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act the terms of the proviso to that section should be satisfied."

Then the learned Judge quoted the section and the proviso which we have already reproduced above and in para. 8 observed:

"The proviso clearly precludes the Government from making a notification under sub-section (1) of section 6 unless (a) the compensation to be awarded for such property is to be paid by a company or is to come (b) wholly or partly out of (i) public revenues or (ii) some fund controlled or managed by a local authority."

Thus, it has been clearly laid down and that is the plain effect on the language of the proviso itself, that unless the conditions in the proviso are fulfilled, the declaration under sub-s. (1) of s. 6 cannot be made. If such a declaration is made and it is found that the terms of the proviso have not been fulfilled, the declaration will not be a declaration under sub-s. (1) of s. 6 with the result that the subsequent provisions of s. 6 would be inapplicable to it. Thus, though we have held that a public purpose is involved within the meaning of the parent sub-s. (1) of s. 6, we must turn to consider whether the terms of the proviso have been fulfilled in the instant case.

Now, the proviso contemplates two alternative conditions for the making of the declaration under sub-s. (1) of s. 6; firstly, that the compensation to be awarded for such property is to be paid by a company or, alternatively, wholly or partly out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority. Of these two conditions, the first cannot upon the terms of the notifications and the pleadings on behalf of the State at all apply here, for it is not the case of the State that the acquisition in the instant case was for a Company or that the compensation to be awarded for such property was to be paid by a Company. On the other hand, the stand has been expressly taken at least in the arguments, that the compensation was to come wholly or partly out of public revenues. Of course, we may say at this stage that the learned Advocate General urged that in this case the entire funds for the acquisition were to come out of public revenue, but it is not necessary for him to go as far as that for even if they were to come partly out of public funds, the proviso would be fulfilled. It is the case of neither party that any amount was to come out of funds controlled or managed by a local authority. We, therefore, turn to scrutinise the facts as they appear upon the affidavits and the numerous documents which the parties have placed before us. But before we do so, we may here observe that the self-same facts and documents are also germane to a consideration of the question, which we will next discuss, whether the acquisition was really for a Company or for a public purpose and, therefore, we would deal with the facts here under both these heads and indicate what our conclusions are upon those facts.

[His Lordship after considering the facts, held, that the amount of the compensation which was to be awarded for the acquisition in this case along with other lands did not come out of public revenues at all whether in whole or in part but came only from the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation to whom it was given as a loan by the State Government.]

The learned Advocate General next argued that even assuming that the amount was given by the State Government to the Corporation as a loan to begin with and then the Corporation paid it to the Special Land Acquisition Officer, as we have found, still it must be held that the compensation which was awarded for such property was paid wholly or partly out of public revenues within the meaning of the proviso to s. 6. The argument, as we understand it, runs somewhat as follows:—That it is the ultimate hand that pays which has to be looked at and it is immaterial in what manner the money is paid for the acquisition so long as the ultimate burden falls upon the public revenues. This contention is based upon certain observations of the Supreme Court in the case which we have already referred to of Pandit Jhandu Lal v. The State of Punjab.²² Chief Justice Sinha in stating the decision of the High Court in that case indicated at page 466,

“...It has been pointed out by the learned single Judge that it was clear from the Government Housing Scheme that a substantial amount to be expended on this Scheme comes out of the Revenues, in the form of subsidies and loans” (italics are ours) and then the learned Chief Justice in giving the decision of the Supreme Court in the penultimate paragraph of the judgment at page 469 observed,

“...As in the present instance, it appears that part at any rate of the compensation to be awarded for the acquisition is to come eventually from out of public revenues, it must be held that the acquisition is not for a Company simpliciter”. (italics are ours). The learned Advocate General emphasised the word “Eventually” and urged that what the learned Chief Justice was clearly laying down was that if the amount in the final reckoning comes from out of public revenues that would be sufficient compliance with s. 6(1) and its proviso. No doubt in the judgment referred to there is a reference to “loans” in the passage which we have quoted, which passage is, so to say, in the preambulatory part of the judgment and the word “eventually” finds place in the concluding part of it, but we must indicate that in the whole body of that judgment—and we say so with the greatest respect and not with any intention to suggest that anything has been left out in that judgment—there is not the slightest reference or discussion regarding the question of loan or to the question whether—if amounts are paid by way of loans and the debtor then supplies funds for acquisition out of that loan, s. 6 would be fulfilled or not. We cannot read into the judgment, therefore, such a decision simply because of one word used by the learned Chief Justice viz. “eventually”. We may also point out that the word “eventually” could as well apply to “subsidies” which in that case had also been given. There were both subsidies and loans and when the learned Chief Justice used the word “eventually” we do not know whether he intended to refer to “subsidies” and “loans” or only to “subsidies”. We do not think that that was the decision of the Supreme Court much less that it was the law declared. We do not think, therefore, that Pandit Jhandu Lal's case is an authority for the proposition that even if the State Government grants a loan to the Corporation and an amount is paid by the Corporation out of that loan, the acquisition will be wholly or partly from out of public revenues.

On the other hand, we may point out that the view taken in a recent decision of the Supreme Court directly negatives the contention raised. In Valjibhai's case (sup. cit) precisely the same question as is before us had arisen before the Supreme Court. A plot of land was sought to be acquired, because it was required by the State Transport Corporation for constructing offices and other buildings by that Corporation. The notification there no doubt stated that it was to be acquired for the purposes of and at the expense of the State Transport Corporation and upon the facts it was found that the State Transport Corporation was to pay for it as we have done here but then the argument similar to the one here advanced of "the ultimate burden" was advanced and it was thus answered at page 1894 of the A.I.R. Report:

"...Since, however, the compensation to be awarded for the acquisition is to be paid only by the Corporation and no portion of it was paid by the Government, could it be said that the terms of the proviso to sub-section (1) of Section 6 have been satisfied? It is contended by the learned Attorney General on behalf of the respondent that the funds of the Corporation have themselves come out of public revenue inasmuch as they consist of moneys provided by the State of Bombay. Even assuming that the funds of the Corporation consist only of the moneys which have been provided by the State of Bombay it is difficult to appreciate how they could be regarded as part of the public revenue. No doubt, the source of the funds would be public revenue but the funds themselves belong to the Corporation and are held by it as its own property. They cannot, therefore, be regarded as 'public revenue' in any sense." (the italics are ours).

It seems to us clear upon an interpretation of the proviso to s. 6 and upon the authorities that when moneys are advanced by the State to a Corporation for the payment of compensation for lands acquired for the Corporation, the compensation to be awarded cannot be said to be paid "wholly or partly out of public revenues".

The finding which we have given, moreover, is no way in conflict with the provisions of the law by which the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation is governed. We have pointed out that under s. 21 of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation Act the Corporation have the power to borrow loans and that the pre-requisite condition for the grant of loan by Government has been fulfilled. No doubt, the latter part of s. 21 has still to be satisfied viz. the terms of the advance have yet to be settled, as admitted on behalf of the respondents, but since the Budget appropriation has been made the loans granted would still not be illegal. It is also consonant with and conducive to the functions of the Corporation and its general powers as indicated in ss. 14 and 15 of that Act.

[His Lordship after dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.]

The proviso to s. 6 has been analysed and pronounced upon in a number of decisions of the highest Court. We have already referred to some of them. Pandit Jhandu Lal's case, at pages 465, 468 and 469; Somawanti's case at pp. 163, 166 and 167 (paras. 36, 42 and 44) and Valjibhai's case at page 1892 (paras. 7 and 8). We may also refer to the recent decision in February of this year in Shyam Behari v. The State of Madhya Pradesh,²³ which reiterates the same position. In the case last mentioned Mr. Justice Wanchoo observed as follows:—

"Section 6(1) of the Act requires that whenever any land is needed for a public purpose or for a company, a declaration shall be made to that effect. Further the proviso to s. 6(1) provides that no such declaration shall be made unless the compensation to be awarded for such property is to be paid by a company, or wholly or partly out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority. This clearly contemplates two kinds of declarations. In the first place, a declaration may be made that land is required for a public purpose, in which case in view of the proviso, the compensation to be awarded for the property to be acquired must come wholly or partly out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority. No declaration under section 6 for acquisition of land for a public purpose can be made unless either the whole or part of the compensation for the property to be acquired is to come out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority; (See Pandit Jhandu Lal v. State of Punjab). In the second place, the declaration under sec. 6 may be made that land is needed for a company in which case the entire compensation has to be paid by the company. It is clear therefore that where the entire compensation is to be paid by a company the notification under s. 6 must contain a declaration that the land is needed for a company. No notification under s. 6 can be made where the entire compensation is to be paid by a company declaring that the acquisition is for a public purpose, for such a declaration requires that either wholly or in part, compensation must come out of public revenues or some fund controlled or managed by a local authority". (italics are ours).

Upon the findings which we have given, therefore, it is clear that no notification under s. 6 that the land is required for a public purpose could have been made in the instant case, for the entire compensation was to be paid by a Company, the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation. The declaration that the acquisition is for a public purpose would be bad, for such a declaration requires that the compensation must come out of public revenues, either wholly or in part which has not been proved. For these reasons, we think that the impugned notifications both under s. 4 and under s. 6 are bad and must be quashed.

Since we have held the notification under s. 6 bad it can hardly be contended that s. 6(3) would come into operation or that such a declaration would be conclusive evidence that the land is needed for a public purpose as stated in the notification. The conclusiveness can only be imparted to a notification which is valid in law. Apart from this we have also held that in declaring that the land was required for a public purpose the Commissioner did not apply his mind to the question at all. If as the Commissioner has stated the proper material was not before him and he was obviously misguided thereby then that error must necessarily be reflected in the making up of his mind as to the existence of a public purpose. If, on the other hand, as the affidavits of other officers and the statement of particulars wish to make out, the Commissioner's statement that the petitioner's land was to be acquired from the funds of the Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation was incorrect, then the Commissioner's declaration that there was a public purpose was made upon incorrect premises and without a consideration of the proper material. We must, therefore, hold the action taken by the Commissioner to be a colourable exercise of the power.

In Valjibhai's case the Supreme Court was faced with a similar acquisition and considering the provisions of s. 6(2) the Supreme Court observed in para. 5 of the judgment (p. 1892):

"...The notification under S. 6 reiterates this fact and in addition says that the land was needed to be acquired for the purposes of and at the expense of the State Transport Corporation. There is thus a clear declaration of the Government that the purpose of acquisition was a public purpose and as has been consistently held by this Court in a number of cases, including the most recent one, Smt. Somawanti v. State of Punjab, the declaration as to public purpose by the Government is final except where it is a colourable exercise of power."

Since we have held that in the instant case the declaration as to public purpose did amount to a colourable exercise of power, the conclusiveness imparted to the declaration will not be attracted to the present notification under s. 6.

[His Lordship after dealing with some points not material to this report proceeded.]

Now, it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that these lands of the petitioner were not lands falling within the description of "waste or arable land" contained in s. 17(I), but that they were lands which were under cultivation or that they were lands for building sites or industrial purposes. So far as the allegation which has been made in para. 8(d) of the petition that the land is a building site within the Thana Borough Municipal limits is concerned, it appears that there has been no specific denial of that fact in the return filed by the Commissioner. Even the allegation in para. 8(d) of the petition that the land is fit for non-agricultural and building purposes immediately is not specifically denied. All that the Commissioner says amounts to this "I am not aware of and do not admit these allegations". The denial also does not meet the substance of the allegation in the petition and the substance is that the petitioner's land was fit for non-agricultural, industrial or building purposes and included within the area of the Thana Borough Municipality. What is really denied is that it is so fit for immediate use. The petitioner has placed on record voluminous correspondence with the Inspector of Explosives of the Government of India and a letter to the Director of Industries, Bombay, from which it is clear that the petitioner was proposing to shift his existing explosives factory to the site in dispute and after protracted negotiations, the Government of India through its Inspector of Explosives had on January 24, 1963, approved of the plans to shift the factory to this very site. The land is also included within the confines of the Thana Borough Municipality. From all this material it does appear to us that though no doubt the land is still classed as agricultural land in the revenue records of the State Government it is in fact and in substance land usable for building and industrial purposes and earmarked for that purpose. Otherwise it could not have been included within the borough limits of Thana. It cannot, therefore be called "waste or arable land" by any stretch of the meaning of those words. In considering whether any land is "waste or arable" it is the nature of the land and its substantive use that one must have regard to and not what it is formally dubbed in archaic revenue records.

In Navnitlal v. State of Bombay,²⁴ a Division Bench of this Court has already held that land which is a building site within municipal limits and situated in the developed part of the city cannot be regarded as arable land much less as waste land and that a building site which is quite suitable to be built upon cannot be regarded as waste land simply because it is not put to any present use. It is its unfitness for use and not the mere fact that it is not put to any present use that must determine whether the land is waste or not. On this short ground in the first place the declaration of this land as waste or arable land is liable to be set aside. But we do not propose to rest our decision on this question on this point only.

A further and the larger question has been canvassed very acutely before us. It is whether, assuming that these are agricultural lands as the Commissioner has admitted, they can be said to be "arable lands". The learned Advocate General conceded that they cannot be called waste lands and so the only question which survives is whether the lands of the petitioner can be said to be "arable lands".

But before we do so, we may point out one other thing upon which we think that the notification in this respect suffers from an initial defect. It will be noticed that the learned Commissioner has in forming his opinion merely repeated ipsissima verba the language of s. 17(I) and said that "the said lands are waste or arable lands". Now, a particular piece of land cannot both be waste and arable land. It is either waste land or arable land and since the section permits lands of either category being taken upon the decision as to urgency it seems to us that the authority must indicate which class of land the authority thinks it is going to take under the 'urgency' provisions. To say that the Commissioner is of the opinion that the said lands are waste or arable lands is, in our opinion, not indicative of any decision whatever. It is, on the other hand, an indication that the Commissioner has not applied his mind to the question. The mechanical reproduction of the words of the section that the said lands are waste or arable itself shows, that the Commissioner never applied his mind to the question. We do not say that it necessarily vitiates the notification altogether but that he left the question open to doubt is itself an important indication of the non-application of mind. In Navnitlal's case to which we have referred above, the Commissioner was wiser.

He omitted all reference to waste or arable lands and the Division Bench held that the notification was bad for the reason that the authority had not applied its mind before forming the opinion. At page 628 the Division Bench observed:

"...The affidavit does not state that the Government had formed the opinion that the provisions of s. 17(1) were applicable to the land in the present case nor does it state facts from which we can conclude that such an opinion was formed by the Government. The affidavit has stated that before issuing the Notification the land was inspected and was found to be waste and arable and having no structure on it.... Whether the land is waste or arable is an objective fact. Under s. 17(4) Government is required to form an opinion with regard to this objective fact as a preliminary step to the exercise of its power to issue a direction dropping the inquiry under s. 5A. The Government must form the necessary opinion with regard to this objective fact on considerations of reasons which are relevant to its determination. If the Government forms such opinion, the correctness of the opinion cannot be challenged and the sufficiency of the reasons on which the opinion is based cannot be questioned and the direction issued in pursuance of the opinion cannot be assailed. If, however, the Government has formed no opinion at all or the opinion formed is based on reasons which are not relevant to the determination of the objective fact regarding which the opinion is formed, in either of these two cases the direction issued can be successfully challenged as not being in accordance with law."

In our opinion, for the reasons which we have stated, it is clear to us that initially the Commissioner formed no opinion at all.

The passage which we have just quoted from Navnitlal's case also assists in disposing of another contention on behalf of the State. It has been the argument that the question whether certain lands are waste or arable lands is a matter to be decided in the opinion of the authority concerned and that the Courts are precluded from considering on what basis such an opinion was formed. In the first place we may point out that the sub-section itself does not use any expressions such as "in the opinion of the authority" or "to the satisfaction of the authority", so that by its terms the section gives no indication. But sub-s. (1) does say

"In cases of urgency, whenever the appropriate Government or the Commissioner so directs, the Collector... may... take possession of any waste or arable land needed for public purposes or for a Company".

The sub-section thus deals with five concepts as follows: (1) the existence of urgency, (2) a direction from the appropriate Government or the Commissioner, (3) waste or arable land, (4) need for a public purpose and (5) need for a Company. All these concepts are treated equally by the section and there is no indication that anyone is discretionary or subjective. It seems to us on a plain reading of the section that they are all conditions prescribed for the exercise of the power or jurisdiction of the Collector to take the citizens' property under those provisions. Upon the non-fulfilment or non-existence of any one of those conditions the exercise of the power must necessarily be interdicted. The conditions going to the root of the jurisdiction must be strictly fulfilled and are not left to the subjective satisfaction or opinion of the authority concerned. Secondly, the passage from Navnitlal's case which we have quoted is decisive of this question. We may only make one thing clear here. The word 'opinion' is used in sub-s. (4) in the clause

"In the case of any land to which, in the opinion of the Appropriate Government or the Commissioner the provisions of sub-section (1)... are applicable..." and it was urged on the strength of that word "opinion" thus used that all that is necessary is that the authority must be subjectively of that opinion and that Courts cannot look at the matter objectively and determine whether the conditions exist. The word "opinion" may import only a subjective satisfaction, but it must be pointed out that in sub-s. (4) the word "opinion" is used in the context of the duty to see whether sub-s. (1) is applicable to any land and not in the context of whether the conditions of sub-s. (1) are fulfilled or not. Those conditions as held in Navnitlal's case must be objectively proved. We then turn to examine whether the petitioners' land was "arable" land. We have already adverted to the return of the Commissioner. In para. 13 he has stated that the said lands are "agricultural lands" described as such in the Record of Rights. Nevertheless, the Commissioner has reiterated in para. 13 of his affidavit that the said lands are waste or arable lands within the meaning of s. 17 of the Land Acquisition Act. Here again, we may see the complete non-application of mind. On the one hand, the Commissioner himself asserts that the lands are agricultural lands and recorded as such and in the same breath he also adds that the lands are waste or arable. How agricultural lands could be waste lands it is difficult to see. No doubt, it has been pointed out to us in the arguments that in the sale deed filed by the petitioner of the purchase of the land by him it is mentioned that the 7 acres and 32 gunthas as agricultural lands and out of it 2 gunthas as Pot-Kharaba, that is to say, waste land, and that, therefore, the opinion of the Commissioner is justified. In the first place, the notification does not disclose this fact that the words "waste or arable lands" were used because of the two gunthas as Pot-Kharaba nor is that the explanation given even in the affidavit filed by the Commissioner. It seems that he was completely unaware of this fact until the petitioner filed the sale deed in this Court and the fact was noticed by counsel on behalf of the respondents. Apart from this the Commissioner's return obviously seems to equate agricultural lands with arable lands leaving out the question of waste land, which may apply to the two gunthas of land which is also in doubt. The principal point which arises, therefore, upon the provisions of s. 17(1) is whether agricultural land can be said to be arable land within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 17.

Upon this question, it has been pointed out that there are two decisions of this Court, one reported in *Jairam Balaji Anikar v. The State of Maharashtra*²⁵ and the other in Sadashiv Lahanu v. The State of Maharashtra.²⁶ In the first of these cases, the Division Bench referred to the earlier decision in Navnitlal's case and with reference to the question whether agricultural land can be arable land, they observed as follows:—

"The Commissioner has issued this Notification stating in the notification that in his opinion the land is arable land. We cannot accept the contention that the words 'arable land' would include land which is under cultivation either of agricultural crops or fruit-bearing trees from which income is derived by the land owner. It seems more consonant with the scheme of section 17 that it is only that land which is actually waste or which is arable, that is, which is culturable but which is not under crops or not being put to use for raising income to which the provisions of the urgency clause can be made applicable, so that nobody who is in possession and enjoyment of the land and raises crops or fruits by way of income is put to loss. It is unlikely that the Legislature could have intended that the urgency clause should be made applicable to lands which are under crops or on which fruit-bearing trees are standing".

This decision was followed in the subsequent case to which one of us (Kotval J.) was a party. In that decision also it was held that "arable land as the expression is used in s. 17, sub-s. (1), cannot include land which is under cultivation either of agricultural crops or fruit-bearing trees from which income is derived by the land owner".

Reference was also made to the meaning of the word "arable" as given in the Oxford English Dictionary, Vol. I, page 423 as "capable of being ploughed, fit for tillage". It was also pointed out that the provisions of s. 17(1) were, it appears, deliberately made applicable by the Legislature only to waste or arable lands and not to cultivated lands for obvious reasons. These decisions are binding upon us unless we take the view that they were wrongly decided in which case we would be bound to refer the point to a larger Bench.

²⁵ (1962) Special Civil Application No. 25 of 1962, decided by Kotval and Paranjpe JJ., on September 26, 1962 (Unrep.).

²⁶ (1962) Special Civil Application No. 93 of 1962, decided by Kotval and Paranjpe JJ., on November 9, 1962 (Unrep.).

In the face of these judgments, the learned Advocate General could only contend that these decisions are incorrect. It was urged that the decisions in these two Special Civil Applications Nos. 25 and 93 of 1962 were given without a consideration of the definition of "arable land" contained in s. 3(aa) and without looking at the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 17. The new definition in s. 3(aa) was introduced into the Land Acquisition Act by a local amendment by s. 2 of the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act XXVII of 1950. It is contended that that definition did not apply to the Vidarbha area from which the two cases cited above arose and that, therefore, the Division Benches had no occasion to consider the effect of that amendment and if the new amendment thus added is taken into account the decision would be different. It was also pointed out that some of the dictionaries give a wider meaning to the word "arable". Thus substantially three reasons have been advanced why the decisions in those two Special Civil Applications should not govern the present case. The first is that sub-s. (1) of s. 17 has not been correctly construed for the reason that sub-s. (3) of s. 17 was not noticed in any of those decisions; secondly, that in the Special Civil Application No. 93 of 1962 the meaning of the word "arable" as given in the Oxford Dictionary was followed, but that there are other Dictionaries which give an extension of the meaning as including land which is cultivated; thirdly, that the definition of "arable land" in s. 3(aa) of the Land Acquisition Act makes a crucial difference. We would deal with each one of these submissions separately.

Section 17 runs as follows:—

"Special powers in cases of urgency:—

(1) In cases of urgency, whenever the (appropriate) Government or the Commissioner so directs, the Collector, though no such award has been made, may, on the expiration of fifteen days from the publication of the notice mentioned in section 9, sub-section (1), take possession of any waste or arable land needed for public purposes or for a Company. Such land shall thereupon vest absolutely in the (Government) free from all encumbrances.

(2) Whenever, owing to any sudden change in the channel of any navigable river or other unforeseen emergency, it becomes necessary for any Railway Administration to acquire the immediate possession of any land for the maintenance of their traffic or for the purpose of making thereon a river-side or ghat station, or of providing convenient connection with or access to any such station, (or whenever owing to a like emergency or owing to breaches or other unforeseen events, causing damage to roads, rivers, channels or tanks, it becomes necessary for the State Government to acquire the immediate possession of any land for the purpose of maintaining road communication or irrigation or water supply service, as the case may be) the Collector may, immediately after the publication of the notice mentioned in sub-section (1) and with the previous sanction of the (appropriate) Government or the Commissioner enter upon and take possession of such land, which shall thereupon vest absolutely in the (Government) free from all encumbrances:

Provided that the Collector shall not take possession of any building or part of a building under this sub-section without giving to the occupier thereof at least forty-eight hours notice of his intention so to do, or such longer notice as may be reasonably sufficient to enable such occupier to remove his movable property from such building without unnecessary inconvenience.

(3) In every case under either of the preceding sub-sections the Collector shall at the time of taking possession offer to the persons interested compensation for the standing crops and trees (if any) on such land and for any other damage sustained by them caused by such sudden dispossession and not excepted in section 24; and, in case such offer is not accepted, the value of such crops and trees and the amount of such other damage shall be allowed for in awarding compensation for the land under the provisions herein contained.

(4) In the case of any land to which, in the opinion of the (appropriate) Government, or the Commissioner, the provisions of sub-section (1) or sub-section (2) are applicable, the (appropriate) Government may direct that the provisions of section 5-A shall not apply, and, if it does so direct, a declaration may be made under section 6 in respect of the land at any time after the publication of the notification under section 4, sub-section (1)".

Sub-section (1) of s. 17 deals with the question of taking possession of any waste or arable land needed for public purposes or for a Company and we have already indicated the conditions for the exercise of the power to take those lands. Sub-section (2) refers to any sudden change in the channel of any navigable river and/or other unforeseen emergency and is a power reserved to the authorities only where possession of any land becomes necessary for a railway administration. Sub-section (2), however, uses the words "any land" in contra-distinction with sub-section (1) where the words are "any waste or arable land". Sub-section (2) is thus not confined merely to waste or arable land as sub-s. (1) is. We are not concerned with the other requirements of sub-s. (2). It is upon the words of sub-s. (3) that emphasis is laid by the learned Advocate General. He says that the key word in this section is the word "either" preceding the words "of the preceding sub-sections" that is to say, it means "either of the sub-sections (1) or (2)". The argument is that the word "either" is used to imply both sub-ss. (1) and (2) and so reading it, it is impossible to apply sub-s. (3) unless we read into the word "arable" in sub-s. (1) the meaning that it includes cultivated lands also. It is urged that otherwise the subsequent words of sub-s. (3) "offer to the persons interested compensation for the standing crops and trees (if any) on such land..." would be rendered nugatory. The argument is that between sub-ss. (1) and (2) there are contemplated three categories of lands, waste land, arable land and any land and then sub-s. (3) says that in every case under either of the preceding sub-sections the Collector shall at the time of taking possession offer to the persons interested compensation for the standing crops and trees if any. Obviously, then, if arable land does not include cultivated land, then the words "crops and trees" could not apply, certainly not the word "crop" and, therefore, sub-s. (3) indicates that implicit in the meaning of the word "arable" is included cultivated land.

We are unable to accept this contention, because in the first place the word "either" in the opening clause of sub-s. (3) does not necessarily carry the meaning "both" as the Advocate General contends. The word "either" is used to mean "both" or "any one of two". In this case it is clear that it qualifies the words "preceding sub-sections." The expression is "in every case under either of the preceding sub-sections". So used it is clear that it is used as an adjective and according to the Oxford Dictionary its meaning is "each of the two". In Middle English its sense is indicated as "one or other of the two". It may also be used in the plural when it may imply both, but the Oxford Dictionary indicates that that sense is very rarely used. These senses are explained by a number of illustrations and one of the illustrations given is from Chesterton's letters as follows: "When the sun shines on either side of us (as it does mornings and evenings) the shadows are very long". Another example given is "The artificial thunder, in the hands of either nation, must have turned the fortune of the day". The word "either" in the expression "either of the preceding sub-sections" thus means "each of the two preceding sub-sections". So used it cannot possibly imply "both the sub-sections". What is more, the words are preceded by the words "In every case" which again emphasises that the sub-section deals with each individual case separately arising under each of the two sub-sections. We do not think that in the context in which it is used the word "either" implies "both" the preceding sub-sections, but what it means is "In every case under either sub-section (1) or sub-section (2)", or in other words "each of the two sub-sections". Moreover, we shall presently show that nothing turns upon the meaning of the word "either" and that the key words of the sub-section are the words, "if any" in the brackets and if one carefully considers why those words were at all put in, in the section the construction sought to be put upon the word "either" by the learned Advocate General must fail.

An analysis of the possible cases which may arise under sub-ss. (1) and (2), s. 17, will make the matter farther clear. In sub-s. (1) the words used are "waste or arable land" and in sub-s. (2) "any land". In sub-s. (3) compensation is to be given for the standing crops and trees (if any). Now it is clear that crops and trees cannot possibly exist in both cases of waste land and of arable land. In arable land there may be crops and trees and those trees may be of two kinds, growing spontaneously or cultivated by the hand of man but in waste land there can only be at the most wild trees of spontaneous growth, but there never can be crops in waste land. The draftsman of the section realized that the word "crops" in sub-s. (3) must be meaningless so far as sub-s. (1) is concerned viz. in its application to waste or arable land. It would have meaning so far as "any land" in sub-s. (2) is concerned. It is quite clear that sub-s. (3) is not limited to sub-s. (1). Sub-section (2), as we have pointed out, is concerned with any land which may include even cultivated land or a garden or a pasture or a building land and in such a case it may be that that land may contain crops or trees both wild and cultivated. Therefore, the words "crops and trees" can always apply to sub-s. (2), but the word "crops", it appears, cannot apply to sub-s. (1) but the word "trees" would apply in a certain measure to sub-s. (1) for trees of spontaneous growth may be found in both waste and arable land. The draftsman of sub-s. (3) envisaged all these various possible cases arising under sub-ss. (1) and (2) and since he was making a composite provision for both the sub-sections he first used the words "for the standing crops and trees" and realising that some part of that expression may not be applicable to the case arising under either sub-section he added the words in brackets "(if any)". It seems that these are the key words to the section, and furnish the real clue to the interpretation of the section.

The very fact that the draftsman of this piece of legislation used the words "(if any)" in brackets indicates that he thought that there would arise a conceivable case under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) where the words "standing crop or trees" would not apply or neither of them would apply as in the case of a completely barren piece of waste land. Therefore, since he was required to make a compendious provision covering all the possible cases in sub-s. (1) and (2), he used a composite expression "standing crops and trees" and added the words into brackets "(if any)". He thereby intended to convey "You must in every case pay compensation for standing crops or trees. If in any of the cases arising under sub-sections (1) and (2) there are or can be no crops then pay compensation only for the trees. If on the other hand in any of the cases arising under sub-sections (1) and (2) there are no trees but only standing crops then pay compensation for the crops. If in any of the cases arising under sub-sections (1) and (2) there are no standing crops and no trees then compensation need not be paid". That, in our opinion, is the only sense we can make out of the provisions of sub-s. (3). The draftsman had to put these separate ideas into one compact sentence. He realized that under sub-ss. (1) and (2) there were bound to arise a variety of cases. There would be trees only and no crops: or crops only and no trees: or neither trees nor crops: He wanted to include every variety into one sentence and therefore he said "standing crops or trees (if any)".

Were we to hold that the words "standing crops and trees" would apply to both sub-ss. (1) and (2) in their entirety, then in the first place, we would be rendering the words "(if any)" meaningless and of no effect and in the second place, we would be so construing the words as to give rise to an impossibility. For instance, in waste land there never can be standing crops, yet we would be so construing the sub-section that the words "standing crops" would apply even to waste lands. It is in precisely such a case that the words "(if any)" would come into operation. On the other hand, in waste land there may be wild trees of spontaneous growth standing, in which case the words "(if any)" would come into operation so far as the standing crops and cultivated trees are concerned. Similarly, in the case of arable lands, there can be no standing crops and may be no trees whatsoever and therefore, the words "(if any)" would come into operation. It is not necessary, therefore, to import by virtue of sub-s. (3) that meaning into "arable land" in sub-s. (1) which would include standing crops in arable land. We do not, therefore, think that sub-s. (3) in any way compels us to give to the meaning of the word "arable" any special connotation other than its normal connotation and that takes us to a consideration of what is the normal connotation of the word "arable" in the English language.

In the second of the two judgments, which we have cited above in Sadashiv Lahanu v. The State of Maharashtra, the Division Bench had occasion to refer to the meaning of the word as given in the Oxford Dictionary which is to be found in Vol. I at page 423. The meaning given is "capable of being ploughed; fit for tillage; opposed to pasture or woodland" and the illustrations there given are from Coke On Littleton, "If the tenant convert arable land into wood"; or from Rogers Agriculture & Prices "half the arable estate, as a rule, lay in fallow". Thus the word is used to indicate land which is capable of being ploughed or fit for tillage and in opposition to pasture land, that is to say grazing land, as it is called in this country—or woodland or forests and fallow land. Indeed, if one considers the origin of the words as given in the Oxford Dictionary, it comes from the "Littre arabilis, French arare to plough" and the word "arable" is the present pronunciation of what was in the early English the correct word "arable" or in the 16th century "errable, earable, aerable".

What is more significant, however, is what the Oxford Dictionary omits to mention. It does not mention any other sense in which the word "arable" could possibly be understood. Webster in his Dictionary shows a somewhat extended meaning and it is that meaning upon which strong reliance was placed on behalf of the respondents. Webster also mentions the same meaning as in the Oxford Dictionary to begin with "capable of being plowed; fit for tillage and crop production (with reference to land)" but then he gives the extended meaning as follows: "Brit: engaged in or involving the production of cultivated crops (farming); Brit, of crops: requiring cultivation; esp. seeded and grown annually rather than from the regrowth of an established sod; 2. Brit. of livestock; fed on cultivated crops (as roots) (the arable ewe going back on to the rough grazing—S.J. Watson)". As a noun the meaning given is "land that is tilled or tillable".

Thus even Webster makes a distinction between the adjectival use of the word "arable" and the noun "arable". It seems that the adjective has now begun to be used in Britain as a noun and so used, it is used indiscriminately for both "tilled and tillable" lands. The meaning, however, it is clear is of comparatively recent growth and it is not of universal use. In Britain it is used in a peculiar connotation, but its basic meaning still remains the same "fit for tillage and crop production or capable of being ploughed." It may be pointed out that this meaning is the same as occurs in 1902 edition of Webster's Dictionary and also in the Imperial Dictionary of 1882 where also the meaning is given "fit for ploughing or tillage; arable land, land which is cheaply cultivated by means of plough" as distinct from pasture land.

There is a clear conflict as to the extended meaning in the several dictionaries. One thing is at least clear that the original and basic meaning of the word "arable" was "fit for ploughing or tillage or capable of being ploughed". As to the extended meaning we would prefer to rely upon the Oxford Dictionary which is a work of great renown and a standard work on the meanings of words in the English language, and in that great work the extended meaning does not find place.

But though with the aid of counsel we have gone into this research as to the meaning of the word "arable" we think that the matter before us can be decided upon the judicial construction of the word and the meaning given to it in early English decisions. Where dictionaries differ, a judicial interpretation of the word even in a "persuasive" precedent would be of prime importance. In *Palmer v. M'Cormick*²⁷ Mr. Justice Chatterton expressed the meaning thus at page 119:

"... 'Arable' does not mean land actually ploughed up or in tillage, but land capable or fit to be so; and for aught I know this land, though properly designated arable in 1821, may even then have been in process of acquiring the character of ancient pasture, which process may have commenced, and been going on for some time".

The learned Vice Chancellor, therefore, clearly and definitely says that "arable" land does not mean land actually ploughed up or in tillage. In our opinion, that interpretation by a Judge whose understanding of the word we would prefer more than any dictionary should settle the issue. There is also a passage in the judgment of Tindal C. J. in Simmons v. Norton,²⁸ where the meaning of the word was not directly adverted to but discussion serves to illuminate that meaning (p. 647):—

"...Ploughing meadow land is also esteemed waste on another account; namely, that in ancient meadow, years, perhaps ages, must elapse before the sod can be restored to the state in which it was before ploughing. The law, therefore, considers the conversion of pasture into arable as prima facie injurious to the landlord, on those two grounds at least".

Here again, the learned Judge uses the word "arable" as ploughable land. In the same case Mr. Justice Fitz Gibbon at page 126 has used the words:

"...because it was not in grass for twenty years before the lease, and therefore by its omission from the suit and injunction, may be taken as arable land cultivable by the defendant at his discretion, but subject always to the husbandry covenants which secure all the lands against real 'waste'".

This decision was given in 1890 and nowhere was it suggested that "arable" meant land which is already cultivated or on which crops were grown. On the other hand, we have shown that Vice-Chancellor Chatterton has definitely said that the word "arable" does not imply cultivated land. We can see no reason why the decisions in the two cases should not be followed. There appears to be no doubt as to the meaning of the word "arable", nor is there any indication in sub-s. (3) or any other provision of s. 17 to indicate that the word "arable" has a special connotation and includes cultivated lands as well. Upon the citation of Webster's and other dictionaries wherein the extension of meaning has been shown, we suggested to the learned Advocate General at an early stage of the arguments on this point that if there was any doubt, we were prepared to refer this case to a larger Bench, but the learned Advocate General felt that that ought not to be done as it would delay the decision of this case. On fuller arguments we see no reason to doubt the earlier view taken in this Court.

Then we turn to the third contention as to whether the new definition added by local amendment makes any difference to the interpretation of the word "arable" in sub-s. (1) of s. 17. By the Amendment Act XXVII of 1950 a local amendment has been incorporated in s. 3 and in the definition clause the following clause has been added:—

"The expression 'arable land' includes garden land".

This definition, of course, did not come up for consideration before the two Division Benches which decided the earlier cases because that definition was not operative in the area in which those cases arose. The definition is only an inclusive definition and something which is included by an express statute may or may not be implicit in the original meaning. In our opinion, the inclusion of "garden land" in arable land is an artificial extension of the meaning of the expression "arable land" which the Legislature was always entitled to give. The inclusive definition would further emphasise the connotation which we have preferred, because the definition includes "garden land" in "arable" land which otherwise would not have been normally included. The expression "garden land" moreover is a peculiar expression and is not to be found in normal English. We have not been able to trace the word "garden" being used in conjunction with land in any dictionary and it seems to us that really the expression is, so to say, a technical expression borrowed from local legislation. For instance, a reference to "garden land" is to be found in s. 117C(6) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code where "Class of land" is defined as meaning "any of the following classes of land, namely, dry crop, rice or garden land". It seems to us that it was an expression conveniently coined as an English equivalent to the well recognised classification in the Hindi language of "Bagayat land". Reference to this shade of meaning may be found in Gupte's Land Revenue Code, 5th Ed. at page 683. We do not think, therefore, that the extension of the meaning of the words "arable land" given in the definition now incorporated in s. 3 of the Land Acquisition Act by the local amendment assists in the determination of or alters, the true meaning of the expression "arable land" as used in s. 17(I), except that by artificial extension it now includes Bagayat land.

Reference was then made to a passage in the decision we have already referred to in Navnitlal's case. At page 624 Mr. Justice Desai in discussing the affidavit put in by the Commissioner in that case observed as follows:—

"...From the affidavit in reply filed by the Commissioner, it does appear that the only ground on which the Commissioner has regarded the land as waste and arable is that it was not put to any present use and had no structure standing on it. An arable land is a land which is fit for tillage and the expression is usually used to mean lands which are ploughed for raising ordinary annual crops such as rice, jowar, etc." (italics are ours).

The learned Advocate General relied upon the words italicised in this quotation to urge that the words "arable land" have been judicially interpreted by that Division Bench to include cultivated land. From a perusal of the judgment it is quite clear that the learned Judge was not attempting to define the expression at all. He was referring to what the Commissioner in that case had regarded as waste and arable land and in that context he referred to the meaning of "arable land" as land which is fit for tillage and further observed that the expression is usually used to mean lands which are ploughed for raising ordinary annual crops such as rice, jowar, etc. With respect, we may point out that there is no authority referred to and no reasoning and it is clear that the remark was wholly obiter and that was also conceded by the learned Advocate General.

Having regard to the correct meaning of the word "arable" we do not think that the petitioner's lands in the present case were arable lands. That they were not waste lands is not disputed. On the interpretation which we have given to the word "arable" and upon the statement of the Commissioner himself that these are agricultural lands, therefore, it must be held that the petitioner's lands could not be taken under s. 17(I). It seems to us that the law in its wisdom deliberately excluded cultivated land from being thus taken under the urgency provisions. The intention of the law is clear as indicated in the judgment in Sadashiv Lahani v. The State of Maharashtra that where a person has expended time, money and labour in tilling the soil and in cultivating crops, the land should not be taken except under the normal procedure of the Land Acquisition Act. That interpretation which is consonant with the normal meaning of the words used is an interpretation which, in our opinion, is also just.

Some reference was made in the arguments before us to a decision of another Division Bench of this Court in Vithoba Rambhau Bahirat v. The Special Land Acquisition Officer, Poona.²⁹ to which decision my learned brother was a party. A perusal of the penultimate paragraph of that judgment unmistakably shows that so far as this point was concerned it was decided on a concession. It is categorically stated in the judgment itself that the learned counsel "does not seriously dispute that although they (the lands in that case) are in the City of Poona and have been included in the Town Planning Scheme, they are in fact put to use for agricultural purposes". Of course, the point was never argued before the Division Bench, whether the lands were arable lands and were being put to agricultural purposes and the attention of the Division Bench was not invited to the point which has been so seriously agitated before us. We cannot regard that decision as a decision contrary to the view which has already been taken by this Court and with which we are in agreement.

In connection with the point, which we have just decided, another ancillary question was raised by the learned Advocate General. He urged that even assuming that we take the view that the lands of the petitioner were not arable lands and could not be taken under s. 17(1), all the notifications issued in this case ought not to be held bad, but only those notifications which were issued from the point where the authorities went wrong. The effect of holding that s. 17(1) did not apply to the petitioner's lands would be that s. 5A would not be excluded and therefore the petitioner would be entitled to urge and be heard upon any objections to the acquisition which he may choose to take. It was urged that, therefore, the notification under s. 6 and the subsequent notification under s. 9 should alone be held bad, but not the notification under s. 4. On behalf of the petitioner, however, Mr. Bhatt contended that s. 4 is so inextricably intermingled with the other provisions of the Act that we cannot set aside only the notifications under ss. 6 and 9. He pointed out that under s. 5A he was entitled to show by taking objections, that the land was really not needed for a public purpose at all or that other land was available, or that only a part of the land ought to be taken, in which case even the notification under s. 4 would have to be held bad and unnecessary. He also relied upon the decision in Nawnittal's case where the Division Bench set aside all the notifications although they held that the notification under s. 17(1) was bad. In the view we have taken upon other points, we do not feel called upon to decide this question regarding the severability of the proceedings. Moreover, we have in this case also held that the notification under s. 4 is bad for other reasons. In that view, it is unnecessary to decide whether the principle of severability applies here.

In the result, we allow the petition and quash the notifications issued by respondent No. 1 under ss. 4 and 6 of the Land Acquisition Act. We also quash the notifications so far as s. 17 has been applied in this case and hold that the possession of the petitioner's land taken under those notifications under s. 17 was illegal and must be restored to the petitioner. The respondents will pay the costs of the petitioner. The order restoring possession is at the request of Mr. Setalvad for the State stayed upto October 1, 1964.

Petition allowed.

The proper test to determine what the true nature of a hire-purchase agreement is, is to look at the substance of the transaction, the intention of the parties in entering into that transaction, and what it is really intended by them to be. An option to purchase given to the buyer may be indicative that no sale may have been intended by the parties. The mere circumstance that an option to the buyer has been given may not necessarily involve the conclusion that it is not a sale, nor intended to be a sale. What has got to be considered is to consider the terms of the contract including the option which may have been given to the buyer under the terms of the contract and consider what is the real nature of the transaction.

In determining the true nature of a transaction of hire-purchase the term of option given to the hirer and the term of liberty reserved to him to return the goods during the continuance of the contract are terms which have an important bearing in determining the nature of the transaction; but they are not in every case conclusive of the nature of the transaction. They are of great help in determining the true nature of the transaction, but it is on a consideration of the entire terms of the contract read in the light of the surrounding circumstances that the true nature of the transaction has to be determined, and it is possible that even in cases where the option to purchase and the liberty to return the goods are reserved in the contract, the contract in its true nature may still be a contract of sale and not merely a contract of hiring with an option to purchase. It is necessary to see what is the purpose of introducing the terms as to the option to purchase and liberty to return the goods during the subsistence of the contract. If on a consideration of all the terms of the agreement, it is found that these terms have been intended for the benefit of a buyer who has not made up his mind to buy at the time when he entered into the contract, to leave him free to make up his mind at any later stage and have an option of buying or not buying the article and return it to the owner at any time he liked, then the contract will not be an agreement of sale. If, on the other hand, it is clear that the parties to the contract have intended it to be a sale although they have introduced these terms in the working out of the contract for their mutual benefit and convenience, the mere presence of the terms will not destroy the character of the contract between the parties as an agreement to buy and to sell. What is necessary to consider is whether the transaction in substance is a transaction of sale although an element of bailment is added to it, or whether it is a contract of hiring with an added offer to the hirer to buy the hired article at his option.

Transactions which are in substance sales or which contain to a predominant extent an element of sale in them can come within the expression "sale of goods" in entry 48 in the Provincial Legislative List in the Government of India Act, 1935, or entry 54 in the State List in the Constitution of India.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

P. P. Deo, V. J. Huddar and R. N. Jain, for the petitioner.

S. M. Hajarnavis, Assistant Government Pleader, for respondents Nos. 1 to 4.

V. S. DESAI J. This is a petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India challenging the notices issued by the Sales Tax Officers of Nagpur and Wardha to the petitioner and praying that a writ may be issued against the said Sales Tax Officers requiring them to withdraw the said notices and prohibiting them from assessing the petitioner to sales tax for the periods covered by the said notices.

The petitioner is a financing corporation, and according to it, it carries on the business of financing the purchase of motor vehicles. The petitioner has been carrying on its business at Bombay and it has a representative in Nagpur. On November 12, 1962, the Sales Tax Officer III, Circle II, Nagpur, served a notice on the petitioner directing the petitioner to show cause why it should not be assessed/reassessed and why a penalty should not be imposed on it on the ground that being a dealer liable to pay tax under the C.P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947 (XXI of 1947), in respect of the period between January 1, 1959, and December 31, 1959, it had wilfully failed to apply for registration. Another similar notice was issued by the Sales Tax Officer, Wardha, on November 26, 1962, relating to the same period. On December 10, 1962, one more notice was issued by the Sales Tax Officer III, Circle II, Nagpur, by which the petitioner was required to show cause why it should not be assessed for the entire period from June 1, 1950, to December 31, 1959, during which time it had been a dealer liable to pay sales tax under the Sales Tax Act and had wilfully failed to apply for registration.

The petitioner's case is that the petitioner is not a dealer. The transactions which it is carrying on are not sales; that it has not been carrying on the business within the territorial jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officers at Nagpur and Wardha; that its activities, if any, within the jurisdiction of these Sales Tax Officers are not the activities of a dealer; that the Sales Tax Officers have no jurisdiction to issue the notices for the periods for which they have purported to issue the said notices; and that the present notices which have been issued by the Sales Tax Officers are invalid on the ground that the notices in Form VI under s. 10(1) of the Act had never been given to the petitioner prior to the issue of the present notices.

In support of its case that the business transactions of the petitioner are not sales which could come within the definition of the expression in the Sales Tax Act, the petitioner gave the description of the nature of its transactions. According to the petitioner, a person desirous of purchasing a motor vehicle who had applied to the authorised dealer of the manufacturer and had selected a vehicle which he wanted to buy, had fixed up its price and also made the initial deposit with the dealer, approached the petitioner in case he needed financial help for making payment for the vehicle which he wished to purchase. For that purpose, he and his guarantor made a proposal to the petitioner in a particular form giving certain details as were required by it. This form, it would appear, is the form of a proposal of a hire-purchase agreement to be entered into by the customer with the petitioner. After the acceptance of this proposal by the petitioner, an agreement called a hire-purchase agreement was executed between the customer and his guarantor on the one hand and the petitioner on the other. This agreement of hire-purchase related to the vehicle which the customer had decided to buy from the dealer of the manufacturer. In this agreement, the petitioner was described as the owner and the purchaser as the hirer. After this agreement was executed between the parties, the petitioner informed the dealer of the manufacturer that it had agreed to finance the purchase and requested the dealer to send a debit note for the amount of the bill less the amount received by the dealer from the purchaser. The dealer thereafter delivered the vehicle to the customer and sent the bill to the petitioner. The customer also passed a receipt to the petitioner for having received the vehicle in good order and condition, complete with all tools and accessories in accordance with the terms and conditions of the agreement between him and the petitioner. After the receipt of the vehicle by the customer, he applied to the Regional Transport Authority and got the vehicle registered in his name. In the application, however, which the customer would make to the Regional Transport Authority, he had to state that the vehicle was held by him under a hire-purchase agreement with the petitioner. According to the petitioner, all transactions of this nature which were entered into by the petitioner with its customers were entered into in Bombay and were also executed there. All the instalments which were due to be received by the petitioner from its customers in respect of these transactions were also payable at Bombay. According to the petitioner, therefore, it did not carry on any business of selling or supplying motor vehicles but acted merely as a financier. It had no show room, no warehouse and no workshop either at Bombay or at Nagpur.

The petitioner's case is that having regard to the nature of the transactions which the petitioner had with its customers, it was merely a transaction of financing the customer. There was involved no sale of any vehicle from the petitioner to the customer. The customer bought the vehicle from the dealer of the manufacturer by applying to the dealer in a prescribed form accompanied by a written guarantee by a bank undertaking to pay to the dealer. The agreement of hire-purchase entered into by the customer with the petitioner was only for the purpose of enabling the petitioner to finance the customer for the purpose of his purchase of the vehicle from the dealer. The petitioner, therefore, contends that it was not a dealer under the Sales Tax Act and was under no obligation to get itself registered as a dealer under the said Act.

The petitioner's case further is that even assuming that in view of the agreements of hire-purchase entered into by the customers with the petitioner the transactions were in fact hire-purchase agreements, such hire-purchase agreements would not amount to sales of goods, so as to be capable of being made subject to tax under the Sales Tax Act. The petitioner's contention is that the term "hire-purchase" in Explanation (I) to the definition of "sale" in the Sales Tax Act will not apply to transactions of the nature which have taken place between the petitioner and its customers and alternatively, if that Explanation was intended to apply to these transactions, it was beyond the competence of the State Legislature to tax such transactions. It was contended by the petitioner that even assuming that the transactions between the petitioner and its customers were liable to payment of sales tax, the present notices which have been issued by the Sales Tax Officers to the petitioner were invalid and incompetent as notices under s. 10(1) in Form VI had not been issued to the petitioner prior to the issuance of the said notices. The present notices which are purported to be issued under s. 11(5) or s. 11-A of the Sales Tax Act could not be issued for periods of more than three years prior to the date of the notice, and inasmuch as the periods mentioned in the present notices go beyond the said period of three years, they are invalid and incompetent. The petitioner has, therefore, prayed for appropriate writs quashing the said notices requiring the Sales Tax Officers to withdraw the said notices and prohibiting them from taking any further action on the said notices.

In the affidavit which has been filed in reply to the petition by the respondents, some of the facts mentioned in the petition are controverted. It is contended on behalf of the respondents that the nature of the transactions between the petitioner and its customers is such that the petitioner purchases vehicles from the dealer of the manufacturer and sells the same on hire-purchase basis to the customers. The petitioner thus carries on the business of selling motor vehicles on hire-purchase basis and is, therefore, a "dealer" as defined in the Sales Tax Act. The respondents contend that the petitioner has its sub-office at Nagpur wherefrom it carries on the business of purchasing motor vehicles at Nagpur and other places in the Vidarbha area. It is contended by the respondents that the notices which have been issued by the Sales Tax Officers to the petitioner are under s. 11(5) of the Sales Tax Act and they are perfectly good and competent. According to the respondents, the transactions between the petitioner and its customers are transactions which come within Explanation (I) to the definition of "sale" in the Sales Tax Act and the said Explanation is perfectly intra vires and not outside the competence of the State Legislature.

At the hearing of this petition, Mr. Hajarnavis, learned Assistant Government Pleader appearing for the respondents, raised a preliminary contention. According to him, the petition involves several disputed questions of fact on the allegations contained in the petition and the reply given to the said allegations by the respondents. Secondly, he said that all that has happened at present is that notices have been issued by the Sales Tax Officers to the petitioner requiring it to show cause why it should not be assessed to sales tax for a certain period. It is possible for the petitioner to appear before the Sales Tax Officers and show cause and satisfy them that it is not liable to pay tax in respect of its transactions. The mere circumstance that notices have been issued by the Sales Tax Officers to the petitioner does not give any cause to the petitioner to come to this Court on a writ petition.

Now, it is no doubt true that on a writ petition this Court will not go into any disputed questions of fact. It is also true that unless the petitioner has a grievance which it can legitimately make on a writ petition, this Court will not entertain a writ petition only in order to decide questions which can well be agitated and decided in a proper forum before which the proceedings between the parties are pending. Mr. Deo, learned advocate for the petitioner, however, has submitted that he does not wish to urge in this petition any questions of disputed fact but will only confine himself to such contentions as are permissible to be made on a writ petition at the present stage. He has stated that he wishes to urge only three contentions before us, namely—

(i) that the notices issued in Form XII by the Sales Tax Officers to the petitioner under s. 11(5) of the Sales Tax Act are invalid and incompetent by reason of the notices in Form VI under s. 10(1) not having been issued to it earlier;

(ii) that at any rate, in so far as the notices issued by the Sales Tax Officers seek to assess the petitioner for a period which is more than three years prior to the date of the issue of the notices, the said notices are beyond the authority of the Sales Tax Officers and, therefore, incompetent; and

(iii) that on the nature of the transactions between the petitioner and its customers of the type described by the respondents themselves in their affidavit, he would contend that such transactions do not amount to sales under the Sales Tax Act, and that if the extended definition of "sale" given in Explanation (I) to that definition seeks to include the transactions of this nature within its ambit, the said Explanation is beyond the legislative competence of the State Legislature in a legislation enacted under entry 48 of the Provincial Legislative List in the Government of India Act, 1935, or under entry 54 of the State List under the Constitution of India.

According to Mr. Deo, his first two contentions are to the effect that the proceedings sought to be instituted against the petitioner by the Sales Tax Officer by the notices issued by them are illegal and without jurisdiction, and the third contention which he seeks to raise relates to the vires of a legislative provision. Mr. Deo contends that all these contentions can legitimately be urged on an application under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution, and the present stage at which they are sought to be urged cannot be said to be in any way inappropriate or premature. In our opinion, if the present writ petition is confined only to the three points which Mr. Deo wants to agitate it would be perfectly competent and not open to objection in the nature of a preliminary contention that it is not maintainable: (see for instance *Carl Still G.m.b.H. v. State of Bihar*¹; *The State of Bombay v. The United Motors (India) Ltd.*²; *Calcutta Discount Co. v. I.T. Officer*³ and The Sales Tax Officer, Pilibhit v. Messrs Budh Prakash Jai Prakash.⁴) We will, therefore, proceed to deal with and dispose of this petition only on the three points which are stated above.

Before proceeding to deal with the three contentions which have been urged by Mr. Deo, it will be desirable to refer to some of the provisions of the C.P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947 (hereafter referred to as the Act). Under the said Act, a "dealer" is a person carrying on the business of selling or supplying or buying goods. "Sale" has been defined as any transfer of property in goods for cash or deferred payment or other valuable consideration including a transfer of property in goods made in course of the execution of a contract but not including a mortgage, hypothecation, charge or pledge. Explanation (I) to the said definition states that a transfer of goods on hire-purchase or other instalment system of payment shall, notwithstanding that the seller retains a title to any goods as security for payment of the price, be deemed to be a sale. There is a second Explanation to the said definition but it is not material to be stated. "Turnover" under the Act means the aggregate of the amounts of sale prices and parts of sale prices received or receivable by a dealer in respect of the sale or supply of goods or in respect of the sale or supply of goods in the carrying out of any contract, effected or made during the prescribed period. "Year" under the Act is a financial year from April 1, to March 31, of the subsequent year or at the option of the assessee, the account year followed by him. Section 4 of the Act is the charging section, and it provides that every dealer whose turnover during the year exceeds certain specified limits will be liable to pay tax. All dealers whose turnover during the year preceding the commencement of the Act exceeded the specified limits became liable to pay tax under the Act from the commencement of the Act. In respect of other dealers, they became liable to pay tax from the date of the expiry of two months after the month up to the end of which their turnover calculated from the commencement of the year or from the commencement of the date of their business, if they were in business for less than twelve months, exceeded the specified limits. A dealer who is liable to pay tax continues to be so liable until the expiry of a period of three consecutive years during each of which his turnover has not exceeded the specified limits and such further period as may be prescribed by the rules. It will thus be seen that the liability of a dealer to pay tax is dependent upon his turnover exceeding certain specified limits. The liability comes in when the turnover exceeds the said specified limits and continues to be in existence for a period of three years after the turnover has fallen below the specified limits for three consecutive years. Under s. 8 of the Act it is provided that every dealer who is liable to pay tax has got to get himself registered and possess a registration certificate during the interval during which he is liable to pay tax. The procedure for registration of dealers has been provided in Part IV of the Rules made under the Act. Under s. 9 a list of the registered dealers is required to be published by the State Government. Section 10 provides that every registered dealer shall furnish such returns by such dates and to such authorities as may be prescribed and the rules prescribed in that connection are rules 19 to 21 contained in Part V of the Rules. The said section also provides that every dealer may be required by the Commissioner by a notice served in the prescribed manner to submit a return. The prescribed manner is provided by rule 22 which occurs in Part V of the Rules.

Under sub-s. (3) of s. 10, failure on the part of an unregistered dealer to comply with the requirements of a notice issued to him under sub-s. (1) and failure on the part of a registered dealer to furnish his return for any period within the prescribed period have been made liable to the imposition of a penalty by the Commissioner after giving the defaulter an opportunity of being heard. Section 11 deals with the assessment of dealers to tax. The first three sub-sections of this section apply to all dealers, i.e. registered as well as unregistered. Under sub-s. (1) the Commissioner may accept the returns furnished by dealer and assess him on the said returns without any further inquiry if he finds that the returns are satisfactory. In the event of the Commissioner not being satisfied with the returns submitted, under sub-s. (2) he is enabled to serve a notice on the dealer furnishing the return to appear before him either by himself or by a representative for the purpose of being examined on oath and furnishing information with regard to the return submitted, or for the production of other evidence and accounts for the purpose of assessment and assess him to tax under sub-s. (3) after hearing him and after having examined the other evidence. Sub-section (4) of s. 11 applies only to registered dealers and authorises the Commissioner to assess a registered dealer to a best judgment assessment in the event of the defaults specified in the said sub-section having been committed by the dealer. The manner in which the best judgment assessment will be made by the Commissioner is prescribed in rule 32 contained in Part VII of the Rules. Sub-section (5) of s. 11 is a provision which relates to the best judgment assessment of an unregistered dealer. The conditions on the satisfaction of which the best judgment assessment of an unregistered dealer can be made are specified in the said sub-section, and the manner in which the assessment will be made is prescribed in rule 32 which is an omnibus rule providing for other matters as well. Section 11-A of the Act is a provision which provides for the assessment of a turnover which has escaped assessment.

The provisions so far referred to are mainly the provisions which we may have to consider in deciding the questions which have been raised before us on the present petition. The other provisions to which a passing reference may have to be made are the provisions of s. 15 which authorises the Commissioner to require any dealer to produce before him any accounts, registers or documents relevant to the financial transactions of the dealer or to furnish information relating to the stocks of goods, or purchases, sales and deliveries of goods made by him, and s. 16 under which the Commissioner is authorised to delegate his powers under the Act to persons appointed under s. 3 to assist him.

With regard to the first point raised by Mr. Deo, his contention is that in the case of an unregistered dealer, a notice under s. 10(1) of the Act is obligatory before a proceeding for a best judgment assessment can be started against him under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 of the Act. It is urged in that connection that the scheme of the Act shows that the dealers who are liable to pay tax under s. 4 are under an obligation to get themselves registered under s. 8 and also under an obligation to submit returns of their taxable turnover in the prescribed manner and at prescribed intervals under s. 10. The assessment of registered dealers proceeds after the stage of the submission of returns by them as provided under the Act is passed. In the case of unregistered dealers there is no obligation to submit any return unless they are called upon by a notice served on them under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 to do so by the Commissioner. Section 11 which provides for the assessment of registered dealers also provides for the assessment of unregistered dealers, and the scheme of the said section will show that just as in the case of registered dealers so also is the case of unregistered dealers, its application comes in after the stage of the submission of the returns by him is over, and their assessment is only consequent on their having been called upon to furnish returns under s. 10(1) of the Act. The first three sub-s. of s. 11 apply both to registered dealers as well as to unregistered dealers. The first sub-section provides in the case of either of them that if the returns which are submitted by them are satisfactory, they can be assessed on the basis of the said returns without further inquiry. If the returns which they have submitted are not satisfactory, then under sub-s. (2) the Commissioner may call upon them or their representatives to appear before him, so that he can examine them on oath or he may call upon them to produce evidence or accounts etc. to satisfy himself with regard to the returns. The notice under sub-s. (2) of s. 11 calling upon registered as well as unregistered dealers is governed by the same rule, namely, rule 31 of the Rules. Under sub-s. (3), assessment is authorised to be made on the examination of the returns and on the examination of the further evidence if any called for by the Commissioner. Sub-section (4) of s. 11 relates to the best judgment assessment of a registered dealer who has committed faults which are specified in the sub-section. These faults are that he has either not furnished returns, or that after having furnished returns, he has not complied with the notice issued to him under sub-s. (2), or that he has not employed a regular method of accounting which would enable the Commissioner to make a proper assessment. It would be clear from the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 11, says the learned advocate, that the stage of making a best judgment assessment against a registered dealer can only be reached after the stage of submission of returns which the registered dealer is under a statutory obligation to furnish under s. 10 is over and the registered dealer has disentitled himself to a regular assessment by reason of the defaults committed by him. The provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is a provision relating to the best judgment assessment of unregistered dealers. The argument of the learned advocate is that as in the case of a registered dealer so in the case of an unregistered dealer this provision is not intended to apply unless the unregistered dealer has disentitled himself to a regular assessment which in his case can only be by calling upon him to furnish a return under s. 10(1) of the Act. Mr. Deo contends that in the case of a registered dealer, the statute has made no provision requiring the Commissioner to give him a notice to submit his returns. On the other hand, it has put the obligation on the registered dealer himself to submit returns in the prescribed manner and at the prescribed intervals. The jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officer, therefore, to proceed to assess in the case of the registered dealer cannot be said to depend upon the issuance of a notice to him to submit returns. There is however no such jurisdiction in the Sales Tax Officer to assess an unregistered dealer in the absence of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10. The first step to bring the unregistered dealer to assessment is to issue a notice to him under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 and it is the issuance of this notice that gives jurisdiction to the Sales Tax Officer to proceed to assessment against him under s. 11. It is, therefore, contended by the learned advocate that a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory in the case of the unregistered dealer before he can be assessed under the provisions of s. 11 including the provision of best judgment assessment under sub-s. (5) of that section.

The second argument of the learned advocate in this connection is that even on the language employed in sub-s. (5) of s. 11 it will be apparent that that sub-section is intended to come into operation only after the returns as required by sub-s. (1) of s. 10 have been furnished by the unregistered dealer and assessment proceedings on the basis of the said returns have commenced or taken place before the Sales Tax Officer. Sub-section (5) of s. 11 specifies the conditions subject to which the provision can be applied. These conditions are that information must have come into the possession of the Commissioner which is sufficient to satisfy him that the dealer was liable to pay tax under the Act in respect of any period and that he had wilfully failed to apply for registration. According to the learned advocate, the information which is spoken of in this sub-section is the information which comes into the possession of the Commissioner during the assessment proceedings commenced on the returns submitted by the unregistered dealer in compliance with the notice issued to him under sub-s. (1) of s. 10. It is the information which the Commissioner obtains subsequent to the returns submitted under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, or at any rate, subsequent to the notice issued by him under sub-s. (1) of s. 10. The stage of operation of the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11, therefore, can only be reached after a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 has been issued. The learned advocate has sought to derive support for his submissions from a decision of the former Nagpur High Court in *Nimar Cotton Press v. Sales Tax Officer*⁵ and certain observations of the Supreme Court in the case of Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Asst. Commr. of Sales Tax.⁶

Now, under the Act, liability to pay tax arises under s. 4 in case of the dealer whose turnover exceeds the specified limits and comes into existence from the point of time as specified in the section and also continues in accordance with the provisions of the said section. The liability to pay tax is neither dependent on the dealer registering himself under s. 8, nor is it dependent on the issuance of a notice to the dealer under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 of the Act. The jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officer to assess a dealer is derived under s. 11 and that jurisdiction to assess is again not dependent upon whether a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 has been issued or not issued to the unregistered dealer. In *Central Potteries Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra*⁷ a contention was raised before the Supreme Court that the jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officer to take proceedings for assessment with respect to the unregistered dealer depends on the issuance of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 and rule 22. The contention was negatived and it was observed (p. 476):

"...It is contended that the jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officer to take proceedings for assessment with respect to non-registered dealers depends, on the issue of a notice such as is prescribed by section 10 and rule 22 and that as no such notice had been issued in the case of the appellant, the assessment proceedings must be held to be incompetent, if the registration certificate is invalid. We see no force in this contention. The taxing authorities derive their jurisdiction to make assessments under sections 4 and 11 of the Act, and not under section 10, which is purely procedural."

The argument of the learned advocate, therefore, that the Sales Tax Officer would have no jurisdiction to assess an unregistered dealer unless he has in the first place issued a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 to him cannot be sustained. It is, however, argued that even though the proceedings of assessment held in the absence of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 cannot be said to be incompetent on the ground of want of inherent jurisdiction in the Sales Tax Officer in view of the observations of the Supreme Court in the case referred to above, the said observations do not go to the extent of saying that no notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 even as a procedural matter is required to be given or that the provision can be ignored by the Sales Tax Officer. The argument of the learned advocate is that even if it is regarded that the provision of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is a procedural provision, it is nevertheless a provision which the Sales Tax Officer is required to follow under the law and the proceedings which he purports to hold without following the proper procedure could be complained of by the petitioner, so that the fault in the procedure can be corrected and the Sales Tax Officer could be compelled to adhere to the proper provisions of law. The question to be considered, therefore, is whether the provision of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is required to be followed by the Sales Tax Officer in every case of assessment of an unregistered dealer, or whether there may exist cases under the Act in which the assessment of an unregistered dealer can take place even without the issuance of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10.

Now, it seems to us that the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is an enabling provision which the Commissioner may resort to when he is proceeding to consider the assessment of an unregistered dealer. Where such a notice is issued to the unregistered dealer and he complies with the said notice and furnishes returns, those returns will be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the first three sub-sections of s. 11. If in the proceedings of assessment or in the inquiry made in the said proceedings, information comes into the possession of the Sales Tax Officer which provides the necessary satisfaction under sub-s. (5) of s. 11, the provision of the said sub-section can also be resorted to against the unregistered dealer. It must, however, be noted that the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 do not appear to be confined to what transpires in the assessment proceedings instituted on the basis of the returns submitted by the unregistered dealer in pursuance of the notice issued under sub-s. (1) of s. 10. We have already referred to the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 11 which relate to the best judgment assessment in the case of a registered dealer. A perusal of the said provisions makes it clear that the best judgment assessment as against a registered dealer is resorted to for defaults connected with the returns submitted by him. It is either for failure to submit the returns altogether or for submitting faulty returns or maintaining a faulty system of account which does not enable the Commissioner to make a proper assessment on the returns submitted by him, that the best judgment assessment provision is applied against the registered dealer. The provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 however do not confine it to any faults of not submitting returns which the unregistered dealer is called upon to furnish under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, or any faults contained in the returns submitted. The conditions which are required to be satisfied for the operation of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 as against the unregistered dealer are entirely different and relate to the evasion of tax by him. The conditions which are required to be satisfied are that the dealer was liable to tax during a certain period and that he had evaded the liability to pay tax for that period by not getting himself registered wilfully. It may be that this information may be discovered on the proceeding instituted against the unregistered dealer on the notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 issued against him; but it does not appear that the application of the provision is only confined to such cases. It is possible that the Commissioner may have the necessary information which might give him the satisfaction such as is required under the said sub-section even without any notice having been issued to the unregistered dealer in the first place and without his having submitted any return in pursuance of the said notice. Under s. 15 of the Act, the Commissioner has power to require any dealer to produce before him accounts, registers and documents relevant to the financial transactions of the dealer, as also information relating to the stock of goods, purchases, sales and deliveries of the goods effected by him. This information the Sales Tax Department is entitled to call from any dealer irrespective of whether a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 has been issued to him or not. If on the information received in this manner, the Commissioner is satisfied with regard to the conditions mentioned in sub-s. (5) of s. 11, he would be entitled to invoke his jurisdiction under that sub-section irrespective of whether he had issued any prior notice to the unregistered dealer under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, or not. It does not, therefore, appear that the procedural requirement of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is necessary to be followed in every case where the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 are intended to be resorted to by the Commissioner. As we have already pointed out, the application of the said provisions is not necessarily confined to assessment proceedings commenced on returns filed in compliance with a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10. The provisions aim at cases of evasion of tax and not for punishing defaults in the matter of submission of returns. It seems to us, therefore, that the argument of the learned advocate that a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory before the proceedings under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can be taken against an unregistered dealer cannot be sustained.

We may also point out in this connection that rule 32 of the rules framed under the Act, which specifies amongst other things, the manner in which the assessment under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can be made, provides that for the proceedings to be taken under the said sub-section, a notice in Form XII specifying the default committed by the unregistered dealer—which in this case would be that he being liable to tax, had wilfully failed to apply for registration—and calling upon him to show cause why he should not be assessed in the manner provided in the said sub-section will have to be served on him and thereafter the assessment made in the manner provided in the said rule. Form XII in which the said notice is to be given shows that the dealer is directed to attend in person or by his representative and to produce his account books and documents specified in the notice or any other evidence on which he may rely. From the provisions of sub-s. (5), therefore, it would appear that its operation is brought in on the satisfaction of the conditions mentioned therein and its application is made in the manner provided by rule 32. There is nothing in the provision itself which would indicate that its application will necessarily come in only after the submission of returns by an unregistered dealer.

Coming now to the cases which have been referred to by the learned advocate in this connection, the first of them is Nimar Cotton Press v. Sales Tax Officer. The question as to whether a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 in Form VI was obligatory for assessing an unregistered dealer was considered in that case. It would seem however that the case does not lay down a proposition as wide as the learned advocate has put before us, namely, that in every case of assessment of an unregistered dealer under sub-s. (5) of s. 11, a prior notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory. The learned Judges in that case proceeded to consider the unregistered dealers in two categories, namely—

(i) those who had not got themselves registered and submitted returns under a bona fide belief that they were not dealers within the Act or their taxable turnover did not exceed the taxable quantum provided under s. 4: and

(ii) those who, though they believed were dealers and liable to registration, had wilfully failed to apply for registration;

and the view they took was that in the case of unregistered dealers falling in the first category, since they could not be regarded as having wilfully failed to apply for registration, the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can have no operation against them and in their case, therefore, if at all they were to be assessed, the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 will have to be followed. The learned Judges observed (p. 439):

“...Unless, therefore, the Sales Tax Officer is satisfied that an unregistered dealer has wilfully failed to apply for registration, he cannot commence proceedings under Section 11, sub-section (5). The proper procedure for him is to issue a notice under Section 10, sub-section (1), and after hearing such evidence as may be tendered in support of the return, or if the dealer contends that he is not liable to pay any tax. after hearing such evidence as he may adduce, the Sales Tax Officer has to decide his liability as a dealer and to assess him to tax if he is held liable.... In our opinion, therefore, a notice in Form No. VI is obligatory in case of unregistered dealers unless the Sales Tax Officer is satisfied that the unregistered dealer has wilfully failed to apply for registration."

Now, in the present case, the notice under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 has been issued to the petitioner by the Sales Tax Officer on the basis that he is satisfied that the conditions as to the application of the said provision exist in the case of the petitioner. Whether his satisfaction is justified or not would be decided by him on the cause being shown by the petitioner, and if on the cause being shown the Sales Tax Officer is satisfied that the dealer is not liable to tax or that he has not wilfully failed to apply for registration, the proceedings which are sought to be instituted against him will come to an end. We are, however, not concerned with the result of the proceedings. What we are concerned with is whether the notice which is at present issued by the Sales Tax Officer to the petitioner is competent or not. Even on the authority referred to by the learned advocate such a notice would be competent if the dealer was liable to registration and knowing that he was a dealer and liable to registration, had wilfully failed to apply for registration. The case which the learned advocate has cited does not support his contention that a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory in every case where action under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is intended to be taken against an unregistered dealer.

Mr. Deo has then invited our attention to the case in Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Asst. Commr. of Sales Tax. That was a case of a registered dealer who had not submitted his returns for certain periods and notices under sub-s. (4) of s. 11 were issued by the Sales Tax Department against him for periods which were beyond three years from the date of the notice. It was contended on behalf of the assessee that under s. 11-A of the Act it was not competent for the Sales Tax Authorities to assess him in respect of the escaped assessment for a period beyond three years of the notice issued to him. It was argued on behalf of the Department that s. 11-A had no application to an assessment which was proposed to be made under sub-s. (4) of s. 11. Their Lordships of the Supreme Court were mainly concerned in that case with the true construction of the provisions of s. 11-A. In view of the contentions raised before them, they examined the scheme of the Act and the provisions of ss. 10 and 11, with reference to registered and unregistered dealers. With reference to an unregistered dealer, they pointed out that there was no statutory obligation cast on him to submit any return and his case was really a case of evasion from his obligation to get himself registered under the Act. Section 10(1) enabled the Commissioner to issue a notice to him to furnish a return in the prescribed manner, and where that was done, the first three sub-sections of s. 11 had also to be followed in the matter of his assessment. Their Lordships then observed (p. 986):

"But sub-section (5) of section 11 introduces a stringent provision to prevent evasion of tax. Under that sub-section if upon information the Commissioner is satisfied that any such dealer, who is liable to pay tax under the Act in respect of any period, has wilfully failed to apply for registration, he shall at any time within three calendar years from the expiry of such period, after giving the dealer a reasonable opportunity of being heard, proceed in the manner as may be prescribed to assess to the best of his judgment the amount of tax due from the dealer in respect of such period and of subsequent periods. He may also direct the dealer to pay, by way of penalty, in addition to the amount of tax so assessed a sum not exceeding $1\frac{1}{2}$ times that amount. So in the case of a dealer liable to pay tax, but who has failed to register himself under the Act, the Commissioner may issue a notice to him under rule 22 and assess him under section 11; and in the case of evasion, on subsequent information, the Commissioner can assess him within three calendar years from the expiry of the period in respect of which he was liable to pay tax and for subsequent years and also impose a penalty on him. It is clear from this provision that in the case of such a dealer the assessment can be made only within three calendar years from the expiry of the period in respect whereof he has been liable to pay tax under the Act. If the contention of learned counsel for the respondent should prevail, in the case of a registered dealer there would be no limitation in the matter of assessment, whereas in the case of a dealer who evaded law, he would have the benefit of the three years' limitation." (Italics are ours).

Mr. Deo has relied on the observations quoted above for his submission that these observations support his argument that a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory in the case of an unregistered dealer before the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 are resorted to against him. The portion of the observations particularly relied upon in this connection by the learned advocate is the portion italicized by us. The notice under rule 22 in the above observations is the notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, and the submission of the learned advocate is that in view of these observations the Commissioner has to issue such notice, then proceed to assess him under s. 11, and only on subsequent information the Commissioner can assess him under sub-s. (5) for the period for which he was liable to pay tax and during which he had wilfully failed to apply for registration. In our opinion, these observations do not mean what the learned advocate wants to say that in every case a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is necessary, and it is only on the information gathered in the proceedings of assessment held in pursuance of the return submitted in compliance with the said notice that the provision of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can be resorted to.

We may refer to the observations of Raghubar Dayal J. in the same decision dealing with the provisions of ss. 10 and 11 of the Act. It may be pointed out that although the judgment of Raghubar Dayal J. is a dissenting judgment, the dissent is not with reference to the interpretation of the scope of s. 11(5) with which we are concerned in the present case. His Lordship points out that the procedure for assessment of tax is the same, both for the registered dealer and the ordinary dealer, in case both of them furnish the returns of the turnover as required by the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 10 and also comply, if required, with the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 11. Different procedure is required to be followed if the two types of dealers do not file returns or, after filing returns, do not respond to the notice issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 11. The Act does not provide for the Sales Tax Officer's taking steps for the assessment of the tax on the ground of the unregistered dealer's not complying with either notice, i.e. when the unregistered dealer does not submit a return, or after submitting a return which is not accepted, does not respond to the notice under sub-s. (2) of s. 11. His Lordship then observed (p. 992):

"The Sales Tax Officer can, however, proceed against such a dealer under sub-section (5) of section 11 and will probably do so as the conduct of the unregistered dealer would tend to confirm the information which led him to issue notice under section 10(1); but his action will be not on the ground that the dealer had made default in furnishing the return or had failed to comply with the notice issued under sub-section (2) of section 11 but will be on the ground that according to his information the dealer had been liable to pay tax under the Act in respect of that period and had, nevertheless, wilfully failed to apply for registration."

Mr. Deo has relied on the part of the observations quoted above where it is said that the procedure under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 will be adopted by the Sales Tax Officer because the conduct of the unregistered dealer in not submitting the return in compliance with the notice issued to him under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 would confirm the information of the Commissioner which led him to issue such notice, and has contended that that would indicate that a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory before the provision of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is invoked against the unregistered dealer. We are, however, afraid that the said observation does not give any such indication because later on his Lordship has observed: (p. 992):

"...If such a dealer had been one to whom a notice under sub-section (1) of section 10 had been issued and had failed, without any sufficient cause, to comply with the requirements of that notice, he could also be ordered to pay, by way of penalty, a sum not exceeding one-fourth the amount of the tax which is assessed on him under section 11, in view of the provisions of sub-section (3) of section 10."

It does not appear from this observation that his Lordship considers that in every case where the provision of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is applied, a prior notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 is obligatory. It may be that even when the provision of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is intended to be applied, the Commissioner may as a first step give a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, and if that notice is not complied with, apart from the consequences to which the dealer may be subjected under the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 11, he will be liable to a further penalty under sub-s. (3) of s. 10 for failure to comply with that notice. That does not however mean that it is obligatory to give a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 as a first step in every case. In our view, therefore, the observations in the Supreme Court case on which reliance is sought to be placed by Mr. Deo do not help him in support of his submission. On the other hand, some of the observations in this case appear to indicate the contrary. Thus, for instance, in the majority judgment in this case it has been observed that a case of an unregistered dealer is a case of evasion from his obligation to get himself registered under the Act. In the judgment of Raghubar Dayal J., his Lordship points out that the action under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is not on the ground that the dealer had made default in furnishing the return or had failed to comply with the notice issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 11 but will be on the ground that the dealer was liable to pay tax under the Act but had nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration. It would, therefore, appear to us that the invoking of the powers under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is not dependent on a prior notice for submission of the return issued to an unregistered dealer under sub-s. (1) of s. 10; its dependence is entirely on the fulfilment of the conditions which are specified in the section itself, namely, that there must be satisfaction of the Commissioner on the information which is in his possession that the dealer was liable to pay tax for a certain period and that during that period he had wilfully failed to apply for registration. If these conditions are satisfied, the power under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 would be invoked against the unregistered dealer and exercised in the manner stated in the said sub-section, namely, in the manner prescribed by rule 32 of the Rules made under the Act. There is nothing in the rule which would indicate that a notice for submitting the returns is required either prior or subsequent to the application of the procedure prescribed. What rule 32 requires to be done is that a notice in Form XII specifying the default and calling upon the unregistered dealer to show cause within such time as is prescribed in the notice why he should not be assessed and a penalty should not be imposed upon him, should be served on the dealer. A reference to Form XII in which the notice is required to be issued would show that the notice will give intimation to the dealer that he being a dealer liable to pay tax under the Act in respect of the periods mentioned had wilfully failed to apply for registration and will call upon him to show cause on or before a certain date why he should not be assessed and a penalty should not be imposed on him. The notice will further direct him to attend in person or by a proper representative before the Sales Tax Officer and produce or cause to be produced the books of accounts and the documents specified in the notice and such other evidence on which he may choose to rely in support of the cause required to be shown by the dealer. It would thus appear that the conditions subject to which the jurisdiction under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can be invoked against an unregistered dealer have no reference to a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 being required to be issued to him as a condition precedent to the invoking of the said jurisdiction. The procedure prescribed for the exercise of the said jurisdiction also gives no indication that the said jurisdiction has to be invoked only after the stage of the issuance of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 has passed. In our opinion, therefore, the first contention urged by Mr. Deo in the present petition cannot be sustained and must, therefore, fail.

The next point urged by the learned advocate relates to the period for which the notice under sub-s. (5) of s. 11 can be issued by the Sales Tax Officer. The rival contentions in this connection are that according to the petitioner, the period for which such notice can be issued cannot be for such period or periods of assessment as are prior to three calendar years from the date of the issue of such notice. On the other hand, the contention of the Department is that the entire period for which the unregistered dealer was liable to pay tax and for which he had wilfully failed to apply for registration can be covered by the notice within three calendar years from the end of such period. In the present case, the notices which are respectively dated November 12, 1962 and November 26, 1962 are in respect of the period from January 1, 1959 to December 31, 1959 and the third notice which is dated December 10, 1962 is for the entire period from June 1, 1950 to December 31, 1959. According to Mr. Deo, the period of assessment which comes within three calendar years from any one of the three notices is the last quarter of the year 1959. All other periods which are prior to the said last quarter of 1959 are beyond the period of three years from the dates of the notice and the Sales Tax Officer had no authority to issue any notice for the said periods. According to the learned Assistant Government Pleader who appears for the Department, the entire period from June 1, 1950 to December 31, 1959 was the period during which the petitioner was liable to pay tax and had wilfully failed to apply for registration and the notices which have been issued by the Sales Tax Officer which are within three calendar years from December 31, 1959 are good, valid and proper for the entire period from June 1, 1950 to December 31, 1959. Which of these rival contentions is right will depend upon the proper construction of the expression "the period during which the unregistered dealer was liable to pay tax and had nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration" which occurs in sub-s. (5) of s. 11.

Liability to pay tax under a taxing statute is entirely governed by the statute which is a complete code in itself. A taxing statute provides for the incidence of tax or the attraction of tax liability; it makes provision for the assessment of the tax liability or the ascertainment or quantification of the tax liability which is attracted; and it also makes provision for the recovery and payment of the said tax liability. Every one of these matters is governed by the provisions of the Act itself and the liability of a person to pay tax has got to be determined with reference to the provisions which are to be found in the taxing statute. In the statute before us, the incidence or the attraction of tax liability is provided by s. 4; the assessment or the ascertainment and the quantification is dealt with by ss. 11 and 11-A; the payment and recovery of the tax is provided by s. 12; and the refunds are dealt with in s. 13 of the Act. Section 4 which deals with the incidence of tax states in the first place who are the persons who are subject to tax; in the second place, the point of time when the tax liability is attracted; and in the third place, the duration to which the liability continues. Under that section it is provided that all dealers whose turnover exceeds the limits specified in the section will be liable to pay tax in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Attraction of the tax, therefore, is dependant on the turnover exceeding the specified limits and the liability to pay tax which has been attracted is to be governed in accordance with the provisions of the Act which will necessarily include the provisions as to assessment and payment. Under the said section all dealers whose turnover exceeded the specified limits during the year preceding the commencement of the Act became liable to pay tax from the commencement of the Act. In the case of others, the tax liability is attracted from a date expiring two months after the month up to the end of which their turnover calculated from the commencement of the year or from the commencement of the business in case the dealer was in business for less than 12 months exceeds the specified limits. The year for the purpose of this calculation of the turnover is the financial year beginning on April 1, or at the option of the dealer, his accounting year. The liability to pay tax which is attracted in the manner provided continues until the expiry of a period of three consecutive years during which the turnover of the dealer has not exceeded the specified limits and ceases at the expiry of such three years unless a further period for its continuation has been prescribed by the Rules under the Act. The provisions of this section relate to the attraction of the tax liability. The liability to pay tax so attracted is however in accordance with the provisions of the Act. These provisions, as we have already stated, have reference to the provisions relating to assessment. Under s. 8 of the Act, a dealer who is liable to pay tax under the Act has to put in an application to get himself registered and possess a registration certificate. Failure to perform this obligation is made penal under s. 24. Section 9 provides for the publication of the list of the registered dealers. As observed by the Supreme Court in Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Assistant Commissioner of Sales Tax the provisions of ss. 8 and 9 are conceived in the interest of revenue, to facilitate collection of taxes and to prevent the evasion thereof. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 10, a registered dealer is required to furnish such returns by such dates and to such authority as may be prescribed. "Prescribed" means prescribed under the rules made under the Act, and the relevant rules in this connection are rules 19 and 20 in Part V of the Rules made under the Act. Rule 19 provides that a registered dealer will furnish to the appropriate Sales Tax Officer quarterly returns in Form IV within one calendar month from the expiry of the quarter to which the return relates. That is the normal period for which assessment returns are required to be filed by the registered dealer in Form IV. Under rule 20 the Commissioner is authorised to fix a monthly return for any registered dealer for reasons to be recorded by him. For such dealer the return period for the returns to be submitted by him in form IV will be a period of one month. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 the Commissioner is also entitled to serve a notice on an unregistered dealer requiring him to furnish a return or returns. The rule which prescribes the manner in which returns can be requisitioned from an unregistered dealer is rule 22 and it provides that the Commissioner may by a notice given in Form VI require an unregistered dealer to furnish to the appropriate Sales Tax Officer, within two calendar months from the date of the service of the notice a return or returns in Form IV in respect of the said period or periods as may be specified in the notice and thereupon such dealer shall comply with the notice. Section 10 again, as observed by the Supreme Court in Central Patteries Ltd. v. State of Maharashtra, is a procedural section and the liability of an assessee or a dealer to pay tax or the jurisdiction of the Sales Tax Officer to assess the dealer to tax is not dependent upon the said section.

We then come to s. 11 which is the assessment section under the Act. Under sub-s. (1) of that section assessment is made on the returns which are filed by the registered dealers under the statutory obligation imposed upon them by sub-s. (1) of s. 10, and by the unregistered dealers under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 on their being called upon to furnish such returns by the Commissioner, if the said returns are found to be satisfactory. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 11, if the Commissioner is not satisfied by the returns submitted by the registered or unregistered dealers he is empowered to call upon them by a notice to appear before him in person or by a proper representative or to produce evidence or to produce accounts etc. The notice which is required to be given under sub-s. (2) of s. 11 is provided in rule 31 of the Rules and is required to be in Form XI. Sub-section (3) of s. 11 authorises the appropriate Sales Tax Authority to make assessment on the basis of the returns furnished and on the basis of the further evidence produced in compliance with the notice given under sub-s. (2) of s. 11. Sub-section (4) provides for the best judgment assessment in the case of a registered dealer. The manner prescribed for making this best judgment assessment is dealt with in rule 32 which requires a notice in Form XII to be issued by the Sales Tax Officer to the registered dealer, who has failed to submit returns in respect of any period by the prescribed date. That notice intimates the registered dealer that having failed to furnish returns for certain specified periods he has rendered himself liable to best judgment assessment and requires him to show cause why he should not be assessed and a penalty should not be imposed upon him. Sub-section (5) of s. 11 contains a provision for best judgment assessment of an unregistered dealer and the manner in which this best judgment assessment is to be made is again dealt with by rule 32 which provides for a notice in Form XII to be issued to the unregistered dealer. This notice intimates him of the default, namely, that having been a dealer liable to pay tax in respect of certain periods he had wilfully failed to apply for registration and calls upon him to show cause why he should not be assessed and why a penalty should not be imposed upon him.

Section 11-A of the Act provides for the assessment of turnover which has escaped assessment. That section provides that if the appropriate Sales Tax Authority is satisfied in consequence of any information which has come into its possession that any turnover of a dealer during any period has been under-assessed or has escaped assessment or has been assessed at a lower rate etc., it may within three calendar years from the expiry of such period, after giving the dealer a reasonable opportunity of being heard and after making such inquiry as it considers necessary, proceed in such manner as may be prescribed to re-assess or assess as the case may be, the tax payable on such turnover. The prescribed manner is again provided by rule 32 which requires a notice in Form XII to be issued to the dealer, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be assessed or re-assessed as the case may be. The notice in Form XII will show that the intimation which is conveyed to the dealer is that his turnover for a certain period or periods has been under-assessed or has escaped assessment etc. and requires him to show cause why he should not be assessed or re-assessed as the case may be. The provisions of ss. 10 and 11 of the Act and the rules made under the Act will show that the assessment of the tax liability under the Act is made normally in terms of quarters of a year. In other words, the normal unit of the period of assessment under the Act is a period of a quarter and the liability of a dealer or a registered dealer to pay tax is ascertained and quantified in terms of periods of quarters. The provision for the payment and recovery of the tax, as we have already mentioned, is made in s. 12 and the provision for refund is contained in s. 13, but for the purposes of the question before us it is not necessary to consider those provisions.

Now, what we have got to consider in the present case is what upon a proper construction is the meaning of the expression "period for which a dealer has been liable to pay tax" as contained in sub-s. (5) of s. 11. That sub-section reads as follows:

"If upon information which has come into his possession, the Commissioner is satisfied that any dealer has been liable to pay tax under this Act in respect of any period and has nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration, the Commissioner shall, at any time within three calendar years from the expiry of such period, after giving the dealer a reasonable opportunity of being heard, proceed in such manner as may be prescribed to assess to the best of his judgment the amount of tax due from the dealer in respect of such period and all subsequent periods; and the Commissioner may direct that the dealer shall pay by way of penalty in addition to the amount of tax so assessed a sum not exceeding one and a half times that amount."

The three calendar years within which the Commissioner must proceed under this sub-section are the three calendar years from the expiry of the period in respect of which the dealer had been liable to pay tax and had nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration, and the controversy is as to what is this period for which the dealer had been liable to pay tax and had nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration. Mr. Deo's contention is that the period in respect of which the dealer has been liable to pay tax under the Act is not necessarily the period during which the tax liability was attracted by his turnover; it is the period in respect of which he was liable to pay tax in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The liability to pay tax is not dependent merely on the attraction of the tax liability. The liability comes in when the liability is ascertained and quantified in the manner provided in the Act. The period in respect of which the dealer was liable to pay tax will, therefore, depend upon the period in respect of which the dealer was liable to be assessed to tax, because if there is no assessment, there is no liability to pay. In order, therefore, to understand the proper meaning of the expression "the period in respect of which the dealer was liable to pay tax under the provisions of the Act", reference must necessarily be made to the period of assessment for which a dealer is liable to be assessed. Units of periods of assessment are units of one or more quarters. The periods for which the dealer is liable to pay tax, therefore, will be periods of a quarter or quarters in respect of which the turnover of the dealer is liable to be assessed. The three calendar years' period mentioned in sub-s. (5) within which action can be taken are three years from the expiry of the quarter or quarters which are sought to be assessed. According to the learned advocate, therefore, the Sales Tax Authorities, under sub-s. (5), can only proceed to make assessment under that sub-section in respect of such quarter or quarters as are within three calendar years of the notice issued under the said section. Mr. Hajarnavis, the learned Assistant Government Pleader, has on the other hand contended that the liability to pay tax under the Act arises under s. 4 and is not dependent upon the provisions as to assessment. The process of assessment is merely the process of collection of the liability which has been already incurred and which is all the while there. Section 4, according to him, does not merely attract the tax or brings in the incidence of tax; it also brings in the liability to pay tax. The expression, therefore, in sub-s. (5) of s. 11 must be given the meaning that it covers the entire period for which the tax liability has been incurred and during which the dealer has wilfully failed to apply for registration.

In our opinion, the argument advanced by Mr. Hajarnavis does not appear to be sound. It is no doubt true that a tax liability is brought into existence under s. 4 but that section in terms provides that the liability to pay tax will be in accordance with the provisions of the Act, which, according to us, has a necessary reference to the parts of the Act dealing with the assessment, payment and recovery. The mere attraction of the tax liability, therefore, is not sufficient to make the dealer liable to pay the tax, unless certain other provisions of the Act are also followed. As we have already pointed out earlier, under a taxing statute there are three stages; the incidence of the tax, the assessment of the tax, and the payment or recovery of the tax. The incidence of the tax brings into existence the tax liability. The liability to pay tax so incurred is on the assessment of the tax. If there is no assessment, there is no liability to pay tax. The period, therefore, for which the dealer is liable to pay tax will depend upon the period for which he is liable to be assessed in respect of the tax liability incurred. If for some reason or the other, the tax liability cannot be assessed under the provisions prescribed for the assessment of the tax under the Act, that liability ceases to exist. It seems to us, therefore, that in considering the expression "the period for which the dealer has been liable to pay tax" in sub-s. (5) of s. 11, recourse must necessarily be had to the periods of assessment in respect of the tax. There is no doubt whatsoever that under the Act the unit of assessment is a quarter: see, for instance, Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Asst. Commr. of Sales Tax. The expiry of the three years' period, therefore, must have reference to the periods of assessment in respect of which the dealer was liable to be assessed in respect of his tax liability. That the period or periods for which the dealer under the Act is liable to be assessed are a quarter or quarters during which the turnover of the dealer has attracted the tax under s. 4 is clear from the provisions made in the rules relating to the assessment under the Act. In our opinion, therefore, the period for which a dealer has been liable to pay tax under the Act as mentioned in sub-s. (5) of s. 11 is the period of a quarter or quarters in respect of which he was liable to be assessed in respect of his turnover and since a period of three calendar years is mentioned in sub-s. (5) of s. 11 as the period of limitation within which action under the sub-section must be taken from the expiry of such period or periods, it is only for the period or periods of a quarter or quarters which are within three years from the date of the notice issued under this sub-section that the provisions of this sub-section can be invoked.

The view that we are taking has the support of the decision of the former Nagpur High Court in Firm Sheonarayan Matadin v. Sales Tax Officer.² It has been held in that case that unless the period for which the assessment has to be made ends within three years from the date when the Commissioner issues the notice, it cannot be made the subject of assessment under sub-s. (5) of s. 11. The observations of the Supreme Court in Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Asst. Commr. of Sales Tax also give support to the said view. In that case, their Lordships of the Supreme Court were principally concerned with s. 11-A of the Act. A dealer who was registered under s. 8 of the Act and who was obliged to furnish quarterly returns of his turnover had, for his accounting year 1949-50 which was from October 22, 1949 to November 9, 1950 submitted a return of his turnover for only one quarter of the said year on October 5, 1950 and made a default in respect of the other quarters. On August 13, 1954 the Assistant Commissioner of Sales Tax, Nagpur, issued a notice to him in Form XI under sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 11 of the Act in respect of the turnover of the dealer for the said period. The dealer thereafter filed his returns for the three quarters in respect of which he had made a default but in the assessment proceedings contended that since the notice which was given to him on August 13, 1954 was beyond three years of the quarters for which he had failed to submit returns, the Assistant Commissioner could not assess his escaped turnover for the said quarters. For the year 1950-51 the dealer had not submitted returns for any of the quarters. On October 15, 1954 a notice was served on him under sub-s. (4) of s. 11. The dealer contended that since the notice was issued beyond the period of three years from the periods for which his turnover had escaped assessment, the proceedings were barred under s. 11-A of the Act. The contentions of the dealer did not prevail before the Sales Tax Authorities. The dealer however applied to the High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution for quashing the proceedings on the ground that they were illegal and without jurisdiction. The contention on behalf of the dealer was that his was a case of escaped assessment which came under s. 11-A, and since there was a period of three years' limitation under the said section within which action in respect of the escaped assessment could be taken, the proceedings against him instituted by the Sales Tax Authorities were incompetent. The question before the Supreme Court was with regard to the proper scope of s. 11-A and what their Lordships had to consider was whether that section could apply only to a case where there was a final assessment, or it could also apply to cases where there was no assessment at all. Another question which their Lordships had to consider was as to when the assessment proceedings could be said to have commenced in respect of a registered dealer and when do they terminate. Their Lordships held that the expression "escaped assessment" in s. 11-A of the Act included that of a turnover which had not been assessed at all, because for one reason or other no assessment proceedings were initiated and, therefore, no assessment was made in respect thereof. They also held that so far as the registered dealer was concerned, the assessment proceedings against him could be said to have commenced when a return is made or when a notice is issued to him either under s. 10(3) or s. 11(2). The statutory obligation of the registered dealer to make a return within the prescribed time does not proprio vigore initiate the assessment proceedings before the Commissioner, but the proceedings will commence after the return is submitted and will continue till a final order of assessment is made in regard to the said return. In dealing with these questions which were raised before them, their Lordships had to consider the scheme of the Act and the provisions with regard to assessment relating to dealers, both registered and unregistered. In dealing with the case of an unregistered dealer with reference to the provisions of s. 11(5), their Lordships observed:

"It is clear from this provision that in the case of such a dealer the assessment can be made only within three calendar years from the expiry of the period in respect whereof he has been liable to pay tax under the Act."

Having regard to the view which they took of the provisions of s. 11(5), they observed:

"If the contention of learned counsel for the respondent should prevail, in the case of a registered dealer there would be no limitation in the matter of assessment, whereas in the case of a dealer who evaded law, he would have the benefit of the three years' limitation."

These observations occur in the context of the contention which was raised before their Lordships with regard to the action contemplated against the dealer under sub-s. (4) of s. 11. In that case, the argument advanced on behalf of the Department was that there was no limitation for the action under sub-s. (4) of s. 11 for the best judgment assessment against a registered dealer who had failed to submit a return. Their Lordships pointed out that even when the stringent provision of sub-s. (5) of s. 11 provides a period of three years' limitation for action to be taken against an unregistered dealer, it could not have been intended that in the case of a registered dealer, there should be no period of limitation at all. These observations clearly show that the period in respect of which the unregistered dealer was liable to pay tax was the period of three years in respect of which he was liable to be assessed. The observations in the judgment of Raghubar Dayal J. in the said case also are to the same effect. His Lordship observed:

"Under the provisions of sub-section (5) of section 11, he (i.e. the Commissioner), after giving the dealer reasonable opportunity of being heard, can proceed to assess the tax to the best of his judgment within three calendar years from the expiry of the period in respect of the turnover of which he was liable to be assessed to tax."

There could be no doubt whatsoever that the period in respect of which the dealer was liable to be assessed to tax was the period of a quarter or quarters for which assessment could be made under the Act. The said decision also points out that for the purposes of assessment, the unit of assessment is a quarter. In our opinion, therefore, the view that we are taking is in accordance with the view taken by the former Nagpur High Court and also in accordance with the observations of the Supreme Court in Ghanshyamdas v. Regional Asst. Commr. of Sales Tax.

Mr. Hajarnavis has invited our attention to a contrary view taken by the Madhya Pradesh High Court in the following cases: (1) *Battulal v. Commr. of Sales Tax*⁹; (2) *L. J. Patel & Co. v. Commr. of Sales Tax*¹⁰; and (3) *Ghanshyamdas v. Sales Tax Officer*¹¹. The view taken by that Court is that the word "period" in sub-s. (5) of s. 11 of the C. P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947, means the whole period during which a dealer has been liable to pay tax under the Act but has nevertheless wilfully failed to apply for registration, and that it is not to be construed as meaning a quarter for which under rule 19 every registered dealer is required to furnish a return. With great respect to the learned Judges, we are unable to agree with the view taken by them in the said cases. With respect, we may point out that the said decision overlooks the fact that under s. 4 the dealer's liability is to pay the tax in accordance with the provisions of the Act which necessarily include the provisions relating to assessment. The expression "the period for which the dealer has been liable to pay tax under the Act" cannot, therefore, be always coincident with the period for which the tax has been attracted by his turnover. We may also point out with great respect that we do not agree with them that no fixed periods for the purpose of assessment are fixed under the Act. As has been observed by the Supreme Court in Ghanshyamdas's case, the unit of assessment under the Act is a quarter and that is the normal period fixed for the purposes of assessment though in exceptional cases a period of one month can also be fixed under rule 20 as the return period for assessment.

In Battulal v. Commr. of Sales Tax the learned Judges who decided that case observed that the view that they were taking was fortified by a decision of the Supreme Court in *State of Orissa v. Chakobhai Ghelabhai & Co.*¹² With respect again, we are unable to agree with the learned Judges. In the case before the Supreme Court, a notice under sub-s. (5) of s. 12 of the Orissa Act was issued in Form VI which corresponds to the notice in Form XII under the Act with which we are concerned. That form like Form XII of the notice under our Act was a compendious form meant for notices for several purposes. There was a foot-note appended to the form requiring the authority issuing the notice to score out the unnecessary words. One of the complaints urged against the notice was that the unnecessary words not having been scored, the notice was bad in law. That contention was negatived on the ground that since the respondent had no difficulty in understanding what that notice was, the mere circumstance that unnecessary words were not scored did not make the notice bad in law. The next complaint raised against the notice was that the notice was issued for several quarters and an assessment was made for each quarter separately. Thus, in respect of four quarters which were included in the notice, the assessment was made on July 4, 1951, and for the other eight quarters on August 29, 1951. Their Lordships held that the said objection against the validity of the notice was also not maintainable, because the notice which s. 12(5) of that Act required to be given talked of a period and this period might consist of more than one quarter. One notice, therefore, for several quarters would be quite in order though the returns in response to the said notice had to be furnished separately and had also to be assessed separately for each quarter. We are unable to see how the observations of the Supreme Court in that case, namely, that "section 12(5) talks of a period, and the period may consist of more than one quarter", would help in arriving at the proper interpretation of the expression with which we are concerned. The period for which the dealer has been liable to pay tax under the Act may undoubtedly consist of one or more quarters. But the authority of the Sales Tax Officer to make a best judgment assessment against him under s. 11(5) is only in respect of that period consisting of one or more quarters which is within three years of the notice which he can issue under the said provision. We would, therefore, prefer to follow the view taken by the Nagpur High Court in Firm Sheonarayan Matadin v. Sales Tax Officer which, it may be pointed out, has been subsequently followed by this Court also in *Ramkrishna Ramnath v. Sales Tax Officer*¹³. In the view that we are taking, therefore, the notices issued by the Sales Tax Officers in the present case will be incompetent except for the last quarter of the year 1959.

We now come to the third and the last contention which has been urged by Mr. Deo in this petition, namely, that having regard to the nature of the transactions between the petitioner and its customers of the type described by the respondents themselves in their affidavit, such transactions do not amount to sales under the Act and if the extended definition of "sale" given in Explanation (I) to that definition seeks to include transactions of this nature, the said Explanation is beyond the legislative competence of the Legislature in a legislation enacted under entry 48 of the Provincial Legislative List in the Government of India Act, 1935, or under entry 54 of the State List under the Constitution of India. Now, before proceeding to deal with this question, it may be stated that in the petition the petitioner had alleged that the dealings of the petitioner were only financial dealings and there was no sale whatever involved in the said dealings of any articles or goods between the petitioner and the persons with whom it dealt. It was also alleged in the petition that in the transactions with which the petitioner was concerned relating to financing of the purchase of the motor vehicles, there was no sale of any vehicle by the petitioner to the customers. There was in fact a sale direct from the manufacturers of the vehicles to the customers and the arrangement which the customers had with the petitioner was only in the nature of a financing arrangement. This position was controverted in the reply submitted by the respondents and they averred that there was in fact a sale from the dealer of the manufacturer to the petitioner and the subsequent transaction between the petitioner and its customer was in respect of the vehicles which had been sold to the petitioner by the dealer on hire-purchase agreement. In the reply, the respondents gave the nature of the transactions and the mode in which the transactions were brought about and contended that these were transactions of hire-purchase between the petitioner and its customers.

At the hearing of the petition, Mr. Deo stated when a preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the respondents that the petition involved disputed questions of fact, that he would accept that there were amongst the transactions which the petitioner carried on with its customers transactions of the type mentioned by the respondents in their affidavit and that he would confine his submissions with respect to the transactions of that type only. His argument was that the transactions of the type which were described by the respondents and which undoubtedly form a large part of the transactions which the petitioner carried on with its customers were not sales which could be taxed under the Act. Now, the type of transactions described by the respondents which the petitioner accepts as the correct description of some of the transactions entered into by it with its customers is as follows: A person intending to purchase a motor vehicle approaches the dealer of the manufacturer and selects a vehicle and fixes up its price. Then he approaches the petitioner Company with a guarantor and gives a proposal for the hire-purchase of the motor vehicle from the petitioner Company. The Company on accepting this proposal of hire-purchase enters into an agreement for hire-purchase of this vehicle. Then the Company informs the dealer about the agreement to accept a certain sum of money on their behalf and send the bill to it and deliver the vehicle to the customer. The customer, after taking delivery, passes a receipt to the Company of his having received the vehicle in good condition, complete with all tools and accessories. The customer then applies to the Regional Transport Authority under s. 24 of the Motor Vehicles Act. The dealer of the manufacturer prepares the bill in the name of the Company and the delivery of the vehicle to the ultimate customer is then effected on the instructions of the Company. The Company accepts the proposal from the customer for selling the vehicle to him on hire-purchase basis and even after the payment of the agreed amount, the property in the goods passes only on the option exercised by the intending customer. In the hire-purchase agreement the Company describes itself as the owner of the vehicle during the period commencing from the purchase of the vehicle till the property in the vehicle is finally passed by this Company to the ultimate customer as a result of the fulfilment of all the conditions in the agreement. A form of the agreement of hire-purchase typical of this type of transaction has been annexed to the petition at Annexure B. A proposal form regarding the hire-purchase of the motor vehicle from the petitioner Company is also produced along with the petition as Annexure C. A form of the receipt to be passed by the customer for his having received the vehicle from the dealer is given at Annexure E.

Actual documents relating to a transaction of this type have been subsequently filed by Mr. Deo and were handed over to us at the time of hearing. It will be desirable to give some of the relevant clauses of the agreement entered into by the petitioner with its customers, because it is necessary to consider what is the exact nature of this transaction. In this agreement the petitioner Company is described as the owners of the vehicle and the customer as the hirer. The first clause states that the owners being the owners of the vehicle agree to let and the hirer agrees to hire the vehicle from the date of the agreement subject to the terms and conditions contained in the agreement. Under clause II, on the execution of the agreement, the hirer is required to pay to the owners a sum of Re. 1 in consideration of the option to purchase given to the hirer by clause IV of the agreement, and it is provided that the said sum shall become the absolute property of the owners. Under clause III, the hirer has to pay on the execution of the agreement a certain sum of money as an initial payment by way of hire which, though it varies with every transaction, is at least about 25 per cent of the price of the vehicle and he also agrees to pay punctually by monthly instalments further sums of money as specified in the agreement. Under clause IV it is provided that if the hirer duly performs and observes all the terms and conditions of the agreement to be performed and observed by him and pays in the manner provided to the owners monthly sums by way of rent amounting together with the initial payment made by him to a total sum which is the price of the vehicle and also pays to the owners all arrears of money which may become payable by the hirer under the agreement, the hiring would come to an end and the vehicle will, at the option of the hirer, become his property and the owners will assign and make over all their right, title and interest in the same to the hirer, but until such payments as aforesaid have been made the vehicle shall remain the property of the owners. Clause V of the agreement provides that in the event of the hiring under the contract being for any reason whatsoever terminated by either party during the specified number of months, the hirer will pay to the owners a certain sum in addition to certain other sums payable by him under the contract or in law. It is however stated by Mr. Deo that in the actual contracts entered into by the Company with its customers, this clause has been deleted. Clause VI deals with the guarantee of the guarantor.

Amongst the conditions which are stated in this agreement, the first condition states that the hirer would be at liberty at any time during the continuance of the agreement to terminate the hiring by returning the vehicle to the owners, free of all expenses to the owners, but that would be without prejudice to any claims which the owners may have against the hirer under the agreement. What is necessary to consider is what is the exact nature of the transaction. Mr. Deo has contended that the transaction is a contract of hiring and is not a sale. His contention is that under the terms of the agreement there is no contract to sell and there is no passing of the property from the petitioner to the customer in pursuance of the agreement. The essential feature of the agreement which makes it a contract of hiring and not a sale is the option which has been given to the customer to return the goods. Under condition No. 4 of the contract it is provided that even after the payments in terms of the agreement are made by the hirer to the petitioner, the vehicle will become the property of the hirer at his option. Condition No. 1 of the contract provides that during the continuance of the agreement it will be open to the customer to terminate the hiring by returning the vehicle to the owners, and condition No. 5 states that if the hiring is determined by the owners or by the hirer in the manner provided in condition No. 1, all hire up to the date of such determination shall be paid by the hirer to the owners which would mean that there is no liability in respect of the subsequent period. Mr. Deo has, therefore, contended that these features of the agreement take it out of the category of sales. It has been well settled, he argues, that a hire-purchase agreement giving an option to buy or not to buy to the hirer is not a sale. According to the learned advocate, therefore, the transactions of the type described by the respondents between the petitioner and its customers cannot be sales, so as to come within the definition of sale under the Act even under Explanation (I) to that definition, because, according to him, the term "hire-purchase" in that Explanation must exclude out of its ambit transactions which are not sales and can only cover instances of instalment-buying though designated by the name "hire-purchase". His alternative argument is that if the term "hire-purchase" contained in the Explanation to the definition of "sale" is intended to cover pure contracts of hire-purchase of the type with which we are concerned, the Explanation will be beyond the competence of the State Legislature, because under the relevant entries in the Provincial Legislative List at the material time when the legislation was passed, or even at the present stage, the State Legislature has no power to levy tax on transactions which are other than sales. In support of his submission that the State Legislature cannot, by extending the definition of "sale", include within its ambit transactions which are not sales within the meaning of the Act, Mr. Deo has relied upon the decisions of the Supreme Court in *Sales Tax Officer v. Budh Prakash Jai Prakash*¹⁴ and *State of Madras v. Gannon Dunkerley & Co.*¹⁵

In Sales Tax Officer v. Budh Prakash Jai Prakash, the question before the Supreme Court was whether forward contracts which were treated as sales could be taxed under the Sales Tax Act. It was held that it would be proper to interpret the expression "sale of goods" in Entry 48 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, in the sense in which it was used in legislation both in England and India and to hold that it authorises the imposition of a tax only when there is a completed sale involving transfer of title. It was observed that a liability to be assessed to sales tax can arise only if there is a completed sale under which price is paid or is payable and not when there is only an agreement to sell, which can only result in a claim for damages. The power conferred under Entry 48 to impose a tax on the sale of goods can, therefore, be exercised only when there is a sale under which there is a transfer of property in the goods, and not when there is a mere agreement to sell. It was further observed that the State Legislature cannot by enlarging the definition of "sale" as including forward contracts, arrogate to itself a power which is not conferred upon it by the Constitution Act, and the definition of "sale" in s. 2(h) of the U.P. Sales Tax Act was, to that extent, ultra vires the Legislature.

In State of Madras v. Gannon Dunkerley & Co., the question before the Supreme Court was whether the definition of sale in the Madras General Sales Tax Act, in so far as it sought to impose a tax on the supply of materials in execution of works contract treating it as a sale of goods by the contractor, was constitutional, and it was held that the expression "sale of goods" in Entry 48 in List II of Schedule VII of the Government of India Act, 1935, cannot be construed in its popular sense but must be interpreted in its legal sense and should be given the same meaning which it has in the Sale of Goods Act. It is a nomen juris, its essential ingredients being an agreement to sell movables for a price and property passing therein pursuant to that agreement.

In view of these decisions Mr. Deo has contended that in the transactions of the type with which we are concerned, there is no agreement to sell a vehicle and there is no passing of property pursuant to that agreement and, therefore, there is no sale. The position on the analysis of the terms of the agreement, he says, is this that the petitioner has hired the vehicle to the customer with an offer to him that if at the end of the hiring contract he wishes to buy it, he may buy it or he may not. There is no agreement on the part of the customer to buy the vehicle and consequently there is no agreement to sell between the parties in the present case and there is no passing of property in pursuance of that agreement. The property under the agreement in question passes to the buyer only when he exercises the option and not before that. Until then, Mr. Deo says, the contract is a contract of hiring, pure and simple, and such a contract cannot be assessed.

Another case to which he has made a reference for the proposition urged by him is Damodar Valley Corporation v. State of Bihar.¹⁶ In that case, the appellant who was the Damodar Valley Corporation had entered into an agreement with two engineering contractors for the construction of a dam. Under the agreement, the Corporation agreed to make available to the contractors such equipment as was necessary and suitable for that construction, but the contractors were to be charged the actual price paid by the appellant for the equipment and machinery thus made available, inclusive of freight and customs duty, if any, as also the cost of transport, but excluding sales tax. The machineries were to remain the property of the appellant until the full price thereof had been realised from the contractors. The appellant agreed to take over from the contractors some of the machineries after completion of the work at their "residual value" which was to be calculated in a certain manner; but that was not an unconditional term. The Corporation was bound to take them over only if it was satisfied that their "residual life" was not less than the standard life fixed by the parties. Under the agreement, the contractors were made responsible for maintaining the equipments in good running condition and could not remove the equipments from site until the full cost thereof had been recovered from them and their removal was not likely to impede the satisfactory prosecution of the work. The contractors had to replenish their stock of spare parts of machineries made available to them by the appellant and when spare parts were supplied to the contractors by the appellant, the contractors were liable for the actual price of those parts inclusive of freight, insurance and customs duty. The question before the Court was whether the transaction between the parties was a mere contract of hiring or a sale within the meaning of s. 2(g) of the Bihar Sales Tax Act. On the terms of the contract, it was held by the Supreme Court that it was a contract of sale and not a contract of hiring. But in deciding that question the Court considered the essential features of a hire-purchase agreement and observed (p. 113):

"...It is well-settled that a mere contract of hiring, without more, is a species of the contract of bailment, which does not create a title in the bailee, but the law of hire-purchase has undergone considerable development during the last half a century or more and has introduced a number of variations, thus leading to categories, and it becomes a question of some nicety as to which category a particular contract between the parties comes under. Ordinarily, a contract of hire-purchase confers no title on the hirer, but a mere option to purchase on fulfilment of certain conditions. But a contract of hire-purchase may also provide for the agreement to purchase the thing hired by deferred payments subject to the condition that the title to the thing shall not pass until all the instalments have been paid. There may be other variations of a contract of hire-purchase depending upon the terms agreed between the parties. When rights in third parties have been created by acts of parties or by operation of law, the question, which does not arise here, may arise as to what exactly were the rights and obligations of the parties to the original contract. It is equally well-settled that for the purpose of determining as to which category a particular contract comes under, the court will look at the substance of the agreement and not at the mere words describing the category. One of the tests to determine the question whether a particular agreement is a contract of mere hiring or whether it is a contract of purchase on a system of deferred payments of the purchase price is whether there is any binding obligation on the hirer to purchase the goods. Another useful test to determine such a controversy is whether there is a right reserved to the hirer to return the goods at any time during the subsistence of the contract. If there is such a right reserved, then clearly there is no contract of sale." Mr. Deo says relying upon this case that the Supreme Court has held that if there is a right reserved to the hirer to return the goods at any time during the subsistence of the contract, then clearly it is not a contract of sale. In the present case, he says that there is a right reserved to the hirer to return the goods during the subsistence of the contract under condition No. 1. According to the dictum of the Supreme Court, therefore, there is no contract of sale in the present case. He has further referred us to a case decided by the Madhya Pradesh High Court in *Indian Finances Private Ltd. v. Sales Tax Officer*¹⁷ where the hire-purchase agreement was almost identical in terms. The Court held that it was not a contract of sale and could not come within the definition of sale. In that view it held that the Explanation to the definition of "sale" contained in the Madhya Pradesh General Sales Tax Act which is identical in terms with the Explanation given in our Act, swept into the category of sales transactions which were not sale transactions under the Sale of Goods Act, 1930, and thus was ultra vires of the State Legislature.

Now, there is no doubt that a contract purely of hiring can never come within the definition of sale. A hire-purchase agreement however, as observed by the Supreme Court, takes a variety of forms having a very wide range, and what its exact legal nature is—whether it is a sale or a contract of hiring with a mere option of purchase on fulfilment of certain conditions—will depend upon what that agreement in substance is. It seems to us that the proper test to determine as to what the true nature of the transaction is, is to look at the substance of the transaction, the intention of the parties in entering into that transaction, and what it is really intended by them to be. An option to purchase given to the buyer may no doubt be indicative that no sale may have been intended by the parties. The mere circumstance that an option to the buyer has been given may not necessarily involve the conclusion that it is not a sale, nor intended to be a sale. What has got to be considered, in our opinion, is to consider the terms of the contract including the option which may have been given to the buyer under the terms of the contract and consider what is the real nature of the transaction. Examining the terms of the contract before us and the circumstances under which it was admittedly entered into between the parties, we find that a customer who entered into the contract with the petitioner was a person who was in need of a motor vehicle and wanted to buy it. He had applied to the dealer of the manufacturer, had complied with the formality of giving a guarantee to the dealer, and when his turn came to get the vehicle from the dealer, had gone and selected the vehicle from the dealer. He had not sufficient funds to pay the price of the vehicle to the dealer of the manufacturer and had, therefore, to enter into the present agreement with the petitioner. In order to enter into the present agreement, he agreed that the vehicle which he had selected and wanted to buy from the dealer of the manufacturer should be bought in the first instance by the petitioner and sold to him under a hire-purchase agreement. It was in these circumstances that the contract between the parties has come into existence. The real agreement between the parties is that the petitioner has agreed to sell the vehicle and the customer has agreed to buy it. The payments which the customer is agreeing to pay to the petitioner under this agreement also indicate that they are paid not only by way of hire but also by way of part payment of the price of the vehicle. The part payment of about 25 per cent. of the price of the vehicle is paid by the initial instalment. The further payment is made in monthly instalments and the quantum of the payment fixed is such that he has to make up the total price of the vehicle within a period of a few months. It is no doubt true that for the character which the transaction has been given by the parties, these payments are spoken of as hire under the agreement. There is however no doubt that they are meant to be part payments in respect of the price of the vehicle. The customer gets the vehicle directly from the dealer but he passes a receipt to the petitioner as having received it from it under the hire-purchase agreement. That is no doubt done because under the transaction settled between the parties, the property in the first place passes from the dealer of the manufacturer to the petitioner. The customer possesses the vehicle, maintains it, keeps it in repairs, has it registered in his own name with the Transport Authorities as owner thereof, and at the end of the period of the instalments on a nominal payment, exercises his option and becomes the full owner of the property. Having regard to these terms of the agreement, it seems to us that the option to purchase which is mentioned in the agreement between the parties is not so much to emphasise the bailment character of the transaction as to emphasise the character of the transaction as a sale. By the said option which is given only to the buyer either to take delivery or not to take it, the seller is precluded from withdrawing his offer to sell the vehicle. Secondly, having regard to the terms of the contract, it would be reasonable to hold that the option not to buy is hardly likely to be exercised by the customer except in very exceptional circumstances where for things beyond his control, he may not be in a position to pay the entire amounts of the stipulated instalments. It appears to us that it is only in order to safeguard the interests of the petitioner in these exceptional circumstances where the customer may find himself unable to buy the vehicle that the option to buy and liberty to return the vehicle to the petitioner have been included in the agreement. On the examination of the type of the contract that is before us, we do not find any difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it is not a contract of bailment but one in which the element of sale forms an integral part of the contract. This element of sale has been brought in right from the inception of the contract by the option given to the buyer to buy the vehicle. It is a contract in effect for buying the vehicle which completely fructifies at the end of the term of the agreement.

It is no doubt true that the State Legislature cannot by extending the definition of sale include within its ambit transactions which are not sales. It cannot however be denied that transactions which are in substance sales or which contain to a predominant extent an element of sale in them can come within the expression "sale of goods" in the legislative entries in the State List. What under entry 48 in the Provincial Legislative List in the Government of India Act, 1935, or entry 54 in the State List in the Constitution the State Legislature can tax are transactions which are in substance sales. It is true that for a transaction to be a transaction of sale, there must be an agreement to sell and passing of property in pursuance of that agreement. We do not find it possible to hold that in every case where an option to buy is reserved to the buyer, there can be no agreement to sell and no passing of the property in pursuance of the agreement. As we have already pointed out earlier, it must depend upon what the purpose of the option is. Even in spite of such an option in a contract of hire-purchase, the contract may still possess the element of sale in it which may enable the State Legislature to treat it as a sale and tax it under the entry of sale of goods.

The view that we are taking does not appear to be unsupported by authority. In Commercial Credit Corporation v. Dy. Comm. Tax Officer,¹⁸ the Madras High Court was concerned with a transaction of a similar nature. After having examined the terms of the transaction in the light of the circumstances under which it was entered into, it was held that the transactions constituted sales rendering them liable to sales tax. It was also held that the transactions, though of hire-purchase, could, having regard to their main intent and purpose, be treated as sales at the moment the agreements were entered into, though of course they would be subject to adjustment by the elimination of such portion of the turnover where no sale resulted. The learned Judges quoted the observations of Goddard J. in *Korflex Ltd. v. Poole*¹⁹ which were to the effect that hire-purchase was a very modern development in commercial life, and that commercial men were inventing new methods of business and using documents which were perhaps unfamiliar at the time when they were first brought into use but which were invented to meet the requirements of a particular time or peculiar circumstances and the law had to be moulded and developed to meet the commercial developments which are taking place. Goddard J. (as he then was) observed in the said case (p. 264):

"Now it does not seem to me by any means to follow that the doctrines which were applied to ordinary simple bailments in bygone days apply to this modern class of bailment which has in it, not only the element of bailment but also the element of sale."

This and other authorities establish that a 'hire-purchase' is a complex contract transcending a mere bailment and conferring on the hirer a legal estate. In the words of a modern writer, the interest of a hirer is sui generis and cannot be fitted into the general classification of jurisprudence.

The learned Judges of the Madras High Court, after referring to these observations of Goddard J., said (p. 609):

"...This 'sale-element' which started with the grant of 'the option to purchase' at the inception of the agreement of hire-purchase was an integral part of the hire-purchase transaction, as integral and as important as the bailment element in the shape of the 'hire'. It cannot therefore be said that there was no sale at all involved in the hire-purchase so as to preclude the State Legislature from taxing the transactions."

Mr. Deo's objection with regard to this decision is that according to him, the decision ignores the fact that in a hire-purchase agreement of the type with which we are concerned, there is no contract of sale. The essential thing in sale of goods, he says, is an agreement to sell and property passing in pursuance of that agreement. In order that there should be an agreement of sale, there must be an agreement to buy, and in a contract of the nature with which we are concerned, there is no binding agreement to buy on the part of the buyer and, therefore, there could not be a legal agreement to sell. There is no property passing in pursuance of the agreement because the property remains in the petitioner all throughout during the continuance of the agreement and when it eventually passes, if at all it does, it passes not in pursuance of the agreement but on the basis of the option exercised by the buyer. It is only at that stage that the contract assumes the character of an agreement of sale. It would, therefore, be not proper and legal to say that there is an agreement to sell involved in the case of an agreement wherein the terms of the agreement leave it to the option of the buyer whether to buy the goods or not to buy the goods and where liberty is given to the buyer to return the goods to the other party to the contract at any time during the continuance of the agreement. Mr. Deo in this connection has strongly relied upon the case of *Helby v. Matthews*²⁰. He has argued that this is a leading case on the subject of hire-purchase contracts.

Now, in Helby v. Matthews one Brewster, under an agreement in writing dated December 23, 1892, with Helby who was the owner of a piano had obtained possession of the said piano. Subsequently on April 22, 1893, Brewster, improperly and without the consent of the appellant, pledged the piano with the respondents, who were pawnbrokers, as security for an advance. Helby, upon discovering this, demanded the piano from Matthews and others, and on their refusing to deliver it, brought an action of trover. The defence of Matthews and others was that they had received the piano from Brewster in good faith, and without notice of any claim on the part of Helby, and that Brewster having bought or agreed to buy it from him they were protected by s. 9 of the Factors Act. In view of the defence taken by the defendants, it became necessary to consider what was the true nature of the agreement between Brewster and Helby. That agreement was in the form of a hire-purchase agreement. Helby was described as the owner and Brewster as the hirer in the said agreement. It was stated that the owner had agreed at the request of the hirer to let on hire to the hirer the piano which was the subject-matter of the agreement on the terms as stated in the agreement. The material terms of the agreement were that the hirer was to pay the owner on December 23, 1892, a rent or hire instalment of ten shillings six pence and ten shillings six pence on the 23rd of each succeeding month. He was to keep and preserve the said instrument from injury, damage by fire included; to keep the said instrument in the hirer's own custody at the place of the hirer stated in the agreement, and not to remove the same or permit or suffer the same to be removed without the owner's consent in writing. If the hirer did not duly perform this agreement, the owner was at liberty, without prejudice to his rights under the agreement, to terminate the hiring and retake possession of the piano, and for that purpose, leave and licence was given to the owner to enter any premises occupied by the hirer and to retake possession of the instrument. The hirer was at liberty to terminate the agreement and return the instrument to the owner, and in that event the hirer was to remain liable to the owner for arrears of hire up to the date of such return and on no ground was entitled to any allowance, credit, return, or set-off for payments previously made. It was then provided that the owner agreed—

A. That the hirer may terminate the hiring by delivering up to the owner the said instrument.

B. If the hirer shall punctually pay the full sum of £ 18 18s. by 10s. 6d. at the date of signing, and by 36 monthly instalments of 10s. 6d. in advance as aforesaid, the said instrument shall become the sole and absolute property of the hirer.

C. Unless and until the full sum of £ 18 18s. be paid, the said instrument shall be and continue to be the sole property of the owner.

The question before the Court was whether on the true nature of the transaction involved in this agreement it was a contract of buying or a contract of hiring, and the question depended upon whether on a true construction of the agreement Brewster had agreed to buy the piano. It was held at the House of Lords that there was no agreement to buy on the part of Brewster under the terms of the said agreement. Lord Herschell L.C. observed (p. 475):

"...An agreement to buy imports a legal obligation to buy. If there was no such legal obligation, there cannot, in my opinion, properly be said to have been an agreement to buy."

He then proceeded to consider the terms of the agreement and see whether Brewster had agreed to buy under the agreement and found that the position under the agreement was that Brewster might buy or not just as he pleased. The learned Lord Chancellor on a consideration of the terms of the agreement observed (p. 475):

"...He did not agree to make thirty-six or any number of monthly payments. All that he undertook was to make the monthly payment of 10s. 6d. so long as he kept the piano. He had an option no doubt to buy it by continuing the stipulated payments for a sufficient length of time. If he had exercised that option he would have become the purchaser. I cannot see under these circumstances how he can be said either to have bought or agreed to buy the piano. The terms of the contract did not upon its execution bind him to buy, but left him free to do so or not as he pleased, and nothing happened after the contract was made to impose that obligation."

It was observed by the learned Law Lord that although from the terms of the agreement it was very likely that both parties had thought that it would probably end in a purchase, that was far from saying that it was an agreement to buy. There was no indication in the contract from which an intention to buy on the part of the buyer could necessarily be spelt out. The agreement was in terms just as applicable to a case where one was intending to buy as to the case where one only intended to hire and had resolved to continue the payments for a period of three years. The learned Law Lord observed: "In such a case how could it be said that he had agreed to buy when he had not only come under no obligation to buy, but had not even made up his mind to do so?" Lord Watson in his speech, after referring to the stipulations contained in the contract, observed (p. 479):

"These stipulations, in my opinion, constitute neither more nor less than a contract of hiring, terminable at the will of the hirer, coupled with this condition in his favour, that, if he shall elect to retain it until he has made thirty-six monthly payments as they fall due, the piano is then to become his property. The only obligation which is laid upon him is to pay the stipulated monthly hire so long as he chooses to keep the piano. In other words, he is at liberty to determine the contract in the usual way, by returning the thing hired to its owner. He is under no obligation to purchase the thing, or to pay a price for it. There is no purchase and no agreement for purchase, until the hirer actually exercises the option given to him."

The learned Law Lord further observed (p. 479):

"Apart from the arrangement for hire of the piano, the only right given to Brewster by the agreement in question was the option to become a purchaser. It is true that whilst he was under no obligation to buy, the appellant was legally bound to give him that option, and could not retract it, if the other stipulations of the contract were duly observed by the hirer. But the possession of such a right of option was, in no sense, an agreement by Brewster to buy the piano; and the appellant's obligation to give the option was not, in the sense of law, an agreement by him to sell. In order to constitute an agreement for sale and purchase, there must be two parties who are mutually bound by it. From a legal point of view the appellant was in exactly the same position as if he had made an offer to sell on certain terms, and had undertaken to keep it open for a definite period. Until acceptance by the person to whom the offer is made there can be no contract to buy. So long as the agreement stood unaltered there could, in this case be no contract to purchase by Brewster until he had complied with the terms of the option given him and had duly made the thirty-six monthly payments which it prescribes as the condition of his becoming owner of the piano."

Mr. Deo's argument based on this decision is that in every contract of hire-purchase in which there is an option given to the hirer to purchase on the fulfilment of the terms of the agreement and where the terms of the agreement further entitle him to return the goods at any time during the continuance of the contract and absolve him from any liability to make the further payments under the contract, there is no agreement to buy and no agreement to sell and, therefore, no contract of sale involved. Now, it cannot be denied that the features mentioned by Mr. Deo are features which have an important bearing on determining the true legal nature of the transaction between the parties. What is however necessary to consider is: are these features capable of conclusively determining in each case of hire-purchase the nature of the transaction? Even in Helby v. Matthews the learned Lord Chancellor started by saying that it is the substance of the transaction evidenced by the agreement that must be looked at and not mere words. The substance of the agreement no doubt must be ascertained from a consideration of the rights and obligations of the parties to be derived from the terms of the contract itself understood in the light of the surrounding circumstances. In Helby v. Matthews they considered the terms of the agreement which was before them and gathered the substance of the agreement from the said terms having regard to the important feature which they mentioned and concluded that the transaction was a transaction of hiring with a further condition that an option was given to the hirer to become the owner of the hired article if he desired to do so. The terms of the agreement were that there was a uniform payment by way of monthly hire required to be made by the hirer to the owner so long as he possessed the hired article. He was in a position to return it at any time but was also enabled to retain it as an owner if he continued to pay the instalments regularly for a period of 36 months. In view of these terms, their Lordships observed that there was nothing to indicate from the contract that the parties to the contract from the very inception were intending to sell and purchase the article. In other words, the contract before the Court was such which, on a true construction of all the terms of the agreement, did not indicate that the hirer had made up his intention to buy the article which was hired. There was also no legal obligation undertaken by him to buy whereby he could have been bound. Now, that can no doubt be the case in a large number of hire-purchase agreements. Thus, for instance, if the owner of the article lets it on hire to the hirer on terms that he should pay a monthly hire as long as he wants to possess the instrument; but if at any time during the continuance of the agreement he wants to become the owner of the article, he may, by making a further payment, become the owner of the article, or, for the matter of that, if he continues to pay instalments for a certain interval of time, he may have the option to become the owner of the article if he chose. In such a case obviously no intention to sell on the part of the owner or no intention on the part of the buyer to purchase could be said to have existed at the time the agreement was entered into. Where, however, we have from the nature of the transaction, from its terms and the surrounding circumstances in which the terms have to be construed and understood that there can be no doubt whatever that the owner and the hirer were intending to sell and purchase the article which was the subject-matter of the agreement right from the time the contract was made, the mere circumstance that the contract also included for certain purposes of convenience of the parties a term as to the option of the buyer to buy or a term as to his being able to return the goods during the continuance of the agreement, these terms would not necessarily have the effect of making the agreement different from what it was really intended to be between the parties. It seems to us, therefore, that what has got to be considered is the true nature of the transaction and what that transaction in substance is. In the case of the transactions of the type which are before us there does not appear to be any doubt whatsoever that in spite of the terms of the contract which could possibly be construed as being indicative of different nature, the parties nevertheless intended to enter into an agreement of purchase and sale. The hirer under the agreement is obviously a person who wants to buy a vehicle. He applies to the dealer, selects a vehicle and pays the initial deposit. What he wants is to avail himself of what is called credit buying and it is for the purpose of having the benefit of credit buying that he enters into the transaction with the petitioner. He wants to buy a car but he has not the funds for the payment down in cash for the car. He, therefore, permits the petitioner to buy the car with its funds and then eventually pass it on to him under a hire-purchase agreement. The process in the present transaction, it appears to us, is a process of credit buying taken advantage of by the buyer. The terms of the agreement, apart from the option given to the buyer and the liberty reserved to him to return the goods, are clearly in favour of such a construction. The initial payment of about 25 per cent. of the price of the article and the heavy payments which are required to be made by way of monthly hire are all indicative of the payments being made towards the price of the vehicle and not purely for the hire of the vehicle for the time for which the vehicle is possessed by the hirer. Having regard to these other terms of the agreement, it seems to us that the option given to the purchaser to buy the vehicle is not so much as to leave him free whether to have the article or not and is not so much to indicate that he has not made up his mind to buy when he enters into the agreement but only to bring in the element of sale, thus preventing the petitioner from refusing to sell the article to the buyer. The option again, considered from the point of view of the petitioner, is for the benefit of the petitioner as well, because it safeguards the petitioner as against the rights of the parties which may come into existence during the term of the agreement. The result of the option is that the passing of the property which is intended to pass in pursuance of the agreement is postponed to the end of the agreement. The liberty given to the buyer to return the goods during the continuance of the contract is not so much to keep him a free agent to terminate the contract of hiring whenever he wants but to provide for the exceptional cases where by reason of things beyond the control of the buyer, he is not in a position to pay the monthly instalments agreed to and thus fulfil the agreement. Having regard to the true nature of the transaction, it seems to us that it is a contract with a predominant element of sale in it from its inception which under the terms of the contract fructifies into a completed sale at the end of it. The parties to the contract have intended to buy and to sell. There is a contract therefore to sell, though the operation of the contract is to take effect in a manner so that it may have during its operation an element of bailment also involved in it. In our opinion, therefore, although no doubt as contended by Mr. Deo relying on the authority of Helby v. Matthews that in determining the true nature of a transaction of hire-purchase the term of option given to the hirer and the term of liberty reserved to him to return the goods during the continuance of the contract are terms which have an important bearing in determining the nature of the transaction, we do not think that they are in every case conclusive of the nature of the transaction. They are undoubtedly of great help in determining the true nature of the transaction, but it is on a consideration of the entire terms of the contract read in the light of the surrounding circumstances that the true nature of the transaction has to be determined, and it is possible that even in case where the option to purchase and the liberty to return the goods are reserved in the contract, the contract in its true nature may still be a contract of sale and not merely a contract of hiring with an option to purchase. We must see what is the purpose of introducing the terms as to the option to purchase and liberty to return the goods during the subsistence of the contract. If on a consideration of all the terms of the agreement, it is found that these terms have been intended for the benefit of a buyer who has not made up his mind to buy at the time when he entered into the contract, to leave him free to make up his mind at any later stage and have an option of buying or not buying the article and return it to the owner at any time he liked, then of course the contract will not be an agreement of sale. If, on the other hand, it is clear that the parties to the contract have intended it to be a sale although they have introduced these terms in the working out of the contract for their mutual benefit and convenience, the mere presence of the terms will not, in our opinion, destroy the character of the contract between the parties as an agreement to buy and to sell. What is necessary to consider is whether the transaction in substance is a transaction of sale although an element of bailment is added to it, or whether it is contract of hiring with an added offer to the hirer to buy the hired article at his option.

Another case which may be referred to in this connection is that reported in Instalment Supply (Private) Ltd. v. Union of India.²¹ The Supreme Court in that case had to consider the true nature of a transaction of the same type which is before us in the present case. Having considered the true nature of the transaction, their Lordships observed (p. 500) :

"There is, thus, no doubt that the agreement in question does contain not only a contract of bailment simpliciter but also an element of sale, which element has been seized upon by the legislature for the purpose of subjecting a transaction like that to the sales tax."

Mr. Deo has brought to our notice the contrary view taken in two cases, the first of which is reported in Instalment Supply Limited v. State of Delhi.²² The transaction which was considered in that case was similar in terms to the transaction before us. It was held by the Punjab High Court in that case relying on Helby v. Matthews and certain other English cases that having regard to the option given to the buyer there was no contract of sale. The other case referred to by him is of the Madhya Pradesh High Court reported in Indian Finance Private Ltd. v. Sales Tax Officer. The same view is taken in that case as has been taken in Instalment Supply Limited v. State of Delhi referred to above. It appears to us that in both these cases, the learned Judges who decided them took the view that the presence of the option was always and necessarily destructive of the contract ever being an agreement to sell and to purchase. As we have already pointed out, we are unable to agree with that view. According to us, it is from the real nature of the transaction as gathered from all the terms of the contract including the terms relating to the option and the liberty reserved to the buyer to return the goods that the true nature of the transaction must be determined and it is possible that in the several forms of credit buying transactions which are invented in the present times to serve the needs of the buyers and the sellers, the mere existence of an option will not be sufficient to characterise the transaction as a transaction not intended to be a sale.

If as we have held, the transactions of the type which is before us are substantially intended to be transactions of sale and purchase and contain the elements of sale which fructify at the end of the agreement, there would be no difficulty in holding that they can be regarded as transactions of sale, so as to bring them within the definition of sale under the Act. There will also be no difficulty in treating them as transactions of sale from the inception, subject of course to adjustment in the event the sale element fails to fructify. So far as this contention is concerned, our conclusions are, with respect, the same as have been arrived at by the Madras High Court in Commercial Credit Corporation v. Dy. Commercial Tax Officer, namely—

(i) that the transactions of hirepurchase entered into by the petitioner constitute sales rendering them liable to tax on their turnover except in cases where either owing to the default on the part of the hirer in the payment of the instalments of hire, the vehicle was seized by the petitioner or in cases where the vehicle was returned by the buyer to the petitioner under the liberty reserved to him under the agreement;

(ii) that the transactions of hire-purchase of the type before us could, having regard to their main intent and purpose, be treated as sales at the moment the agreements were entered into, subject to adjustment by elimination of such turnover where no sales resulted; and

(iii) that for the purposes of computing the turnover of the petitioner, the total of the hire stipulated to be paid in instalments should be treated as the price or consideration for the sale.

Having regard to the conclusions to which we have arrived, we must hold that the petitioner fails on the first point urged by him, namely, that the notices issued by the Sales Tax Officers in the present case are invalid by reason of a notice under sub-s. (1) of s. 10 not having been issued prior to the issuance of the notices complained of. On the second point which he has urged, he succeeds to the extent that the notices issued against him by the Sales Tax Officers are incompetent for all periods except the last quarter of the year 1959 commencing from October 1, 1959 and ending on December 31, 1959. On the third point which has been urged by him, he fails. Having regard to these conclusions, the petitioner will be entitled to a declaration that the impugned notices issued to him by the Sales Tax Officers, Nagpur and Wardha, are incompetent except for the last quarter of the year 1959 commencing from October 1, 1959 and ending on December 31, 1959, and a further direction not to give effect to the said notices in respect of the period which is covered by them except the said last quarter from October 1, 1959 to December 31, 1959. We order accordingly. We will also make it clear that the petition has been heard by us only in respect of the three contentions which we have set out. All other contentions which the petitioner is entitled to urge before the Sales Tax Authorities and which are not covered by our decision, he will be at liberty to raise. Having regard to the circumstances of the case, there will be no order as to costs.

Order accordingly.

SYED MOHOMMAD ILYAS ALVI v. STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

Constitution of India. Arts. 235, 50, 233-237, 310, 311—General Clauses Act (X of 1897). Sec. 16—Government of India Act, 1935 [25 & 26 Geo. 5, Ch. 42], Secs. 253, 254, 255—Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. Appendix I. Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules. Rule 57—Disciplinary jurisdiction over District Judges and Judges subordinate to them—Such jurisdiction whether vests exclusively in High Court—Whether decision regarding holding departmental inquiry or action for misconduct against aforesaid Judges vests exclusively with High Court—Power of dismissal or removal of such Judges how to be exercised—Course to be adopted where High Court finds that probable consequence of charges against judicial officer being proved would end in his dismissal or removal—Observations made by High Court on report of Enquiry Officer or on reply to show cause notice whether must be disclosed to party affected—Such observations whether privileged document.

Under the Constitution of India the disciplinary jurisdiction over District Judges and Judges subordinate to them vests exclusively in the High Court except making an order of dismissal or removal. The decision in the matter of starting a departmental enquiry or action for misconduct against a District Judge or a Judge subordinate to a District Judge vests exclusively with the High Court. The power of dismissal and removal of District Judges and Judges subordinate to District Judges vests in the Governor. The exercise of the aforesaid power of dismissal and removal of District Judges by the Governor has to be in consultation with the High Court.

Where on preliminary investigation the High Court comes to the conclusion that the probable consequence of the charges against a judicial officer being proved would be one of dismissal or removal of the judicial officer, the course that should be adopted would be to refer the matter to the Governor recommending appointment of an enquiry officer which is the first stage of giving a reasonable opportunity to a public servant.

The power conferred on the Governor by art. 233 read with art. 310 of the Constitution and s. 16 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, to dismiss or suspend a civil servant has to be exercised in the same manner as the power of appointment under art. 237 is to be exercised, that is, in consultation with the High Court.

The observations of the High Court made on the report of the Enquiry Officer appointed by the Governor on the recommendation of the High Court to hold a departmental inquiry on a charge of corruption against a civil servant and also the observations of the High Court on the cause shown by the civil servant form part of the consultation provided for in art. 233, and the civil servant cannot make a grievance for non-disclosure of these observations to him. Such observations do not form part of the evidence which goes to establish his guilt or innocence.

The observations of the High Court would be a privileged document and, therefore, no complaint can be made of non-disclosure of that document.

The authority which is enjoined with a duty to act in a quasi judicial manner must disclose to the person against whom action has been taken material which is in the nature of evidence on the acceptance or rejection of which turns the decision as to the guilt or innocence of the person against whom an enquiry is held or against whom an action is being taken. M. N. Phadke and M. W. Puranik, for the petitioner.

R. B. Kotval, Government Pleader, with G. R. Mudholkar, Additional Government Pleader, for the State of Maharashtra.

TAMBE J. By this petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India, the petitioner seeks to get quashed the order of his dismissal of date August 30, 1961, and also to get quashed the further order of dismissal of his appeal of date October 16, 1962. The petitioner further prays for issuance of a writ of mandamus to the respondent, namely, the State of Maharashtra, to treat the petitioner as if the orders dated August 30, 1961, and October 16, 1962, were not passed.

The petitioner joined the Provincial Judicial Service of the State of Madhya Pradesh. He was recruited as a Civil Judge, Second Class. On the eve of reorganisation of States that is on October 31, 1956, the petitioner was holding a post of an Additional District and Sessions Judge (confirmed) at Seoni. He was allotted on reorganisation to the State of Bombay. The petitioner in the reorganised State of Bombay was holding a post of Assistant Judge and at the material time, that is on September 30, 1959, the petitioner was holding a post of an Assistant Judge and Additional Sessions Judge, Sangli. Prior to his posting at Sangli, the petitioner was holding a post of an Assistant Judge and an Additional Sessions Judge at Amravati. The High Court on certain information received by it had directed the District and Sessions Judge, Amravati, Shri Hadole and also the Anti-Corruption Department to hold a confidential enquiry into the conduct of the petitioner. On receiving the confidential report and on its perusal the High Court was of the opinion that there was a prima facie case for a regular departmental enquiry to be started against the petitioner. The High Court recommended to the State Government that a departmental enquiry should be started against the petitioner and that the District and Sessions Judge at Nagpur Shri Seth should be appointed an Enquiry Officer. The recommendations of the High Court were accepted by the State Government and by its letter of date September 30, 1959, the State Government informed the Registrar of the High Court that the recommendations of the High Court were accepted, that Mr. Seth, District Judge, Nagpur, was appointed an Enquiry Officer to hold the enquiry and further requested the Registrar to communicate this order to the petitioner and also to request the petitioner to proceed on leave immediately pending completion of the departmental enquiry as an alternative to suspension. The order which the Government had made in this respect was sent to Mr. Seth, District Judge, Nagpur. Intimation of the aforesaid communication was duly given by the Registrar to the petitioner. Mr. Seth framed charges and communicated to the petitioner on or about December 8, 1959, the charges framed against the petitioner and the statements of allegation on the basis of which the charges were framed. The charges framed against the petitioner were two. The first charge framed against the petitioner was that he was guilty of dishonourable and corrupt conduct and had indulged in corrupt practices while working as First Additional District and Sessions Judge, Amravati, during the period from June 21, 1957, to March 31, 1959. In the first charge framed, two specific instances, instances (a) and (b), of the corrupt practices were given. The second charge was that the petitioner knowingly associated himself with litigants whose matters had been decided by him or whose matters were pending before him and were to be heard by him and that he had conducted himself in a manner which was unworthy of a person occupying a judicial office and had thereby brought the judiciary in disrepute. The petitioner after receiving the charges, duly filed his written statement on December 22, 1959. Mr. Seth after holding a departmental enquiry submitted his report of date February 27, 1960. On August 30, 1960, a show cause notice was issued to the petitioner calling upon him to show cause within 30 days of the receipt of the notice why the proposed action, namely, dismissal, should not be taken against him. The petitioner showed cause by his reply dated September 29, 1960. After considering the reply, the order of dismissal was made on August 30, 1961, by the Governor of Maharashtra. The order is signed by the Secretary to the Government of Maharashtra, Law and Judiciary Department, by order and in the name of the Governor of Maharashtra. Along with the order of dismissal of the petitioner a copy of the extract of the letter from the Secretary, Maharashtra Public Service Commission, was also sent to the petitioner. On September 14, 1961, the petitioner submitted an appeal to the Governor through the Secretary, Law and Judicial Department and the Registrar, High Court, purporting to be one under rule 57 of the Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules which have been incorporated as Appendix I in the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. This appeal was dismissed by an order dated October 16, 1962. By this petition which has been instituted on December 17, 1962, the petitioner, as already stated, is seeking to get quashed these two orders, the order of his dismissal and the order dismissing the appeal against the order of dismissal.

Mr. Phadke, learned counsel for the petitioner, has raised three contentions before us. Mr. Phadke firstly contends that the order made by the Governor on September 30, 1959, appointing Mr. Seth to hold a departmental enquiry in respect of the alleged charges was wholly without jurisdiction, consequently all further orders made, namely, the report of Mr. Seth and the order of dismissal made by the Governor have been vitiated and are invalid and inoperative in law. The jurisdiction to hold a departmental enquiry and to appoint an officer to hold a departmental enquiry exclusively vests in the High Court. Secondly, Mr. Phadke contends that even assuming that the Governor had jurisdiction to appoint an enquiry officer to hold an enquiry, the order of dismissal made is vitiated being one in contravention of principles of natural justice. And, lastly, Mr. Phadke contends that the right of appeal which has been conferred by r. 57 on the petitioner has been denied to him inasmuch as independent mind had not been applied to the consideration of his appeal. Mr. Kotwal, learned Government Pleader, on the other hand, contends that the jurisdiction to hold a departmental enquiry exclusively vests in the Governor and, therefore, the order made by the Governor on September 30, 1959, appointing Mr. Seth to hold a departmental enquiry was a perfectly valid order made with jurisdiction. The order of dismissal made by the Governor has not been vitiated by reason of contravention of any principles of natural justice, and lastly Mr. Kotwal contends that the petitioner gets no right of appeal under the aforesaid r. 57. We would proceed to consider these contentions of the respective parties seriatim.

The first contention of Mr. Phadke and Mr. Kotwal principally turns on the construction of arts. 227, 233, 234, 235, 309, 310 and 311 of the Constitution of India. We think, before we proceed to deal with the arguments of counsel for parties, it will be convenient to consider relevant provisions of the Constitution.

Part VI of the Constitution relates to the States and Chapter V thereof relates to the High Court in the States. Article 217(1) provides that every Judge of a High Court shall be appointed by the President by warrant under his hand and seal after consultation with the Chief Justice of India, the Governor of the State, and, in the case of appointment of a Judge other than the Chief Justice, the Chief Justice of the High Court. Article 218 provides that cls. (4) and (5) of art. 124 shall apply in relation to a High Court as they apply in relation to the Supreme Court with the substitution of references to the High Court for references to the Supreme Court. Clauses (4) and (5) of art. 124 relate to the procedure to be followed for the removal of a Judge of the Supreme Court and, with adaption in art. 218, for the removal of the High Court Judge. It would be seen that the Judges could only be removed by the order of the President and after an address by each House of Parliament supported by a majority of the total membership of that House and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting has been presented to the President. Article 227(1) provides that every High Court shall have superintendence over all Courts and tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction. Clause (2) of that article provides that without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred on the High Court by the aforesaid cl. (1) the High Court may call for certain returns and make and issue general rules, prescribe forms etc.

Chapter VI deals with 'Subordinate Courts' to the High Court and the said Chapter consists of arts. 233 to 237, both inclusive. Article 233 deals with appointment of District Judges and cl. (1) thereof provides that appointments of persons to be, and the posting and promotion of, District Judges in any State shall be made by the Governor of the State in consultation with the High Court exercising jurisdiction in relation to such State. Clause (2) provides that a person not already in the service of the Union or of the State shall only be eligible to be appointed a District Judge if he has been for not less than seven years an advocate or a pleader and is recommended by the High Court for appointment. Article 234 relates to recruitment of persons other than District Judges to the Judicial service and it provides that the appointments of persons other than District Judges to the Judicial service of a State shall be made by the Governor of the State in accordance with rules made by him in that behalf after consultation with the State Public Service Commission and with the High Court exercising jurisdiction in relation to such State. Article 235 vests in the High Court control over District Courts and Courts subordinate thereto including the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to, persons belonging to the judicial service of a State and holding any post inferior to the post of District Judge. Article 236 provides a dictionary for the expression "district judge" and it is sufficient to state that in cl. (a) of art. 236, Assistant Judge is included in the expression District Judge. Clause (b) provides a dictionary for the expression 'judicial service'.

Part XIV of the Constitution relates to services under the Union and the States. Articles 309, 310 and 311 fall in Chapter I of this Part, and art. 309 confers power on the appropriate Legislature to enact law subject to the provisions of the Constitution to regulate the recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed, to public services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Union or of any State. The proviso to this article confers power on the President or the Governor to make rules in this respect until provision in that behalf is made by or under an Act of the appropriate Legislature under this article. Clause (1) of art. 310 provides, except as expressly provided by the Constitution, every person who is a member of a defence service or of a civil service of the Union or of an all-India service or holds any post connected with defence or any civil post under the Union, holds office during the pleasure of the President, and every person who is a member of a Civil service of State or holds any civil post under a State holds office during the pleasure of the Governor of the State.

Article 311, as it stood prior to its amendment by the Constitution (15th Amendment) Act, reads as follows:

"(1) No person who is a member of a civil service of the Union or an all-India service or a civil service of a State or holds a civil post under the Union or a State shall be dismissed or removed by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed.

(2) No such person as aforesaid shall be dismissed or removed or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him."

We may state here that no law regulating recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to the said services has been enacted by the State Legislature nor have there been any rules framed by the Governor after the Constitution came into force. However, there had been rules framed under s. 96(5) of the Government of India Act, 1915, as amended by the Amending Act of 1919. These rules were framed in the year 1930 and they are called Central Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules. It is not in dispute that the rules which may be required to be considered for the purpose of this case are r. 49, which enumerates penalties, r. 52, which relates to the disciplinary authority, r. 85, which prescribes the procedure to be followed at the enquiry and r. 57, which relates to the right of appeal. These rules were continued both under the Government of India Act by virtue of s. 276 and art. 313 of the Constitution. That article provides that until other provision is made in this behalf under this Constitution, all the laws in force immediately before the commencement of this Constitution and applicable to any public service or any post which continues to exist after the commencement of this Constitution, as an all-India service or as service or post under the Union or a State shall continue in force so far as consistent with the provisions of this Constitution.

Considering the aforesaid provisions, the position that emerges is that superintendence and control over all Courts subordinate to it vests in the High Court. The power of posting, promotion and appointment of District Judges is conferred on the Governor in consultation with the High Court. Posting of a person not in judicial service to a post of a District Judge rests with the Governor on the recommendation of the High Court. The power of appointing Judges other than District Judges to the judicial service rests with the Governor. Exercise of that power is controlled in accordance with the rules made by the Governor in that behalf after consultation with the State Public Service Commission and the High Court. Control over the subordinate judiciary (District Judges and Judges subordinate to them) vests in the High Court. Tenure of office of a subordinate Judicial Officer is at the pleasure of the Governor, but it is now well settled that the exercise of that pleasure is subject to two conditions provided in art. 311 of the Constitution, namely, the civil servant cannot be dismissed or removed by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed, and the second restriction is that such a person cannot be dismissed or removed or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him.

It is the argument of Mr. Phadke that superintendence and control over subordinate Courts vest in the High Court under arts. 227 and 235 of the Constitution. The High Court, therefore, has exclusive jurisdiction in disciplinary matters. No doubt, the power of appointing District Judges as well as Judges subordinate to District Judges rests with the Governor and ordinarily all the powers in relation to suspension and dismissal would by implication also rest with the Governor by virtue of s. 16 of the Central General Clauses Act. But such power cannot be read in arts. 233 and 234 inasmuch as in art. 235 a 'different intention appears'. Article 310 no doubt provides that the tenure of a civil servant shall be at the pleasure of the Governor but that pleasure has to be exercised subject to the qualifications mentioned in art. 311 and one of the qualifications is that he has to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to show cause against the proposed action. That opportunity has to be afforded to him in accordance with the provisions of law. The disciplinary authority being the High Court under art. 235, a reasonable opportunity has to be afforded by the High Court. The High Court, therefore, had to appoint an officer to conduct the departmental enquiry and it was the High Court and the High Court alone which could have made that appointment. According to Mr. Phadke, on the construction of these articles the position that emerges is that the High Court being the exclusive disciplinary authority, it must appoint an officer to hold a departmental enquiry. It is the High Court that must consider the report, and if the High Court comes to the conclusion on consideration of the report that the charges proved merit dismissal or removal, then in that event the High Court has to recommend to the Governor that the said civil servant should be dismissed or removed from service, the Governor being the appointing authority. If, on the other hand, the High Court comes to the conclusion that the charges proved against the civil servant are not such as would require or merit imposition of penalty of dismissal or removal, then it is not necessary for the High Court to refer the matter to the Governor. It can impose penalty it thinks proper on the individual officer. Mr. Phadke placed reliance in support of his contention on the decision of a Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Nripendra Nath v. Chief Secy. Govt. W. B.,¹ *Mad. Ghose v. State of Andhra*² and *Mohd. Ghose v. State of Andh. Pra.*³

Mr. Kotwal, on the other hand, argued that the proper approach to the case would be first to consider relevant articles other than art. 235 and ascertain their contents. Control that is vested in the High Court under art. 235 is what has not been conferred on other authorities under articles other than art. 235. According to Mr. Kotwal the power of appointing both District Judges as well as Judges subordinate to District Judges rests with the Governor. Reading these articles along with s. 16 of the General Clauses Act, that power of appointing will also include the power to dismiss or suspend District Judges as well as Judges subordinate to District Judges. The power of dismissal and suspension is not expressly given in arts. 233 and 234 because s. 16 of the General Clauses Act was already there. He drew our attention to certain observations in K. V. Rayarappan Nayanar v. K. V. Madhavi Amma.⁴ He further argued that the submission made by him is also strengthened because it is the Governor who has been empowered to make rules regulating conditions of service of a civil servant. Expression 'conditions of service' include the circumstances under which a person could be dismissed or removed. Further under art. 310 a civil servant in the State holds office during the pleasure of the Governor. No doubt the pleasure has to be exercised subject to the conditions mentioned in art. 311. But it is the Governor who has to afford a reasonable opportunity to the public servant who is proposed to be removed or dismissed from service. Reading all these provisions together, it is the Governor who has a right to appoint, therefore a right to dismiss. It is the Governor who has power to frame rules regulating conditions of service which include the power to make rules relating to the circumstances and the tenure of office of District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judges. The combined effect of all these powers leaves no doubt that it is the Governor who is the sole disciplinary authority. Mr. Kotwal placed reliance on a decision of the Supreme Court reported in Pradyat Kumar Bose v. The Hon'ble the Chief Justice of Calcutta High Court.⁵ According to Mr. Kotwal, therefore, the control vesting in the High Court is not disciplinary control. On the other hand, the control conferred is on Courts and not Judges of the Courts save and except three matters, namely, posting, and promotion of and grant of leave to Judges subordinate to the District Court.

With respect to the learned counsel appearing for both sides we find it difficult to adopt the approach of either of them. Mr. Phadke wants us to construe art. 235 by itself and then proceed to other articles while Mr. Kotwal wants us first to consider articles other than art. 235 and then to come to art. 235. In our opinion, the rule of construction requires that all the relevant provisions of a statute must be considered together in order to understand the legislative intent. It is first necessary to ascertain what is the true meaning of the two expressions 'court' and 'control' occurring in art. 235 of the Constitution. These two expressions have not been defined in the Constitution. The Constitution does not provide any dictionary for these two expressions. In Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd edn.) Vol. 9, at page 342 the meaning of Court has been given in the following terms:

"Originally the term 'Court' meant, among other meanings, the Sovereign's palace; it has acquired the meaning of the place where justice is administered and, further, has come to mean the persons who exercise judicial functions under authority derived either immediately or mediately from the Sovereign."

A similar meaning of the expression 'court' is given in volume 21 of Corpus Juris Secundum in the following terms:

"While the meaning of the term 'court' will vary with the context in which it is used, generally speaking a court is a body in the Government to which the public administration of justice is delegated, being a tribunal officially assembled under authority of law, at the appropriate time and place, for the administration of justice, through which the State enforces its sovereign rights and powers... A Court has also been defined as a place where justice is judicially administered."

Having regard to this accepted definition of the expression 'court' there can hardly be any doubt that the expression means not only the building or the place where justice is administered but also the Judges who administer justice.

The Oxford English Dictionary, Vol. II, has given the meaning of the word 'control' as "to exercise restraint or direction upon the free action of; to hold sway over, exercise power or authority over, to dominate, command."

Webster's Dictionary has defined 'control' in the following terms:

"To exercise such an influence over (something) as to guide, direct, manage or restrain (it); to have under command, to check."

We find no reason to give a restricted meaning to the expression 'control'.

Other part of art. 235 itself indicates that the meaning of the word 'control' is the ordinary meaning which we have quoted above. It would be noticed that the later part of art. 235 provides, but nothing in this article shall be construed as taking away from any such person any right of appeal which he may have under the law regulating the conditions of his service or as authorising the High Court to deal with him otherwise than in accordance with the conditions of his service prescribed under such law. The later half of art. 235 indicates that the nature of control is such that the exercise thereof may give rise to a right of appeal under the law regulating the conditions of his service. If we turn to the rules to which we have already referred, we find that there is no right of appeal save and except where disciplinary action imposing penalty is taken. The clause in the later half "to deal with him otherwise than in accordance with the conditions of his service" indicates that the exercise of the right of control is in respect of the conditions of his service. Reading the article as a whole there is hardly any doubt that the control vested in the High Court is the control which is disciplinary in nature over District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judges. In other words, the control vested in the High Court under art. 235 is disciplinary control over subordinate Courts. An argument was advanced by Mr. Kotwal that the nature of the control vested in the High Court is indicated in the article itself and that is the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to persons belonging to the judicial service of a State and holding any post inferior to the post of District Judge. According to Mr. Kotwal, that is the only control. We find it difficult to accept this construction put on the article by Mr. Kotwal, because what has been mentioned in the article is "the control... including the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to..." The definition is thus an inclusive definition and it is a well-settled principle which has been reiterated by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in State of Bombay v. Hospital Mazdoor Sabha:⁶

"...the words used in an inclusive definition denote extension and cannot be treated as restricted in any sense. Where the Courts are dealing with an inclusive definition it would be inappropriate to put a restrictive interpretation upon terms of wider denotation."

The clause "including the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to, persons belonging to the judicial service" cannot, therefore, have the effect of a restrictive than ordinary meaning of the word control, or to confine its meaning only to these three things. The view taken by us also finds support in the legislative history and arts. 50 and 237 of the Constitution. We need not trace it prior to the Government of India Act, 1935. Sections 253, 254 and 255 of the Government of India Act are the special provisions as to judicial officers. Section 254 relates to appointments, posting and promotion of District Judges and the provisions of art. 233 in the Constitution are the corresponding provisions in s. 254 of the Government of India Act. Section 255 of the Government of India Act is the corresponding provision of art. 234 of the Constitution relating to recruitment of persons other than District Judges who have been termed in s. 255 of the Government of India Act "subordinate civil judicial service". It would, however, be noticed that though by virtue of sub-s. (3) of s. 255 the power of posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to, persons belonging to the subordinate civil judicial service of a Province and holding any post inferior to the post of District Judge, was vested in the High Court, there was no provision there vesting in the High Court control over District Courts and Courts subordinate thereto. It has been for the first time vested in the High Court by art. 235 of the Constitution of India. It would, therefore, be legitimate to assume that the "control" vested in the High Court was something more than power of posting and promotion of and grant of leave to subordinate judicial officers. It has to be noticed that the makers of the Constitution were framing Constitution of a Sovereign Democratic Republic and by arts. 233 to 237 were making provision for Courts subordinate to the High Court. High Court was independent of the Executive. Such, however, was not the case relating to the judiciary subordinate to the High Court. Certain measure of a Representative Government was introduced by enactment of the Government of India Act, 1935. The then Joint Parliamentary Committee in its report pointed out:

"We have been greatly impressed by the mischiefs which have resulted elsewhere from a system under which promotion from grade to grade in a judicial hierarchy is in the hands of a Minister exposed to pressure from members of a popularly elected Legislature. Nothing is more likely to sap the independence of a magistrate than the knowledge that his career depends upon the favour of a Minister.... It is the subordinate judiciary in India who are brought most clearly into contact with the people, and it is no less important, perhaps indeed even more important, that their independence should be placed beyond question than in the case of the superior judges."

It is also pertinent to note that the power to posting and promotion of, and grant of leave to, persons belonging to the subordinate civil judicial services of a Province was conferred on the High Court for the first time under sub-s. (3) of s. 255 of the Government of India Act. It would be reasonable to assume that the Joint Parliamentary Committee's report and the necessity of having independent subordinate judiciary was before the Constituent Assembly at the time of the framing of the Constitution. Article 50 which provides that the State shall take steps to separate the judiciary from the executive in the Public services of the State clearly indicates that the necessity of making subordinate judiciary independent of executive control was before the Constituent Assembly. It is in these circumstances that the control over District Courts and Courts subordinate to District Courts has been conferred on the High Court in addition to the posting and promotion of and the grant of leave to persons belonging to the judicial service. In our opinion, it is a deliberate step taken towards the ultimate objective stated in art. 50 of the Constitution. Article 237 also indicates the same legislative intent. That article provides that the Governor may by public notification direct that the foregoing provisions of this Chapter and any rules made thereunder shall with effect from such date as may be fixed by him in that behalf apply in relation to any class or classes of magistrates in the State as they apply in relation to persons appointed to the judicial service of the State subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the notification. It is clear that the Constituent Assembly by framing this article has enabled the Governor to take further steps in the matter of separation of judiciary from the control of executive by bringing magistracy under the control of the High Court. In our opinion, therefore, the expression 'control' in art. 235 includes the power to exercise disciplinary jurisdiction over District Courts and courts subordinate thereto.

The question next arises is whether the power conferred is absolute or whether there are any limitations thereon. We have already said that the rule of construction requires that all the relevant provisions of law should be read together and the statute must be so construed that if reasonably possible all the relevant provisions should harmonise with one another and not be in conflict with one another. Articles 233 and 234 confer powers on the Governor to appoint District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judges though the exercise of the powers is regulated in the manner provided in those articles.

Section 16 of the General Clauses Act provides

"Where, by any Central Act... a power to make any appointment is conferred, then, unless, a different intention appears, the authority having for the time being, power to make the appointment shall also have power to suspend or dismiss any person appointed, whether by itself or any other authority, in exercise of that power."

It has been the argument of Mr. Phadke that the provisions of art. 235 disclosed a different intention. It has to be noticed that art. 235 does not in express terms say that the Governor shall not have the power to dismiss or suspend or that the High Court shall have exclusive power to dismiss or suspend. It is, therefore, difficult to accept Mr. Phadke's contention that there is any different intention in art. 235 which would exclude application of s. 16 of the General Clauses Act. Article 367 makes the provisions of the General Clauses Act applicable for the interpretation of the Constitution. In K. V. Rappan Nayanar v. K. V. Madhavi Amma, their Lordships of the Federal Court have observed that the power to terminate flows naturally and as a necessary sequence from the power to create. Their Lordships observed (p. 669) :

"...The General Clauses Act has been enacted so as to avoid superfluity of language in statutes wherever it is possible to do so. The legislature instead of saying in O. XL, r. 1, (provision relating to appointment of receiver), that the Court will have power to appoint, suspend or remove a receiver, simply enacted that wherever convenient the court may appoint a receiver and it was implied within that language that it may also remove or suspend him."

It would be noticed from the observations of their Lordships that one of the objects in enacting the General Clauses Act was to avoid superfluity of language in the various enactments that the Legislature enacts. The ratio that emerges from this decision is that the power of appointing District Judges and Judges subordinate to them includes the power of dismissing them and that well settled principle of law will also have to be read in the relevant articles. The Governor has the power to appoint District Judges as well as Judges subordinate to the District Judges. It would, therefore, follow that the legislative intent is that the Governor will also have the power to suspend or dismiss these Judges, namely, District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judges. Of course, the exercise of the power to suspend or dismiss will be subject to the same limitation as the power to appoint is.

Apart from the aforesaid position obtaining by reason of the provisions of s. 16 of the General Clauses Act, the same result would also follow by virtue of the provisions of arts. 310 and 311 of the Constitution. Article 310, as already stated, provides that the tenure of office of civil servants shall be at the pleasure of the Governor. No doubt the pleasure has to be exercised subject to certain qualifications contained in art. 311 but, none the less the over-riding power of terminating the tenure of office of a civil servant rests with the Governor. The qualifications for the exercise of this pleasure indicated in art. 311 would also lead to the same result. One of the qualifications is that no authority subordinate to the appointing authority can dismiss a civil servant. In other words, dismissal for misconduct has to be by the appointing authority or the authority superior to the appointing authority. The Governor was the appointing authority in this case. It would naturally follow that the power to dismiss a District Judge or a Judge subordinate to the District Judge would be that of the Governor. None of the decisions to which our attention was drawn by Mr. Phadke has held to the contrary. On the other hand, all the decisions admit that power to pass an order of dismissal is exclusively that of the Governor.

The question that next arises is whether the power to dismiss would also include the power to impose penalty other than dismissal or removal. We have already stated that Mr. Kotwal has so contended. The argument has been that it is the Governor who is the appointing authority and it is the Governor who has the power to make rules regulating recruitment and conditions of service including the provision relating to dismissal for misconduct. It is the Governor who has the power to dismiss. The combination of these three powers exhausts all disciplinary jurisdiction. There is no difficulty in accepting that the conditions of service would include the provision relating to dismissal or to take disciplinary action. But we find it difficult to see why even where there is a combination of all these three powers it should necessarily cover the entire disciplinary field in spite of the provisions to the contrary in the enactment. In the first instance, the aforesaid three powers are not absolutely vested in the Governor. The power of appointing District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judges no doubt rests with the Governor, but the recruitment has to be made according to the rules and in consultation with the Public Service Commission and the High Court. The power of dismissal of District Judges has to be read in arts. 233 and 234 of the Constitution with the aid of s. 16 of the General Clauses Act. The exercise of the power of dismissal will, therefore, have to be in the same manner as the exercise of the power of appointment and therefore even the power of dismissal will have to be exercised by the Governor in consultation with the High Court. The power of making rules relating to recruitment and conditions of service is not the Governor's absolute power. Primarily the power is conferred on the Legislature. It is only by way of a transitional provision that the Governor is empowered to make rules till the enactment of the Legislature has been made. It will thus be seen that the power of the Governor in this matter is not absolute. Further, as we have stated, art. 235 on its true construction vests disciplinary jurisdiction in the High Court. It is, therefore, not possible to accept Mr. Kotwal's argument. On the other hand, it would be reasonable to hold that the power vested in the High Court for taking disciplinary action against District Judges and Judges subordinate to the District Judge is limited only to the extent it has been limited by other provisions which could legitimately be read in other articles and not by process of any artificial implication. The decision in Pradyat Kumar Bose v. The Hon'ble the Chief Justice of Calcutta High Court on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Kotwal in this respect is not of much assistance to him. In that case the question was whether the High Court had power to dismiss the Registrar of the High Court, and after reviewing judicial history and having regard to the fact that the appointing authority was the Chief Justice and that the Chief Justice had the power to make rules, their Lordships of the Supreme Court held that the power to take disciplinary action against the staff of the High Court rested exclusively with the Chief Justice. It would be noticed that under art. 229 absolute power vests in the Chief Justice in the matter of appointments of officers and servants of the High Court. He has not to consult anybody in this matter. It would also be noticed that there is no other article in the Constitution conferring power in respect of disciplinary action on any other authority. In our opinion, therefore, reading all these articles together the position that emerges is—

(1) That the disciplinary jurisdiction over District Judges and Judges subordinate to them vests exclusively in the High Court except making an order of dismissal or removal;

(2) It follows that the decision in the matter of starting a departmental enquiry or action for misconduct against a District Judge or a Judge subordinate to District Judge vests exclusively with the High Court.

(3) The power of dismissal and removal of District Judges and Judges subordinate to District Judges vests in the Governor.

(4) The exercise of the aforesaid power of dismissal and removal of District Judges by the Governor has to be in consultation with the High Court.

The question that next arises is whether in cases where dismissal or removal is a probable consequence the Governor has to be associated with the departmental enquiry at the stage of appointing an enquiry officer or at the stage after the High Court on consideration of the report of enquiry officer has come to a tentative conclusion that the charges have been proved and that the penalty of dismissal or removal should be imposed on the delinquent civil servant. It has been Mr. Phadke's contention that it is the High Court and the High Court alone that has exclusive jurisdiction to appoint enquiry officer and it is only after the High Court comes to a tentative conclusion that the charges have been proved and that the penalty that is required to be imposed is dismissal or removal, that the Governor has to be associated. Mr. Phadke has read the judgment of the Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court reported in Nripendra Nath v. Chief Secretary Government of West Bengal in support of his argument. Facts in that case were peculiar. A senior member of the West Bengal Judicial Service officiating in the higher judicial service and an Additional District Judge over a quarter of a century and when about to reach 55 years, was served with a notice to appear before the Disciplinary Tribunal and its finding was dismissal from service by an order of the State Government. The High Court had not conducted disciplinary proceedings nor was it consulted by the Government before the Disciplinary Tribunal was appointed by the Government to conduct enquiry. All that was done by the Government was to present to the High Court accomplished facts that charges had been framed against the civil servant and results obtained on the enquiry held by the Anti-Corruption Department and that the appointment of the Commissioner of Burdwan Division had been made to hold a departmental enquiry under rule 55 of the Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules. The aforesaid member of the Judicial service had challenged the order on various grounds, one of the grounds being that the control over District Court and Courts subordinate thereto was vested in the High Court under art. 235 of the Constitution and the authority competent to take disciplinary proceedings against him or to deal with him was the High Court and not any other authority. A Special Bench was constituted to consider the contentions raised including the aforesaid one. After considering the various articles of the Constitution, to which we have already referred, Mr. Justice P. B. Mukharji in para. 28 of the judgment made the following observations on which very strong reliance has been placed by Mr. Phadke. These observations read (p. 8) :

"It is no doubt true that under Article 311 read with Articles 310, 233 and 234 of the Constitution the appointing authority in respect of a member of the judicial service of a State being the Governor, the actual dismissing authority must also be the Governor. That only means that the actual order of dismissal has to be made by the Governor. It does not however mean that in supersession of the control of the High Court under Article 235 of the Constitution the Governor or the Government will be entitled to conduct disciplinary proceedings or set up disciplinary Tribunal apart from the High Court. Different Articles of the Constitution on the same subject should, wherever possible, be read consistently and not in resistance with one another. The best reconciliation of these different Articles of the Constitution will lie in the High Court conducting the disciplinary enquiry and sending its report at the conclusion of the enquiry to the Government to make the appropriate order of dismissal or removal. That the Government may not in a particular case accept the report and recommendation of the High Court exercising disciplinary jurisdiction cannot alter the interpretation of the Constitution when it provides dual authority first by vesting control in the High Court under Article 235 and secondly by resting appointment, tenure and dismissal with the Government under Articles 233, 234, 310 and 311 of the Constitution. This duality is not an unmixed evil but is an example of that wholesome constitutional principle of checks and balances so that no one institution can afford to be tyrannical in the exercise of its powers and thereby ensuring the much needed security of public services in India."

With utmost respect, in our opinion, the mode of reconciliation mentioned in the aforesaid observations has the tendency to affect effective exercise of the power of dismissal and removal resting with the Governor. It has been held that the Governor should be associated after the High Court has considered the report of the Enquiry Officer and reached a tentative conclusion that the charges have been proved and the penalty of removal or dismissal is called for. Article 311 enjoins a duty on the appointing authority or an authority not subordinate to him, in whom rests the power of dismissal or removal, to give a reasonable opportunity to the person to show cause why proposed action should not be taken against him. It has now been well-settled by various decisions of the Supreme Court that this opportunity consists of two stages: the first stage is to give an opportunity to the person to show that the charges framed against him are not well founded. In other words, the allegation on which the charges are framed are not true and, the second stage is that even if the charges are held proved, the proposed penalty is uncalled for. The latest decision of the Supreme Court in this respect so far as we are aware is the one reported in Bachhattar Singh v. State of Punjab.⁷ In that case their Lordships were considering whether a departmental enquiry is divisible in two stages: (a) the enquiry which involves a decision of the question whether the allegations made against the servant are true or not, and (b) taking action (i.e. in case the allegations are found to be true) whether the servant should be punished or not and if so in what manner. Their Lordships observed (p. 39):

"...There is just one continuous proceeding though there are two stages in it. The first is coming to a conclusion on the evidence as to whether the charges alleged against the Government servant are established or not and the second is reached only if it is found that they are so established. That stage deals with the action to be taken against the Government servant concerned."

Both these stages are equally judicial. It is clear that a departmental enquiry though in two stages is one continuous proceeding. The Governor being the authority empowered to dismiss or remove and art. 311 enjoining a duty on him to give the civil servant a reasonable opportunity in this respect in our opinion he has to be associated with the departmental enquiry from the first stage and not at the second stage. Mr. Phadke, however, contends that it is not possible, merely on considering the allegations against a civil servant, that the punishment required to be imposed on him would be one of dismissal or removal. That conclusion could only be reached after the departmental enquiry has been completed and the High Court has considered the report of the enquiry officer. There is, therefore, no scope for associating the Governor at a stage prior to the second stage. We find it difficult to accept the aforesaid argument of Mr. Phadke as one of general application. It may be that in some cases it may not be possible to say that the allegations if proved would necessarily require imposition of the penalty of dismissal or removal, but, on the other hand, there may be clear cases where the allegations, if proved, would call for no penalty other than removal or dismissal. For instance, a case where the allegation against a judicial officer is one of corruption. There is hardly any room to assume that a judicial officer against whom charges of corruption have been established should still be retained in judicial service. Of course, each case will depend on its own facts. In our opinion, therefore, where on preliminary investigation the High Court comes to the conclusion that the probable consequence of the charges against a judicial officer being proved would be one of dismissal or removal of the judicial officer, the course that should be adopted would be to refer the matter to the Governor recommending appointment of an enquiry officer which is the first stage of giving a reasonable opportunity to a public servant.

Turning to the facts of the present case, the High Court on receiving certain information directed the District and Sessions Judge, Amravati, Shri Hadole and also the Anti-Corruption Branch, to hold a confidential enquiry into the conduct of the petitioner. These officers after making a confidential enquiry submitted their report to the High Court. The confidential report received by the High Court disclosed a prima facie case of corruption on the part of the petitioner calling for a regular departmental enquiry being started against him. The charges framed indicate that the confidential enquiry disclosed that the petitioner had demanded 20 seers of ghee from one Vasudeo Vithal Chimote of Amravati as consideration for favouring him in the matter relating to certain appeals pending before him and had in fact accepted 5 seers of ghee from him after arguments in the appeals were heard by him but prior to the decisions of these appeals. The other allegation was that he had accepted two tins of ghee from one Atmaram Tukaram Zanzad of Badnera whose appeals had been decided by him and whose suits against the same parties were also pending before him. The allegation was that the petitioner's peon had gone to Badnera to fetch ghee tins and brought the same from the said Atmaram Zanzad. There were also other allegations against him that he was knowingly associating himself with the litigants whose matters were pending before him. These being the charges and allegations against the petitioner, the necessary consequence, if these allegations were proved, was one of dismissal or removal of the petitioner from service. It is in these circumstances that the High Court had recommended to the State Government that a departmental enquiry should be started against the petitioner and that the District and Sessions Judge, Nagpur, should be appointed as Enquiry Officer to conduct this enquiry. These recommendations of the High Court were in their entirety accepted by the State Government and accepting these recommendations of the High Court, the Governor had appointed Shri Seth, District and Sessions Judge, Nagpur, to hold enquiry, on September 30, 1959. It would be noticed that the Governor had appointed the Enquiry Officer to hold the departmental enquiry on the recommendations of the High Court. Disciplinary proceedings thus were initiated by the High Court and not by the Governor. In the circumstances, for the reasons stated above, in our opinion, the order made by the Governor is not one without jurisdiction.

Other two decisions on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Phadke do not run counter and are not in conflict with the view taken by us. It may be stated that both these decisions relate to disciplinary proceedings against one and the same man the petitioner coming to the High Court by a writ petition both against the order of suspension during the pendency of the enquiry and later against the order of dismissal. It is true that the departmental enquiry there was held by a Judge of the High Court appointed by the Chief Justice. But it has to be kept in view that the rules framed by the State provided that departmental enquiry against a judicial officer was to be held by the High Court. It is also to be noticed that the decision does not go to the extent of holding that the appointment of the Enquiry Officer is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the High Court and, therefore, the appointment of the Enquiry Officer by the Governor is without jurisdiction. In this decision it has been held that disciplinary jurisdiction is conferred on the High Court under art. 235 of the Constitution. With respect we concur with this view and we have already so held. The principle has been succinctly laid down by Mr. Justice Subba Rao in Md. Ghouse v. State of Andhra in the following terms (p. 68) :

"To illustrate, the High Court has control and superintendence over subordinate courts. This power necessarily implies that the High Court can take disciplinary action against Subordinate Judges in appropriate cases. The control will certainly be ineffective if the authority exercising the control cannot take disciplinary action against a person under its control. To put it in other words, a superior authority cannot control the actions of a subordinate if he cannot take disciplinary action against him."

With respect, we concur in this view.

But, in our opinion, there is no violation of this principle when initiation of departmental proceeding has been taken by the High Court and thereafter an Enquiry Officer has been appointed by the Governor at the instance of the High Court. The facts in the Calcutta case were entirely different where the High Court was not even consulted before a departmental enquiry was ordered and an officer to hold an enquiry was appointed.

For the reasons stated above, the first contention raised by Mr. Phadke must fail.

This brings us to the second contention raised by Mr. Phadke and that is that the departmental enquiry is vitiated inasmuch as it had been conducted in contravention of the principles of natural justice. The contention is founded on certain allegations made in the first return filed on behalf of the respondent. This contention has been for the first time raised in an application for amendment which we have allowed and had given the respondent an opportunity of filing a return in respect of the amendment allowed. The averment in the first return of the respondent on which this contention is based is in the following terms:

"6. ...I further say that the Enquiry Officer Shri Seth forwarded his report to the High Court for onward despatch to the Government. The High Court while forwarding the report to the Government made their own observations on the finding of the Enquiry Officer and also on the question of punishment. After the receipt of the Enquiry Officer's report along with the remark of the High Court a show cause notice was issued to the petitioner. In reply to the said show cause notice the petitioner filed a long reply. Thereafter the Government again made a reference to the High Court requesting them to offer their remarks about the various contentions raised by the petitioner in his reply to the show cause notice. The High Court thereupon after fully considering the contentions raised by the petitioner in his reply to the show cause notice offered their own observations on each point. After these observations of the High Court were communicated to the Government, the question of punishment was considered and then the Government referred the matter to the Public Service Commission who also agreed that the charges against the petitioner had been proved and that the petitioner should be dismissed from service. It was after this that the final order of dismissal was passed by the Governor of Maharashtra who was empowered to pass the said order."

It is the argument of Mr. Phadke that the admitted position is that the observations of the High Court on the report of the Enquiry Officer as well as the observations of the High Court point by point on the reply sent by the petitioner to the show cause notice were considered by the Governor in reaching the conclusion that the penalty of dismissal should be imposed on the petitioner. According to Mr. Phadke, the aforesaid observations of the High Court was a material on which the Governor had relied against the petitioner in holding that the charges were proved and also in imposing the penalty of dismissal on him. These observations were not shown to the petitioner and that contravened the principles of natural justice, resulting, in vitiating the entire departmental proceeding and the order of dismissal made by the Governor. Reliance is placed by Mr. Phadke on the following decisions: Union of India v. T. R. Varma,⁸ Ramrao v. Accountant General,⁹ Vasant Raghunath v. State,¹⁰ R. v. Architects' Registration Tribunal,¹¹ Brajlal v. Union of India,¹² R. v. Stafford Borough Justices.¹³

Principles of natural justice have been laid down by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Union of India v. T. R. Varma. At page 507 of the Report their Lordships observed:

"Now, it is no doubt true that the evidence of the respondent and his witnesses was not taken in the mode prescribed in the Evidence Act; but that Act has no application to enquiries conducted by tribunals, even though they may be judicial in character. The law requires that such tribunals should observe rules of natural justice in the conduct of the enquiry, and if they do so, their decision is not liable to be impeached on the ground that the procedure followed was not in accordance with that, which obtains in a Court of Law. Stating it broadly and without intending it to be exhaustive, it may be observed that rules of natural justice require that a party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies, that the evidence of the opponent should be taken in his presence, and that he should be given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined by that party, and that no materials should be relied on against him without his being given an opportunity of explaining them. If these rules are satisfied, the enquiry is not open to attack on the ground that the procedure laid down in the Evidence Act for taking evidence was not strictly followed."

It is not in dispute that charges had been framed against the petitioner and were communicated to him along with the allegations on which the charges were framed. He had been given an opportunity of filing a written statement in reply to the charges framed. Documents asked for by him were made available to him. A lawyer was allowed by the Enquiry Officer. The witnesses examined against him were examined in his presence. He had an opportunity of cross-examining them. The petitioner was also given an opportunity to lead evidence and in fact he has examined one witness whom he wanted to examine. The petitioner was also allowed to make an oral statement before the Enquiry Officer in his defence in addition to the written statement filed by him. It is after that that the Enquiry Officer had submitted his report to the Governor through the High Court in which he held that the charge of corruption relating to demand and acceptance of ghee as a consideration from Chimote was established against him, though other two charges were not established against him. It is after consideration of this report, that the petitioner was given a show cause notice why the proposed penalty of dismissal should not be imposed on him. Cause shown by the petitioner in response to the show cause notice was also considered by the Governor. The only grievance of the petitioner is that the observations of the High Court on the report of the Enquiry Officer as well as on the cause shown by the petitioner were not communicated to him. The question, therefore, that arises is whether the observations made by the High Court was a material relating to which the petitioner was entitled to an opportunity of offering his explanation in respect of these observations. Mr. Kotwal first contends that the material which is required to be shown and explained by the delinquent is only the material that is taken into consideration at the time of the departmental enquiry. Duty to act in a quasi judicial manner is imposed on the authority that holds a departmental enquiry. After the departmental enquiry is concluded and the Governor is dealing with the report of the Enquiry Officer after the report is submitted, the act of imposing penalty is purely an administrative act. The material which the Governor takes into consideration in the discharge of that administrative act, it is not necessary for him to disclose it to the delinquent. In short, the argument of Mr. Kotwal is, after the departmental enquiry concludes, the duty on the disciplinary authority to act quasi judicially ceases and thereafter he acts only in administrative capacity and not in quasi judicial capacity. Mr. Kotwal has in this connection referred to us to a number of decisions: *Board of Education v. Rice*¹⁴; *Local Government Board v. Arlidge*¹⁵; *Denby [William] & Sons Ltd. v. Minister of Health*¹⁶; *Robinson v. Min. Town Planning*¹⁷; *Johnson & Co. v. Minister of Health*¹⁸.

Mr. Kotwal in the alternative contends that in consulting the High Court about its observations, the Governor has only complied with the constitutional requirement of art. 233 which requires the Governor to consult the High Court. Consultation with the High Court constituted part of deliberation on the report of the Enquiry Officer and on the cause shown by the petitioner. In these circumstances, it cannot be a material relating to which the petitioner is entitled to have an opportunity of explaining. And lastly, Mr. Kotwal contends that, at any rate, the observations of the High Court is a privileged document which cannot be disclosed in the interest of public policy. He has in this connection referred to the following decisions: *State of U. P. v. Manbodhan Lal*¹⁹; *Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co.*²⁰; *State of Punjab v. S. S. Singh*²¹; *Har Prasad Gupta v. State of U. P.*²² Mr. Phadke, on the other hand, contends that the enquiry is quasi judicial in nature right from the stage of enquiry to the stage of imposition of penalty. Imposition of penalty by the Governor is not an administrative act but it is a quasi judicial act and the Governor must act in a judicial manner. In not disclosing the observations of the High Court to the petitioner and giving him an opportunity to explain them, the Governor has acted contrary to the principles of natural justice. The petitioner had made no grievance on the ground that the observations of the Public Service Commission were not shown to him because the constitutional requirements required the Governor to consult the Public Service Commission. There was, however, no obligation on the Governor to consult the High Court. The Governor, therefore, had to supply these observations to the petitioner. Mr. Phadke conceded that if we come to the conclusion that the constitutional requirement is that the Governor must consult the High Court in imposing penalty of dismissal or removal from service of a civil servant, then the petitioner is not entitled to complain that principles of natural justice had been violated on account of non-disclosure of the observations of the High Court. Lastly, Mr. Phadke argued that there was no privilege in respect of these observations of the High Court, in the event, the Constitution did not require that the High Court should be consulted. It is his argument that the observations of the High Court must necessarily have influenced the mind of the Governor in coming to the conclusion whether the guilt is established or not and whether penalty of dismissal should be imposed or not. The observations of the High Court are in the nature of reasons supplied to the Governor for coming to the conclusion in these matters. There can hardly be any privilege in this respect.

We have already held that in our opinion the power conferred on the Governor by art. 233 read with art. 310 and s. 16 of the General Clauses Act to dismiss or suspend a civil servant has to be exercised in the same manner as the power of appointment under art. 233 is to be exercised, that is, in consultation with the High Court. In the circumstances, the observations form part of the consultation provided for in art. 233 of the Constitution. That being the position, and Mr. Phadke having conceded that if the constitutional requirement is that the High Court should be consulted, then the petitioner could make no grievance for non-disclosure of these observations to him. In the circumstances it is not necessary to deal in detail with the rival contentions raised by counsel for the parties. We would, however, deal with these contentions in brief though not in detail. We have already referred to the decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Bachhattar Singh v. State of Punjab in which it has been held that both stages of a departmental enquiry, that is, the enquiry which involves a decision of the question whether the allegations made against a public servant are proved or not and the decision of the question of the action to be taken against him on reaching the conclusion that the allegations have been established are both judicial in nature. This being the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Supreme Court, we find it difficult to accept Mr. Kotwal's contention that after the report of the Enquiry Officer is submitted to the Governor the action taken by the Governor is purely administrative in nature not requiring him to act according to the principles of natural justice. It may be that the act of imposing penalty is an administrative act but nonetheless in view of the aforesaid decision of their Lordships there is a duty cast on the Governor to act according to the principles of natural justice in performance of that duty. He has to act in a quasi judicial manner.

In the English decisions to which reference was made the question considered was whether the report received by the Minister of the Government in respect of acquisition of certain lands by local bodies for purposes of development should be made known to the persons whose lands were being acquired. In those cases, the report had not been shown to the persons whose lands were acquired but was taken into consideration by the Minister in deciding on appeal the question whether the decision taken by the local bodies for the acquisition of lands was proper or not. The decisions go to say that in dealing with an appeal against the decision of the local bodies for acquisition of lands, the Minister was performing an administrative function and it was not incumbent on the Minister to disclose the report. An analogy of these cases would have no application to the facts of the present case.

This brings us to the cases on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Phadke.

The question which was considered in *State of M. P. v. Chintaman*²³ was the grievance made that the document which the party required for purposes of cross-examining the witnesses of other side was not supplied to the public servant and, therefore, a reasonable opportunity was not afforded to him. It was held by their Lordships that the failure to supply that document hampered the party from cross-examining the witnesses of other side and had, therefore, resulted in the denial of a reasonable opportunity afforded in art. 311 of the Constitution.

In *State of Mysore v. Manche Gowda*²⁴ the disciplinary authority took into consideration the previous record of the Government servant and on the basis of that previous record it had proposed to impose certain penalty. The previous record was not shown to the Government servant. In the circumstances, it was held that the failure to supply the previous record, which had been taken into consideration for the purpose of imposing penalty, was against principles of natural justice and, therefore, had resulted in denial of a reasonable opportunity to the Government servant.

In Ramrao v. Accountant General instructions and directions of a higher official were taken into account by the disciplinary authority in determining the guilt of the Government servant without disclosing those instructions and directions to him. It was held that the order of dismissal passed was vitiated as the petitioner had no reasonable opportunity of knowing the instructions and directions which were taken into consideration by the disciplinary authority in passing the order of dismissal.

In Brajlal v. Union of India, in consideration of an application for review relating to grant of a mining licence, the Board of Revenue had considered the report of the State Government which they called for without disclosing the report to the person who was making a grievance against refusal to grant licence to him. In the circumstances, it was held that a reasonable opportunity was denied to him.

Remaining two English cases on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Phadke stand in a different class.

The facts in R. v. Architects' Registration Tribunal were that an engineer and surveyor had applied to the Architects' Registration Council to be registered as an architect and he gave names of two persons to whom a reference could be made. The admission committee refused to register him. The architect appealed to the Tribunal of Appeal. The Tribunal dismissed the appeal but in arriving at their decision the Tribunal took into account certain other documents which were not divulged to the architect. It was held that the Tribunal which was enjoined with a duty to act in a quasi judicial capacity acted improperly in accepting and considering the evidence additionally obtained without disclosing the same to the architect.

In R. v. Stafford Borough Justices after the conclusion of the hearing of a charge of larceny by the justices, the clerk to the justices handed a note to the chairman before the justices retired to consider their verdict. The note contained in substance an argument on the facts for the justices to convict the person charged. It was held that it was highly an improper act on the part of the clerk to hand over the note to the justices. The conviction was quashed on the ground that it has always been the principle of English law that justice should manifestly be seen to be done. Handing over of the note went against the principle.

Considering these decisions together, in our opinion, the principle that follows is that the authority which is enjoined with a duty to act in a quasi judicial manner must disclose to the person against whom action has been taken material which is in the nature of evidence on the acceptance or rejection of which turns the decision as to the guilt or innocence of the person against whom an enquiry is held or against whom an action is being taken. Evidence tendered to establish a case must not be received behind the back of the person inasmuch as that would result in denial of an opportunity to that person of rebutting that evidence. The observations of the High Court cannot be said to be a part of the evidence going to establish the guilt or innocence of the petitioner. On the contrary, in view of the constitutional requirements which require the Governor to consult the High Court, the observations form part of the deliberations in the matter of imposing penalty on the petitioner. Non-disclosure of these observations to the petitioner in our opinion, therefore, did not constitute any contravention of the principles of natural justice.

Lastly, we agree with the learned Government Pleader that the observations of the High Court would be a privileged document and, therefore, no complaint can be made of non-disclosure of that document.

In State of Punjab v. S. S. Singh a complaint was made against non-disclosure or supply of the remarks of the Public Service Commission by the civil servant. On behalf of the Government privilege was claimed and it was held by the Supreme Court that the report of the Public Service Commission was a privileged document to the disclosure of which a public servant was not entitled.

In Har Prasad Gupta v. State of U. P., a question arose whether the correspondence between the High Court and the Government relating to the confirmation of a judicial officer was a privileged communication. On behalf of the petitioner it was claimed that he was entitled to its disclosure. It was his case that the High Court had recommended his confirmation in the past but the Government wrongly did not confirm him. On behalf of the Government privilege was claimed and it was held that the correspondence was a privileged document.

The second contention raised by Mr. Phadke also for the reasons stated above must fail.

Taking all the facts and circumstances of the case, in our opinion, the petitioner had a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken against him. After considering the confidential report of Mr. Hadole, the High Court had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to hold a departmental enquiry against the petitioner, the allegations made against the petitioner being one of corruption. Recommendation was made to the Governor by the High Court to hold a departmental enquiry and appoint Mr. Seth, District and Sessions Judge, Nagpur, as the Enquiry Officer. The Government accepted the recommendations of the High Court and Mr. Seth was appointed an Enquiry Officer. It is not in dispute that Mr. Seth conducted the enquiry in good faith and with all fairness following fully the procedure which he had to follow under r. 55 of the rules. The petitioner was served with a charge-sheet along with the allegations on which the charges were founded. Whatever documents the petitioner wanted to have produced were produced. Witnesses were examined in his presence. He had an opportunity of cross-examining them. Throughout he was allowed assistance of a legal adviser. Witnesses which the petitioner wanted to be examined in his defence were examined. The petitioner wanted to make an oral statement in addition to the written statement filed by him and that was allowed, recorded and considered. After considering the entire evidence and the material before the Enquiry Officer, the Enquiry Officer held that the petitioner was guilty of corruption on one count. After consultation between the Governor and the High Court, a show cause notice was given to the petitioner asking him to show cause why penalty of dismissal should not be imposed on him. The petitioner showed cause that was considered by the Governor and the Governor in consultation with the High Court and the Public Service Commission had imposed the penalty. These being the circumstances of the case, in our opinion, there had been no infringement of the provisions of art. 311 of the Constitution. The only grievance made by the petitioner was that the observations of the High Court made on the report of Mr. Seth as well as on the reply of the petitioner to show cause notice were not disclosed to him. We have held that the objection raised is not tenable. The observations of the High Court was not a material which was in the nature of evidence establishing the guilt or otherwise of the petitioner. On the other hand, the observations were made in the discharge of the constitutional duty cast on the High Court. Apart from this, as we have said, the observations is a privileged document, to the disclosure of which the petitioner is not entitled to. If disclosure of documents of this type is permitted it may possibly result in affecting free and frank expression of opinion which is very essential in the interest of public policy.

And this brings us to the last contention raised on behalf of the petitioner. It is contended that the appellate order dated October 16, 1962 passed by the Government is vitiated by contravention of the principles of natural justice. Reference is made to rule 57 of the Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules.

Mr. Kotwal, on the other hand, contends that the petitioner had no right of appeal under r. 57. The original order of dismissal itself was passed by the Governor. That being the position, there could be no appeal to the Governor against his own order. In our opinion, the argument of Mr. Kotwal is well founded. Rule 57 reads as under:—

“A member of a provincial Service, or a member of a Specialist Service under the administrative control of the Local Government of a Governor's Province, may appeal to the Governor from an order passed by the Local Government.”

It is well settled that an appeal is a creature of a statute and unless a right of appeal is conferred by a statute it is not open to any person to claim that he has any right of appeal as such. Mr. Phadke has not been able to show us any provision except r. 57 which conferred a right of appeal on a member of a Provincial Service, to which the petitioner belonged. In order to bring his case within r. 57, the petitioner must establish two conditions; firstly, he must establish that he was a member of a Provincial Service which was under the administrative control of the Local Government of a Governor's Province, and secondly, he must establish that the order against which he seeks to file an appeal is the order made by the Local Government. Both these conditions, in our opinion, are not satisfied in the instant case. It has not been the case of the petitioner that he is under the administrative control of the Local Government of a Governor's Province. On the other hand, all the arguments advanced by Mr. Phadke on the first contention wholly militate against such a position. Nor is the Government claiming in the instant case such position. We have already said that art. 227 confers the right of superintendence on the High Court over all Courts and it was held by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Syad Ahmad Ishaque*²⁵ that superintendence is both administrative and judicial.

The first condition, therefore, is clearly not satisfied. The order against which an appeal is preferred also is not one made by the Local Government. The order of dismissal is document No. 9 filed along with the petition. The order in terms says that the Governor of Maharashtra is hereby pleased to dismiss Shri S. M. I. Alvi, Assistant Judge and Additional Sessions Judge (on leave) from Government service with effect from August 30, 1961. The order is also signed by the Secretary to the Government of Maharashtra, Law and Judiciary Department, by order and in the name of the Governor of Maharashtra. Clause (2) of art. 166 of the Constitution provides that orders and other instruments made and executed in the name of the Governor shall be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in rules to be made by the Governor, and the validity of an order or instrument which is so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor. The order of dismissal passed by the Governor had been authenticated by the Secretary to the Government of Maharashtra, Law and Judiciary Department. It has not been shown that the Secretary was not the person authorised to authenticate the order. In the circumstances it has to be accepted that the order has been properly authenticated. It, therefore, cannot be said that the order has not been made by the Governor. This being the position, in our opinion, r. 57 had no application to the facts of the present case. The petitioner, therefore, had no right of appeal against the order of dismissal.

We may state that the return filed by the respondent says that the memo of appeal was considered by the Council of Ministers as a memorial and the Council of Ministers was satisfied that there was no injustice done to the petitioner.

The third contention of Mr. Phadke must also fail.

These are all the contentions which have been raised before us by the petitioner. We may state that the contention raised in ground No. 5 was not pressed before us by Mr. Phadke and, in our opinion, rightly.

In the result, the petition fails and the rule is, therefore, discharged. We however make no order as to costs.

Rule discharged.

PRALHAD BAIDAS CHAUDHARI v. THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, ZILLA PARISHAD.*

Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act (Mah. V of 1962), Secs. 59(c), 66, 76—Bombay Village Panchayats Act (Bom. I of 1959), Sec. 32—Maharashtra Zilla Parishads (President & Vice-President) and Panchayat Samitis (Chairman) (Current Administrative Duties) (after the Expiry of the Term of Office) Rules, 1963. Rule 2—Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Sec. 19(2)—Whether Sarpanch carrying on current duties of his office after expiration of his term continues to be Sarpanch—Applicability of s. 66 of Mah. Act V of 1962—Chairman of Panchayat Samiti carrying on prescribed duties after expiration of his term whether entitled to convene meeting of Samiti.

For the purposes of proviso (c) to s. 59 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961, where after the expiry of his term of office a Sarpanch carries on the current duties of his office, he does not during this period continue to be a Sarpanch.

Section 66 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961, comes into play only when the term of office of a Chairman has come to an end by reason of the expiration of his term and not when the term of office of a Chairman comes to an end on account of any other reason.

The Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti who carries on the prescribed current administrative duties of his office after the expiration of his term is not entitled to convene a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Sharad Manohar, for the petitioner.

M. A. Rane, for opponents Nos. 1 and 2.

V. H. Gumaste, Additional Government Pleader, for opponent No. 3.

TAMBE J. The question that arises for consideration in this case is, whether the petitioner, who had been elected first as a member of the Panchayat Samiti of Shahada under s. 57(1)(f) of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961 (hereinafter referred to as the Act of 1961) and later on elected as the Chairman of the said Samiti on August 7, 1962, continues still to be a member of the said Samiti after December 1, 1963, and in the alternative, in spite of the fact that he has ceased to be a member of the said Samiti as and from that date, he is entitled to carry on as a Chairman the current administrative duties as are prescribed by the rules. To appreciate the contentions raised, it is necessary to state certain facts. In the year 1959 the petitioner was initially elected to be a member of the Group Grampanchayat of the village Kalsadi in Shahada block. Later in the same year, he also became the Sarpanch of the said Group Grampanchayat. Under the Act of 1961, the bodies constituted are Zilla Parishads and the Panchayat Samitis. Section 56 of the Act provides that for every Block, there shall be a Panchayat Samiti and the Panchayat Samiti shall have all such functions as are vested in it by the Act or otherwise. Sub-section (3) of s. 2 of the Act defines 'block' as such local area in a District as the State Government may constitute to be a Block under s. 5. Section 57 of the Act deals with the constitution of Panchayat Samitis and a reading of the section would show that the constitution consists of members taken from different bodies. It is not necessary to go into the details. But, it would be sufficient to say that under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 of the Act of 1961, all Councillors who are elected to the Zilla Parishad from the electoral divisions included in the Block automatically become members of the Panchayat Samiti. (Clause (f) of the said sub-section provides:

"Sarpanch elected by members of panchayats in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (2)".

Sub-section (2) provides:

"For the purposes of clause (f) of sub-section (1), each electoral division in a Block shall be divided into two electoral colleges of members of panchayats in such manner as may be determined by the State Government; and the members of panchayats in each electoral college shall elect from amongst the Sarpanchas of those panchayats, one Sarpanch in accordance with the rules prescribed by the State Government".

We have already stated that the petitioner initially got elected as a member of the Group Grampanchayat of the village Kalsadi and later on became its Sarpanch in 1959. Under the aforesaid cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 of the Act of 1961, the petitioner got elected as a member on the Panchayat Samiti of Shahada Block. Section 64(1) of the Act provides that every Panchayat Samiti shall be presided over by the Chairman, who shall be elected by the Panchayat Samiti from amongst members falling under cls. (a) and (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57. The petitioner being a member falling under cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 was eligible to be elected as the Chairman, and was duly elected as its Chairman on August 7, 1962. Now, it may be stated that the term of the members of the Village Panchayat is four years. The term of the Grampanchayat of village Kalsadi came to an end in November 1963 (though the exact date is not known). Section 32 of the Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1958 (hereinafter referred to as the Act of 1958) provides:

"After the expiry of his term of office, the Sarpanch shall continue to carry on the current duties of his office until such time as a new Sarpanch is elected and takes over charge."

Thus, though the term of the village panchayat of Kalsadi came to an end in November 1963, the petitioner continued to carry on the current duties of the Sarpanch of the village Kalsadi by reason of the provisions of s. 32 of the Act of 1958. In the reconstitution of the village panchayat of Kalsadi, the petitioner again got duly elected as its member and also got re-elected as its Sarpanch on December 1, 1963. On March 3, 1964, the Block Development Officer, Shahada, respondent No. 2 herein, who, under the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 57 of the Act of 1961, is the Secretary (ex-officio) of the Panchayat Samiti, Shahada, wrote a letter to the petitioner. It appears that prior to this letter, there was a discussion between the petitioner and the Block Development Officer relating to the petitioner's right to continue as the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti. In this respect, the Block Development Officer had written to the petitioner that on this subject he had along with his letter had enclosed a copy of the letter received by him from the Chief Executive Officer, Zilla Parishad, Dhulia, respondent No. 1 herein. It may be stated that Shahada Block is in the District Dhulia. In his letter dated February 29, 1964, the Chief Executive Officer has drawn the attention of the Block Development Officer, Shahada, to the Government letter dated November 3, 1962, read with s. 59(c) of the Act of 1961. A copy of that letter has not been enclosed as an annexure along with the petition. But the Additional Government Pleader for the State has supplied us with a copy. The letter indicates that the Government had taken the view that a member of a Panchayat Samiti who has been elected in his capacity as a Sarpanch holds office only so long as he continues to be a Sarpanch. Under s. 32 of the Act of 1958, after the expiry of his term of office as Sarpanch he does not continue to be a member of the Panchayat Samiti, even though he might be carrying on the current duties of his office. It may be stated that the said letter was issued prior to the amendment of s. 59(c) of the Act of 1961, and this view has not been pressed before us. It is sufficient to state that a dispute started between the Block Development Officer and the petitioner as to his right to continue as a member. On receiving the letter of the Block Development Officer dated March 3, 1964, the petitioner wrote a letter to the Block Development Officer on March 7, 1964, and pointed out that under s. 59(c) as amended a person falling under category in cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 holds office so long as he continues to be a Sarpanch or carries on the current duties of the office of the Sarpanch. The petitioner pointed out that he was carrying out at that time the duties of the office of the Sarpanch of Kalsadi, and, therefore, he continued to be the Sarpanch. The petitioner also pointed out to the Block Development Officer that s. 66 of the Act of 1961 is clear and it at any rate empowers him to carry on the current administrative duties of the Chairman of the Samiti until his successor relieves him. Further, a complaint is also made by the petitioner in this letter that the Chief Executive Officer's letter was not clear as to what action was proposed to be taken against him. The petitioner claimed therein that he was of the opinion that "there is no impediment in my way to hold the office of Chairman and continue to discharge the current administrative duties". On these grounds the petitioner in this letter directed the Block Development Officer to convene a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti on March 17, 1964, at 2 p.m. To this letter of the petitioner, the Block Development Officer sent a reply vide his letter dated March 10, 1964, stating that he has forwarded the petitioner's letter to the Chief Executive Officer and has sought further orders from him (Chief Executive Officer). Later the Block Development Officer by his letter dated March 13, 1964, sent to the petitioner a copy of the letter of the Chief Executive Officer dated March 12, 1964. The material part of the letter of the Chief Executive Officer complained of by the petitioner is in the following terms:

"...It is not correct that he (the petitioner) can remain as a member of the Panchayat Samiti because he is re-elected as Sarpanch of the same village. It is necessary for him to get elected on the Panchayat Samiti only after contesting the election through the electoral college. As he is not even liable to continue to be the member of the Panchayat Samiti, he is not definitely eligible to continue to be the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti..."

After receiving the aforesaid letter from the Block Development Officer, Shahada, on March 13, 1964, and its enclosure viz., Chief Executive Officer's letter dated March 12, 1964, the petitioner wrote a letter to the Block Development Officer on March 16, 1964, wherein the petitioner purporting to exercise his powers under s. 76 of the Act of 1961 directed the Block Development Officer to prepare agenda and notice convening the meeting of the Panchayat Samiti on March 26, 1964, at 2 p.m. It appears that along with this letter, the petitioner had annexed the agenda of the meeting proposed by him. The petitioner has further pointed out that any impediment put in his way by the Block Development Officer would be viewed very seriously by him. The Block Development Officer by his reply dated March 18, 1964, again pointed out to the petitioner that in view of the instructions received by him from the Chief Executive Officer under his letter of March 12, 1964, he was unable to convene the meeting of the Panchayat Samiti as required by the petitioner. It is in these circumstances that on March 23, 1964, this petition has been filed.

In this petition, the petitioner prays that the orders passed by the Chief Executive Officer on February 29, 1964, and March 12, 1964, be quashed; and that writ of mandamus be issued against the Chief Executive Officer, the Block Development Officer and the State Government, respondents Nos. 1 to 3, respectively, requiring them not to interfere with the petitioner's right to be the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti, Shahada, until August 7, 1967, or in the alternative till a new Chairman is duly elected. Other reliefs prayed for have not been pressed before us. The State Government (respondent No. 3) has not filed any return in reply to the petition. It is only respondents Nos. 1 and 2, i.e. the Chief Executive Officer and the Block Development Officer, who have entered an affidavit in return in reply to the petitioner. Now, in the affidavit the stand taken by these respondents is that the petitioner has ceased to be a member of the Panchayat Samiti with effect from December 1, 1963, and, therefore, he could no longer function as the Chairman of the Samiti after that date. It has been further contended by these respondents that this casual vacancy is to be filled in by fresh election as provided in s. 75(1) of the Act of 1961 and pending the election of the Chairman, the Deputy Chairman is to exercise the powers and perform the duties of the Chairman as provided in s. 77(1)(c) of the said Act. Respondents Nos. 1 and 2 further contended that s. 66 of the Act has no application to the facts of the present case. According to these respondents, s. 66 comes into play only in the event of the Samiti's term expiring. It has also been contended that the petitioner is not entitled to direct the Block Development Officer to call a meeting because that is not vested in him even if it is assumed that the petitioner has been on the current administrative duties under s. 66 of the Act.

Mr. Sharad Manohar, for the petitioner, raised two contentions before us. His first contention is that on a true construction of cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the Act of 1961 the petitioner's term of office as a member of the Panchayat Samiti has not come to an end and, consequently, the petitioner's term of office as the Chairman of the Samiti also has not come to an end. In the alternative, the second contention urged by Mr. Sharad Manohar is that, even assuming that the petitioner's term of office as the Chairman has come to an end, the petitioner has a right by virtue of the provisions of s. 66 of the Act, to carry on current administrative duties of his office of the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti until his successor enters upon the office and his successor not having been elected, he had every right to ask the Block Development Officer to call the meeting. In order to appreciate the argument on the first contention, it is necessary to read the relevant provisions of s. 59 of the Act of 1961. It runs thus:

"The term of office of members of a Panchayat Samiti shall be co-extensive with the term of office of the Councillors:

Provided that, a member of a Panchayat Samiti—

(a) and (b) ...

(c) referred to in clause (f) of sub-section (1) of section 57 shall hold office only so long as he continues to be a Sarpanch or carries on the current duties of the office as Sarpanch".

The first part of the section refers generally to the term of office of members and provides that the term of office of members shall be co-extensive with the term of office of the Councillors. Sub-section (9) of s. 2 of the Act of 1961 defines 'Councillor' to mean a member of a Zilla Parishad constituted under the Act of 1961. Sub-section (2) of s. 10 of the said Act provides:

"The term of office of Councillors shall, except as otherwise provided in this Act, be five years:

Provided that, persons who are Councillors by virtue of their being Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti or of a co-operative society, shall hold office so long as they continue to hold the office of such Chairman".

It would thus be seen that the normal term of office as provided in the main part of s. 59 of the Act of 1961 is five years. However, there are exceptions provided in the clauses to the proviso to the said section to this normal term of office of members, in case of some members falling under different categories.

We have already stated that the petitioner has been elected as a member of the Panchayat Samiti under cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57. His term of office, therefore, is governed by cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the said Act. The question, therefore, that arises for consideration is the construction of cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the said Act. Now, under this clause, a person who is elected under cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 of the Act is entitled to hold office of a member of a Panchayat Samiti (a) so long as he continues to be a Sarpanch, or (b) carries on the current duties of the office as Sarpanch. The argument of Mr. Sharad Manohar is that it may be that from November 1963 to December 1, 1963, the petitioner was merely carrying on the current duties of the office as Sarpanch of the Village Panchayat of Kalsadi, but on December 1, 1963, he got re-elected as a Sarpanch of the said Village Panchayat. Therefore, the petitioner continues to be a Sarpanch within the meaning of cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the Act of 1961.

It is not possible to accept this argument in view of the clear language of cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the Act. That clause itself makes a distinction between the status of a person when he "continues to be a Sarpanch" and when he "carries on the current duties of the office as Sarpanch". Obviously, the first part of the clause "continues to be a Sarpanch" has reference to that office of Sarpanchship which entitles him to get elected to the Samiti under cl. (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 of the Act. This clause has, therefore, to be read together with the provisions of s. 32 of the Act of 1958 under which village panchayats are constituted. That section provides:

"After the expiry of his term of office, the Sarpanch shall continue to carry on the current duties of his office until such time as a new Sarpanch is elected and takes over charge."

During the period the Sarpanch carries on the current duties of his office, he does not continue to be Sarpanch as such. During that period, he would be an ex-Sarpanch, but, by reason of the provisions of s. 32 of the Act of 1958, he merely carries on the current duties of his office. The petitioner thus has ceased to be a Sarpanch in November 1963 when his term of office as Sarpanch had expired. From that time till December 1, 1963, he did not continue to be a Sarpanch but was an ex-Sarpanch carrying on the current duties of his office by reason of the provisions of s. 32 of the Act of 1958. There was thus a break from November 1963 to December 1, 1963, in the tenure of the petitioner as a Sarpanch. The continuity was broken. Therefore, his being re-elected on December 1, 1963 as Sarpanch would not have the effect of "his continuing to be a Sarpanch" within the meaning of cl. (c) of the proviso to s. 59 of the Act of 1961. It is not in dispute that as and from December 1, 1963, he ceased to carry on the duties of a Sarpanch. In our opinion, therefore, the petitioner has ceased to be a member of the Panchayat Samiti on December 1, 1963.

It is not in dispute that on cessation of the term of the petitioner's office as a member of the Panchayat Samiti, his term of office as the Chairman of the said Samiti also expires. The question that next arises is whether the petitioner is entitled to carry on "such current administrative duties of his office as may be prescribed by rules made by the State Government, until his successor enters upon his office." Mr. Sharad Manohar argued that by reason of the provisions of s. 66 of the Act of 1961, the petitioner is entitled to carry on such current administrative duties until his successor enters upon his office. The petitioner's successor has not been as yet elected. The respondents are, therefore, in error in saying that the petitioner is not entitled to carry on such current administrative duties. Mr. Gumaste, the learned Additional Government Pleader for the State, respondent No. 3, as well as Mr. Rane, for respondents Nos. 1 and 2, on the other hand, contend that the petitioner is not entitled to carry on the current administrative duties. It is their argument that s. 66 of the Act of 1961 has application only when the term of the entire village Panchayat Samiti as such expires. According to them, the term of the Pancha-yat Samiti expires on August 7, 1967, and it is only at that time that s. 66 would come into play and that really was the intention of the Legislature in enacting s. 66. In our opinion, in view of the clear language of s. 66, it is not open to us to speculate about the legislative intent. There is no ambiguity in the language in which s. 66 is couched. It is a fundamental rule of construction that it is the duty of the Court to give effect to the clear and unambiguous language used by the Legislature and give effect to the legislative intent as clearly expressed by it in the statute enacted by it. Section 66 of the Act of 1961 in terms provides "notwithstanding the expiration of his term" the Chairman shall continue to carry on such current administrative duties. That section does not say "notwithstanding the expiration of the term of the Panchayat Samiti". To accept the contention of Messrs. Gumaste and Rane, we would be required to read in this section the clause "notwithstanding the expiration of the term of Panchayat Samiti" in place of the existing clause "notwithstanding the expiration of his term." That would amount to rewriting the statute and that course is not open to us. Further, reference to other statutes relating to local bodies, discloses that when the Legislature has intended to allow a Chairman of the local body to continue to carry on current administrative duties in the event of expiration of the term of the body as such, it has in express terms said so. For instance, we may refer to the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and reading s. 19 thereof, it becomes clear that a distinction is made between the expiry of the term of office of a president or vice-president as contradistinguished from the expiration of the term of the municipality. Sub-section (2) of s. 19 of that Act provides:

"On the expiry of the term of office of a municipality the president and vice-president shall continue to carry on the current administrative duties of their offices until such time as a new president and vice-president shall have been elected and shall have taken over the charge of their duties."

Such, however, is not the position in this case. The Legislature in express terms conferred a power on the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti to carry on such current administrative duties until his successor enters upon his office, notwithstanding the expiration of his term. A reference to s. 64 of the Act of 1961 would show that a person who is eligible to be elected as a Chairman shall be from amongst members falling under cls. (a) and (f) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 of the said Act. The members falling under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 57 are Councillors directly elected to the Zilla Parishad by their respective constituencies and their term of office in accordance with the provisions of the Act is five years, while members falling under cl. (f) are Sarpanchas of the village panchayat elected under the provisions of the Act of 1958 and their term of office is only four years. The Legislature was thus aware that there were likely to be cases where the term of office of a Chairman would expire prior to the expiry of the term of the Samiti. In spite of this, in s. 66 of the Act of 1961 it has been provided that the Chairman shall notwithstanding the expiration of his term would continue to carry on such current administrative duties. Having regard to the clear language used in s. 66 and having regard to the other provisions to which we have made reference, in our opinion, the petitioner would be entitled to carry on such current administrative duties of his office as may be prescribed by rules made by the State Government until his successor enters upon his office.

It would be noticed that the Chief Executive Officer in his letter has taken the view that s. 66 of the Act of 1961 has no application because in his opinion the Deputy Chairman would be his successor by virtue of the provisions of s. 77 of the Act. The same stand has been reiterated in the return filed by the Chief Executive Officer. Mr. Rane, and in our opinion quite rightly, has not supported this stand before us. It was also suggested in the course of the arguments that the interpretation put by us would bring about startling results enabling a Chairman, who has been removed on account of a disqualification, to carry on the current administrative duties. In our opinion, the suggestion made in the course of the arguments has not been well-made. The term of office of a Chairman may come to an end on account of various reasons, for instance, death, resignation on incurring of a disqualification, removal for misconduct, expiry of the term of his office etc. Section 66 comes into play only when the term of office of a Chairman has come to an end by reason of the expiration of his term and not when the term of office of a Chairman comes to an end on account of any other reason. The apprehension expressed during the course of the argument is, therefore, without foundation. In our judgment, therefore, the petitioner, though his term of office as a Chairman has expired, is entitled to carry on the current administrative duties as are prescribed by the rules made by the State Government, until his successor enters upon his office, that is, until a new Chairman is elected.

The question which next arises is whether the petitioner was entitled to direct the Block Development Officer, Shahada, to convene a meeting on March 26, 1964, at 2 p.m. and whether the Block Development Officer was in error in not giving effect to the direction given to him by the petitioner. Now, we have held that the petitioner is entitled to carry on the current administrative duties as are prescribed. The powers and functions of Chairman of Panchayat Samiti are enacted in s. 76 of the Act of 1961. Sub-section (1) of that section enumerates the duties which are obligatory and sub-s. (2) enumerates the powers and functions which he may undertake in his discretion. Sub-section (1) consists of cls. (a) to (d) and cl. (a) provides:

"The Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti shall—

(a) convene, preside at and conduct meetings of the Panchayat Samitis;"

It has to be seen whether this power which the Chairman has under cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 76 still remains with him as part of the current administrative duties, and that brings us to the rules prescribed by the State Government under s. 274 of the Act. In exercise of the powers conferred upon it, the State Government has framed rules called the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads (President and Vice President) and Panchayat Samitis (Chairman) (Current Administrative Duties) (after the Expiry of the Term of Office) Rules, 1963. These Rules were framed in the year 1963 and it is not in dispute that these rules were at material time in operation. Rule 2 provides:

"Notwithstanding the expiration of his term every President, Vice President or Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti, shall continue to carry on until his successor enters upon his office, the current administrative duties specified in columns 1 and 2 of the Table hereto."

When we turn to the Table, we find that the only powers and functions that are retained with the Chairman on the expiry of the term of his office are those contained in cls. (b) and (c) of sub-s. (1) of s. 76 and cls. (a) and (b) of sub-s. (2) of the said section. It is clear that the power to convene a meeting does not fall within the prescribed current administrative duties. The petitioner, therefore, had no right to direct the Block Development Officer to convene a meeting. The Block Development Officer was, therefore, not in error in not giving effect to that direction.

In the result, the petition is partly allowed. The respondents are directed not to interfere with the petitioner's right to carry on the current administrative duties as are prescribed until his successor enters upon his office. The other reliefs sought by the petitioner are hereby rejected. In the circumstances of the case, we make no order as to costs.

Petition partly allowed.

Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (Mah. XXIV of 1961), Secs. 2(13), 75—Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961. Rule 22—Board of directors of society, election of—Whether board of directors to be elected at general meeting of society—Applicability of r. 22 to election of directors.

There is no express provision in the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, that the board of directors be elected by a society at its general meeting. In each case it will have to be seen whether by reason of the bye-law made by the society, right to elect directors is given to the general meeting or not. If the bye-laws give a right to the general meeting to elect its directors, rule 22 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961, would govern the election of the board of directors. If, on the other hand, the bye-law does not give a right to the general meeting to elect its board of directors, but otherwise provides for the election of the directors, then rule 22 of the Rules will have no application to the election of directors.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. H. Gumaste, Additional Government Pleader, for opponent No. 7.

TAMBE J. By this petition under art. 227 of the Constitution of India, the petitioner seeks to get quashed the order made by the Maharashtra State Co-operative Tribunal, respondent No. 6 hereto, on April 22, 1964, setting aside the election of petitioner to the Board of Directors of the Jalgaon District Central Co-operative Bank Ltd., respondent No. 2 hereto.

Facts in brief are: respondent No. 2 is a Federal Co-operative Society. Sub-section (13) of s. 2 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) defines a "federal society" thus: "federal society" means a society (a) not less than five members of which are themselves societies, and (b) in which the voting rights are so regulated that the members which are societies have not less than four-fifths of the total number of votes in the general meeting of such society. It would thus be seen that the membership of the federal society consists of shareholders falling under two categories: (1) society and (2) individual shareholders. It would also be seen that sub-s. (13) of s. 2 requires that voting rights at the general meeting have to be so regulated that the members which are societies have not less than four-fifths of the total number of votes. In other words, the voting rights at the general meeting have to be so regulated that the individual shareholders have not more than 1/5th of the voting strength of the total number of votes. To achieve this object, the State Government, in exercise of its rule making power, have framed rule 22 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961. The said rule inter alia reads:

"22. In the case of federal societies, the voting rights of individual members [which term shall include firm, company or body corporate, society registered under Societies Registration Act, 1880, State Government, local authority, and public trust registered under any law for the time being in force relating to registration of public trusts but shall not include a society (society has been defined in sub-section (27) of section 2 of the Act as "a co-operative society registered, or deemed to be registered, under this Act;")] may be regulated as follows:—

(a) Immediately after the 30th June of every year and, as soon as possible before the annual general meeting, individual members (hereinafter referred to as "the relevant date"), shall elect delegates equal to one fourth of the number of societies admitted to membership up to the relevant date or one delegate for every twenty-five individual members (fractions being neglected) whichever is less. The delegates so elected will continue in office till their successors are elected after 30th June next.

(b) Every society through its properly authorised representative and every delegate referred to in clause (a) above shall have one vote in the general meeting."

The other sub-clauses of the rule are not material for the purposes of this case. Now, there was an election held on September 30, 1963, for electing a Director on the Board of Directors of respondent No. 2 from the Jalgaon, Erandole, Parola and Amalner constituency of individual shareholders. The petitioner and respondents Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5 were the rival candidates. At the election, votes were cast not by the delegates of the shareholders but by the individual shareholders themselves. The petitioner secured the highest number of votes, and he was declared as elected on the Board of Directors of respondent No. 2. Respondent No. 1 lodged a dispute before the Registrar, challenging the validity of the election of the petitioner. The contention raised by him was that the election was invalid inasmuch as it was in contravention of the provisions of the aforesaid rule 22. According to respondent No. 1, the individual shareholders were not competent to vote at the election, but, on the other hand, persons competent to vote for the election were the delegates elected by the individual shareholders and not the individual shareholders. The Registrar sent the dispute to his nominee for decision. The nominee dismissed the application of the respondent. Against that respondent No. 1 appealed to the Co-operative Tribunal. The tribunal has allowed the appeal, set aside the order of the nominee and set aside the election of the petitioner. Hence this petition.

Before us respondent No. 1 has not appeared to contest the petition. So also respondents Nos. 3, 4 and 5, who were the contesting candidates, have not appeared to defend the petition. Respondent No. 2 is represented by its counsel Mr. Jahagirdar. He has supported the petition. Mr. Gumaste, learned Additional Government Pleader appearing for respondent No. 7, State of Maharashtra, stated before us that respondent No. 3 would submit to the order of the Court. In short he has also not opposed the petition. There is no appearance on behalf of respondent No. 6, which is the Tribunal. We have, therefore, not the benefit of an argument in opposition to the contentions raised by the petitioner. We would, however, take the view taken by the Tribunal as the case of respondent No. 1, inasmuch as we have been informed that respondents Nos. 3 and 5 have remained ex parte throughout. The view expressed by the Tribunal is founded on the aforesaid provisions of rule 22 and bye-law No. 18 framed by respondent No. 2 society. It would be necessary to reproduce the material part of bye-law 18. Bye-law 18 falls under the heading "General Meeting", so also bye-law No. 24, to which we would advert later. Material part of bye-law No. 18 reads:

"18. The Supreme Authority of the Bank shall be vested in the General Meeting consisting of delegates from affiliated societies, and of all the delegates of members other than affiliated societies. The voting rights of the individual members (which term shall include any company or body corporate, society registered under Societies Registration Act, 1860, State Government, Local Authority, and Public Trust registered under any law for the time being in force relating to registration of public trusts but shall not include a society) shall be regulated as follows:—

(1) Immediately after 30th June of every year and as soon as possible before the Annual General Meeting individual members admitted to membership upto the 30th June of the preceding year hereinafter referred to as 'the relevant date', shall elect delegates equal to one fourth of the number of societies admitted to membership upto the relevant date or one delegate for every twenty-five individual members (fractions being neglected) whichever is less. The delegates so elected will continue in office till their successors are elected after 30th June next.

(2) Every society through its properly authorised representative and every delegate referred to in serial No. 1 above shall have one vote in the General Meeting."

It may be stated that the closing date of the year is 30th June. Rule 5 provides that the “lists in the case of Individual Shareholders, shall contain the name and father's name of every person entitled to be registered as a voter with such other particulars as may be necessary to identify him.”

Rule 7 relates to the correction of voters' lists. Rule 8 provides that

“a final copy of voters of each constituency will be available to members only on payment of Re. 1/- each.”

Rule 9 provides that

“there shall be prepared lists of voters for the following constituencies as mentioned in Bye-law No. 24(1) of the Bank.”

Bye-law 24(1) creates as many as 5 constituencies relating to the election of the Directors, and one of the constituencies is individual shareholders. Now, this principal constituency of individual shareholders is sub-divided by rule 9 into three sub-constituencies as mentioned therein. It may be stated that the talukas of the District of Jalgaon have been distributed in the three constituencies. One of them is Jalgaon, Erandol, Parola and Amalner. Rules 18 to 29 relate to the procedure of recording votes, and rule 27 provides that the voter shall place the voting paper in the ballot box kept for the purpose. These are all the relevant rules which need be noticed for the purpose of this petition. It may also be stated at this stage that the validity of these rules has not been challenged before us and was not challenged before the Tribunal.

Now, the position emerging on the consideration of these rules is clear. For the purpose of electing a Director, it is the individual share-holder who gets a right to vote. It is his name that is entered in the list of voters. Each voter has been given a single vote at the election of the Directors. That being the position it is clear that the person who has a right to vote at the election of the directors is the individual share-holder and not his delegate. Bye-law 20 provides that the election of the directors has to be held according to the rules framed by the Board of Directors and approved by the Registrar. It is not in dispute that these rules have been approved by the Registrar. That being the position, in view of bye-law 20 and the rules is that though at the time of the annual general meeting with the afore-said rules framed by the Board of Directors and approved by the Registrar.

Before Mr. Justice Patel and Mr. Justice Tulzapurkar.

THE BOMBAY MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.^o

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bom. III of 1888), Secs. 154, 195E—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Secs. 7, 5(10), 10-10AAA—Whether rateable value of property limited by Rent Act—Permitted increases under Rent Act whether can be added to rental for purposes of rateable value—Whether education cess can be added to rent for arriving at annual letting value.

Under s. 154 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, the annual letting value of property is only the standard rent provided by the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, and which alone the landlord can recover from his tenants. Permitted increases do not form part of the rent and therefore these cannot be allowed to be added to the rental for the purposes of rateable value.

An education cess imposed on property as an additional tax by the Municipal Corporation under s. 195E of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, cannot be added to the rent for the purposes of arriving at the annual letting value of the property.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

C. J. Shah, with A. M. Desai, for the respondents.

PATEL J. This appeal is brought by the Life Insurance Corporation of India who will be referred to as the Corporation against the judgment of the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, in a valuation matter under the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act of 1888. Before the learned Judge there were several appellants and the questions that arose were common. The Corporation owns the 'Indian Globe Chambers' at the junction of Hornby Road and Mangesh Shenoy Street. It is a landlord and has many tenants of the Corporation. The rateable value for the property is fixed by the Municipal Corporation. It is an additional tax known as education cess. The annual letting value of the property is fixed by the Corporation of be added to the actual rental for the purpose. He, therefore, made orders accordingly. The Corporation challenges the decision of the learned Judge.

The answer to the question raised depends upon the construction of the relevant provisions of the City of Bombay Municipal Act read in the context of the Bombay Rent Act. Section 154 of the Act does not independently define what is rateable value of a property but it contains a clear provision that it is the amount of annual rent for which the land or building may be reasonably expected to let from year to year less ten per cent. of the said rent. It has been consistently held that under this section the rateable value is the amount of rent that a hypothetical tenant may reasonably pay for the premises if they are let from year to year, both the landlord and the tenant being willing to let and to take the building. It has also been held that the annual letting value may not always be equivalent to the actual rent which is recovered by the landlord. It may be that in some cases the actual rent may be more than the annual letting value and in some cases it may be less, depending upon several circumstances. If there had been no Rent Act, which in effect staggered the rents, there could be no question as to how the Corporation would have valued the property in question. The difficulty has arisen because of the Rent Act which prevails in this State.

Under the scheme of the Rent Act, no landlord is entitled to charge under s. 7 anything in excess of the standard rent. The section expressly provides that it would not be lawful for a landlord to claim or receive on account of rent of any premises any excess above the standard rent, barring a few exceptions, which are not relevant for the present purpose. Section 18 of the Act makes it penal for any landlord to recover any amount in contravention of the provisions of s. 7. Section 5(10) defines what standard rent is and in this connection it must be noticed that it does not include anything by way of a permitted increase under the provisions of s. 10 to s. 10AA of the Act. The incidence of the municipal taxes under the City of Bombay Municipal Corporation Act falls in this State on the owner. After the Rent Act came into force it was realised, when the prices showed upward trend, the injustice in preventing the landlord from recovering normal rents and at the same time requiring the landlord to meet the taxation on the property and in order to mitigate the hardships created by reason of the necessities of the times some relief was afforded to the landlord by which the landlords were, in certain stated cases permitted to recover extra taxes which they were required to pay to the Corporation from their tenants. It is indeed true that ss. 10A, 10AA and 10AAA, when they speak of the increase, speak of it as increase in rent but the sections also make it clear that it shall not be deemed to be increase in rent under s. 7. It is clear, therefore, from the provisions of these related sections that what is allowed to the landlord in addition to the standard rent is not some sort of increase in the rent at all but it merely provides in a specified way the transfer of the burden of some portion of the tax to the tenants because of the rigours of the Rent Act.

The first question is whether the rateable value is limited by the provisions of the Rent Act and if it is so limited whether in any case the burden which is transferred to the tenant can be counted as additional rent which the landlord recovers from the tenant for the purposes of the municipal taxes.

Mr. Gumaste has referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Corporation of Calcutta v. Sm. Padma Debi where the provision of s. 127(a) of the Calcutta Municipal Act was interpreted by the Supreme Court. The rent of the premises in question was fixed by the Rent Controller at Rs. 550 per month with effect from April 1951 and at Rs. 632-8-0 per month with effect from August 1951. The Municipal Corporation fixed the rateable value at Rs. 1,450 per month. This valuation was challenged. It was contended on bebe added to the actual rental for the purpose. He, therefore, made orders accordingly. The Corporation challenges the decision of the learned Judge.

Section 5(10) defines what standard rent is and in this connection it must be noticed that it does not include anything by way of a permitted increase under the provisions of s. 10 to s. 10AA of the Act. The incidence of the municipal taxes under the City of Bombay Municipal Corporation Act falls in this State on the owner. After the Rent Act came into force it was realised, when the prices showed upward trend, the injustice in preventing the landlord from recovering normal rents and at the same time requiring the landlord to meet the taxation on the property and in order to mitigate the hardships created by reason of the necessities of the times some relief was afforded to the landlord by which the landlords were, in certain stated cases permitted to recover extra taxes which they were required to pay to the Corporation from their tenants. It is indeed true that ss. 10A, 10AA and 10AAA, when they speak of the increase, speak of it as increase in rent but the sections also make it clear that it shall not be deemed to be increase in rent under s. 7. It is clear, therefore, from the provisions of these related sections that what is allowed to the landlord in addition to the standard rent is not some sort of increase in the rent at all but it merely provides in a specified way the transfer of the burden of some portion of the tax to the tenants because of the rigours of the Rent Act.

The first question is whether the rateable value is limited by the provisions of the Rent Act and if it is so limited whether in any case the burden which is transferred to the tenant can be counted as additional rent which the landlord recovers from the tenant for the purposes of the municipal taxes.

Mr. Gumaste has referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of *Corporation of Calcutta v. Sm. Padma Debi*¹ where the provision of s. 127(a) of the Calcutta Municipal Act was interpreted by the Supreme Court. The rent of the premises in question was fixed by the Rent Controller at Rs. 550 per month with effect from April 1951 and at Rs. 632-8-0 per month with effect from August 1951. The Municipal Corporation fixed the rateable value at Rs. 1,450 per month. This valuation was challenged. It was contended on behalf of the Corporation that the rateable value under the Municipal Act had no relation to the standard rent earned by a landlord and in support of this argument it relied upon the decision of the House of Lords in Poplar Assessment Committee v. Roberts.² Their Lordships pointed out the distinction which obtained between the English law and the Indian law—the distinction between the incidence of taxation in the two cases. It has been pointed out that in England the tax falls on the tenants while in India the tax falls on the landlord. In view of this, their Lordships said that where the rents that a landlord can earn are circumscribed by Rent Act, the rateable value will be limited by the rent earned by the landlord. In other words, the rateable value can only be the rent obtainable under the Rent Act. An argument was raised before their Lordships on behalf of the Corporation that any additional burden could be passed on to the tenant by the landlord and, therefore, the landlord would not suffer any prejudice whatsoever. Their Lordships observed that the acceptance of that reasoning—

"would land us in a vicious circle and would enable one to circumvent the provisions of the Rent Control Act, for though a tenant is not liable under an Act to pay a rent higher than the standard rent, by this process he would be compelled to pay a higher rent." (p. 155).

They observed (p. 155) :

"...On the other hand, the scope of that section can legitimately be confined to situations giving rise to increase of taxes such as the increase in the rate, etc."

Mr. Shah contends that though it is true that the landlord cannot earn anything more than the standard rent inasmuch as under the provisions of the Rent Act, the burden could be passed on to the tenant when the Municipal Act imposes burden on the landlord, there can be no reason why once the landlord makes the increase by reason of the taxation, it should not also be regarded as a part of the rent which the tenant pays to the landlord and thus be regarded as increasing the rateable value of the property in question. We would repeat that this must land us again into a cycle of increments every year from figure to figure never intended by the framers either of the Rent Act or of the Municipal Act. This may be illustrated thus: Take for example a building, the rateable value of which is a lac of rupees—at least in Bombay there may be some buildings, which do have this annual letting value. The educational cess would be Rs. 1,500 in respect of this building. Next year, the rateable value, according to the contention of the Municipal Corporation, would be more by Rs. 1,500. If incidence of the educational cess is increased from one and half per cent. to five per cent., the rateable value would increase by Rs. 6,000 and not by Rs. 1,500. All the taxes payable by the landlord would increase in proportion, including the educational cess. A year thereafter, all this further addition would be added on to the rent and treated as annual letting value. One does not know where the limit would be reached. It seems to us, therefore, that from a practical aspect, if such a result could be avoided, it ought to be. It is argued by Mr. Shah that ultimately it is the reasonable rent which a hypothetical tenant would pay to the landlord that has to be determined by the Court. Any tenant would be prepared to pay this amount in addition to the standard rent on a reasonable view of the matter and, therefore, this should be considered to be a proper addition to the rent for determining the rateable value of the building. But then, looking to the hardship of accommodation to-day, a tenant would not only be prepared to pay this addition but a far greater addition and it was in order to prevent such payments that the Rent Act was enacted. The framers are also careful in providing that the increase by the landlord made by reason of the additional tax burden in the rent would not be regarded as an increase in the standard rent and such increase is not also included in the definition of the standard rent. It is obvious, therefore, that the standard rent is not affected by any increases allowed under the Rent Act by reason of the additional taxation and if, therefore, the rent or the standard rent which the landlord can recover is limited by the Rent Act under the authority of the decision cited above, we do not see how any further amount can be added to the actual rental and be called the rent of the building which the landlord recovers.

It is undoubtedly true, as has been pointed out, that no limit is set either way to the determination of the rateable value under s. 154 of the Municipal Act. We do not see why it should not be held that the Rent Act does set a limit to the rateable value assessable under s. 154. If the landlord cannot recover anything more than the standard rent, then that is a limitation which acts on s. 154 and if that is so, the amount of the increases permitted by the Rent Act because of the increase in taxation cannot be allowed to be added to the rental for the purpose of rateable value.

The learned Judge has observed:

"So far as the word 'rent' goes in the City of Bombay, it is undisputed that the landlords recover from their tenants such amount as includes all the taxes on the property which are recovered by the Bombay Municipality from the landlord in respect of their properties. If so I cannot understand why this amount which is recovered from the tenants in lieu of the property taxes payable by the landlords as education cess cannot be included as part of the rent."

The landlords recover rents and the tenants pay rents which depend upon the rule of demand and supply. If a property which remained idle for a long time is being occupied by a tenant, the landlord does not consider whether he pays 'X' tax or 'Y' tax. He is more anxious to let the property to a tenant. If, on the other hand, the tenant is a needy tenant, the landlord does not charge less rent merely because he pays a particular amount of tax. The learned Judge is also in error when he says that the education cess is a part of the property tax of that it is in lieu of the property tax. Section 195E, under which the educational cess is levied, does not justify this inference. The educational cess is in addition to the general tax, which the Corporation recovers and s. 195E provides that it may be recovered as an addition to the general tax. In fact it is recovered merely as an educational cess separately. The learned Judge has observed:

"All these years in the total annual rent which is calculated by the Bombay Municipality under Sec. 154 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, these factors are taken into account and it is the total amount which the tenants pay to the landlord by way of consideration for the occupation of the tenements that is considered as rent which can be expected by a landlord of the property from a hypothetical tenant. There is no estoppel, and practice does not necessarily make law. Whether or not the same considerations would apply to the general tax, a part of which is being probably recovered from tenants as permitted increase for determining the rateable value, does not fall to be considered just now, inasmuch as we are concerned only with the educational cess."

The learned Judge, in this, followed the decision of Mr. Justice Datar in *Municipal Comr. v. Manecklal*³ where the learned Judge has held that the deduction of ten per cent. in the annual letting value allowed under s. 154 was intended to be for all purposes and no further deduction could be made from the annual letting value. Against this decision, there was a Letters Patent Appeal being Maneklal v. Municipal Comr.,⁴ where we differed from the learned Judge and held not that any further deductions could be made out of the annual letting value in addition to ten per cent., but that the annual letting value itself, was the gross amount recovered by the landlord minus a reasonable return to him for his investment in providing additional amenities to the tenant. Out of the amount determined, ten per cent. deduction has to be made for other outgoings as provided by the Act. In our view, really speaking, the ratio of the decision of the learned Judge cannot apply to the question that falls to be decided in the present case. There is no question of making any deduction whatsoever and the only question with which we are concerned is, what is the annual letting value of the property which, in view of what we have said above, is only the standard rent provided by the Rent Act and which alone the landlord can recover from his tenant. Permitted increases do not become part of the rent and as such not the annual letting value.

In the result, we set aside the decision of the learned Judge and we direct the Corporation to determine the rateable value by deducting the amount of the education cess from the amount fixed by the Assessor and Collector.

We are surprised that no one so far has considered the injustice of allowing a deduction of only ten per cent. for all outgoings. The costs of materials and labour charges have gone very high as much as even four and five times of what they were in days past. It is no wonder, therefore, that no landlord even if he wants to make repairs can afford to do so, as the returns are limited and the ten per cent. of the rent is too meagre. The result is that so many properties become useless for habitation and ultimately the tenants suffer. If one has regard to the litigations in the Small Causes Court, there would seem to be large number of defaults in the payment of small amount of rents. Under English Statute the deduction is much higher, varying between forty and twenty per cent. of the letting value of buildings without land other than garden land and ten per cent. for land only. (See the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 and the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 as amended by the Rating and Valuation Act, 1928 and by s. 7 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928). It is time that the provision as to deduction is rationalized to meet the present day costs for determination of letting value in all Municipal Acts.

The parties to bear their own costs.

Order set aside.

Constitution of India, Art. 254(2)—Minimum Wages (Maharashtra Amendment) Act, (Mah. Act VI of 1963)—State Legislature passing Act amending Central Act—State Act repealed by Central Amending Act—State Legislature again passing another amending Act re-enacting repealed law—Competency of State Legislature to enact such law.

Article 254(2) or the provisions hereunder of the Constitution of India does not limit the powers of the State Legislature so as to preclude it from enacting on the same point again after the Parliament has once acted under the proviso to override an earlier amendment made by the State Legislature under art. 254(2).

Minimum Wages (Maharashtra Amendment) Act, 1962, is not ultra vires of the powers of the State Legislature.

The facts appear in the judgment.

M. N. Phadke, M. W. Puranik, N. S. Munshi and P. T. Trivedi, for the petitioners.

G. R. Mudholkar, Additional Government Pleader, for the respondents.

S. W. Dhabe and C. S. Dharmadhikari, for the interveners.

*Decided, November 10, 1964. Special Civil Application No. 491 of 1968.

PARANJPE J. In this petition under art. 226 of the Constitution, the petitioners have prayed that two notifications under the Minimum Wages Act, as locally amended, should be quashed.

Acting under s. 3 read with s. 5(2) of the Minimum Wages Act, the State of Maharashtra issued a notification on September 9, 1963, whereby the minimum wages for skilled, semi-skilled and unskilled labourers employed in residential hotels, restaurant or eating house were fixed. On October 1, 1963, the State Government issued another notification under s. 30(2)(c) of the Minimum Wages Act for determining the computation of the cash value of the wages which are permitted to be paid in kind to these workers. Petitioner No. 1 is the Nagpur Hotel Owners' Association and petitioners Nos. 2 and 3 are owners of hotels which are run at Nagpur. These three petitioners contend that the said notifications are ultra vires of the powers vested in the Government and, therefore, they ought not to be enforced. The State of Maharashtra have contended that the notifications are perfectly valid and there is no reason or ground to interfere with them.

Before we proceed to consider the submissions of the respective advocates in this connection, it will be useful to trace the history of the legislation, "Minimum Wages Act," so far as it concerns the employees in residential hotels, restaurants or eating houses. The Central Act No. XI of 1948 was passed to provide for fixing minimum rates of wages in certain employments. This subject of the enactment was under entry No. 27 in the Concurrent Legislative List (List No. III) in the Government of India Act, 1935. Initially, only twelve classes of employment were mentioned in the first part of the Schedule. Under s. 27 of the Minimum Wages Act, the State Government were given power to include in this Schedule other employments for which minimum rates of wages could be fixed. Accordingly, the then State of Bombay added "employment in any residential hotels, restaurant or eating house" as defined in the Bombay Shops and Establishments Act, 1948, as item No. 13 in Schedule I, Part I, on August 26, 1951. Under the original Minimum Wages Act s. 3(I) had three sub-cl. (i), (ii) and (iii) with respect to the employments specified in Part I of the Schedule, employments specified in Part II of the Schedule and employment added subsequently under s. 27, respectively. Under the proviso to sub-cl. (ii) of s. 3(I) with respect to employments specified in Part II of the Schedule (which relate mostly to agricultural employments) the State Governments were given power of fixing minimum rates of wages under that sub-clause either for the whole State or for a part of the State, but no such proviso was added to the other two sub-clauses of s. 3(I) in the original Act.

This subject of minimum wages, which falls under the heading "Welfare of labour", falls under item No. 24 in the Third (Concurrent) List in the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. Therefore, the Parliament, as also the State Legislature, have power to make laws with respect to this subject. Accordingly, the Maharashtra State Legislature passed the Amending Act No. X of 1961, and after receiving the President's assent it came into force on February 15, 1961. By s. 2 of this Amending Act, the original s. 3 in the Central Act No. XI of 1948 was amended and provisos permitting the fixation of minimum wages for the whole State or for a part of the State were added to all the three sub-clauses of s. 3. With this amendment, the State Government was given the power to fix minimum wages for employments including employment in hotels, restaurant etc. either for the whole State or for a part of the State. Shortly after this local Amending Act was passed, the Parliament enacted Act No. XXXI of 1961 for amending the Minimum Wages Act No. XI of 1948. By this amendment, the three clauses to s. 3 were consolidated into one and the proviso permitting the fixation of wages for a part of the State was added only with respect to employments mentioned in Part II of the Schedule which related mostly to agricultural employments. It is not disputed that this Amending Central Act No. XXXI of 1961 had the effect of abrogating and repealing the Maharashtra Amending Act No. X of 1961.

Thereafter the Maharashtra State Legislature again enacted Act No. III of 1963. By this new Amending Act, the provisos to s. 3, as incorporated by the Central Act No. XXXI of 1961, were substituted by the following proviso:

"Provided that, the State Government may, instead of fixing minimum rates of wages under this clause for the whole State, fix such rates for a part of the State or for any specified class or classes of such employments in the whole of the State or any part thereof; and in the case of an employment under any local authority, the State Government may fix such rates for any specified local authority, or class of local authorities."

This Act No. III of 1963 was reserved for the consideration of the President and it received his assent on January 9, 1963, and came into force on January 14, 1963. It is under this Act that the impugned notifications have been issued.

According to Mr. Phadke, advocate for the petitioners, the impugned notifications are unsustainable because Act No. III of 1963 under which they have been issued, is itself ultra vires of the powers of the State Legislature. He did not dispute that under art. 254(2) of the Constitution, the State Legislature had power to enact Act No. X of 1961. However, he contended that once the Parliament itself had virtually repealed or abrogated the Maharashtra Act No. X of 1961 by passing Act No. XXXI of 1961 under the proviso to art. 254(2) of the Constitution, the power of the State Legislature to pass under art. 254(2) a legislation, which was repugnant to the Central legislation and to reserve that legislation for the consideration of the Parliament, came to an end, and, therefore, this subsequent Act No. III of 1963, though it had received the assent of the President, was entirely beyond the powers of the State Legislature. In his opinion, once the Parliament took the field by ousting the Maharashtra Amending Act No. X of 1961, it was no longer open to the State Legislature to purport to re-enact another law, which had been superseded by the Parliament itself, and the assent of the President would not give validity to an Act which was prima facie beyond the powers of the Legislature. According to Mr. Mudholkar, Additional Solicitor General and Pleader, on the other hand, the powers given to the State Legislature by art. 254(2) were not intended to be exhausted on being used only once. While not disputing that the Parliament always had power under the proviso to art. 254(2) to overrule an Amending Act by the State Legislature, Mr. Mudholkar contended that the power of the State Legislature to pass an enactment on matters in the Concurrent List in the Seventh Schedule always remained intact subject to the President giving his assent to such an amendment.

While elucidating his argument Mr. Phadke was submitting that art. 254(1) enunciated the main provision, namely, that though both the Parliament and the State Legislature had power to enact laws with respect to matters stated in the Concurrent List, the law passed by the Parliament was to prevail and the law passed by the State Legislature was to prevail to the extent to which it was repugnant to the law passed by the Parliament. He then submitted that art. 254(2) of the Constitution, which authorised the State Legislature to get over the repugnancy with respect to the law passed by the Parliament by passing an Amending Act with the assent of the President, was only by way of a proviso and, in that view, he did not dispute that the Maharashtra State Legislature had acted entirely within its power under art. 254(2) by passing the Amending Act No. X of 1961 and in obtaining the assent of the President. His main contention, however, was that after the Maharashtra State Legislature had passed the Amending Act No. X of 1961, the Parliament had intervened with intent to undo the provisions made by the Maharashtra Amending Act and had passed Act No. XXXI of 1961 in accordance with the proviso to art. 254(2) of the Constitution. Having thus ousted the law made by the Amending Act passed by the State Legislature, the Parliament had taken the field and, therefore, the powers of the State Legislature to again pass a second Amending Act on the lines of the first Act, which had been superseded by the parliamentary amendment, must be deemed to have come to an end and, consequently, the Amending Act No. III of 1963 ought to be considered illegal and ultra vires of the powers of the State Legislature.

In advancing this argument Mr. Phadke was assuming that once the Parliament has exercised its power under the proviso below art. 254(2) to amend or to override a legislation passed by the State Legislature under art. 254(2), the power of the State Legislature to pass any such legislation came to an end and it could not act for a second time to pass any legislation with respect to the matters covered by the Parliament's legislation under the proviso to art. 254(2). However, there did not seem to be any warrant for making any such assumption. The wordings in art. 254(2) or the proviso thereunder do not lend to such an interpretation of the provisions. There is nothing therein to limit the powers of the State Legislature so as to preclude it from enacting on the same point again after the Parliament has once acted under the proviso to override an earlier amendment made by the State Legislature under art. 254(2). While not disputing that the wordings of the article itself do not provide such a meaning, Mr. Phadke was submitting that if his interpretation were not accepted, there would be an unhealthy competition between the Parliament and the State Legislature and each one would try to override the other. We do not think that such a fear is well founded. If a Legislature and the Parliament try to enter into this sort of a competition in passing contradictory legislations, the matter will immediately be put a stop to by the President by withholding his assent or refusing to give his assent under art. 254(2). Though the State Legislature has power to enact a legislation on a subject in a Concurrent List, as its own area is concerned, the assent of the President is always essential and we are not prepared to subscribe to the fear of Mr. Phadke that due care would not be taken while resorting to art. 254(2). Mr. Phadke was also not right in assuming that the President's act was only an executive act. The heading of Part XI of the Constitution in which this art. 254 comes is "Distribution of Legislative Powers" and consequently the act of the President in giving his assent under art. 254(2) would not be merely an executive act but would be a part of the legislative powers which ultimately make such a law valid.

The argument of Mr. Phadke would also virtually amount to saying that though a State Legislature has power to enact on matters in the Concurrent List, its legislative power with respect to a particular subject would come to an end or would become exhausted the moment the Parliament passes a legislation on that subject under the proviso to art. 254(2). We do not think that that was the intention of the framers of the Constitution. If that was the intention, there was nothing to prevent the framers of the Constitution from saying so, in so many words. The Central Act No. XXXI of 1961 certainly does not specifically say that it has been passed for repealing the Bombay Act. However, it is beyond doubt that it is not necessary to mention specifically that a particular Act was intended to be repealed. It will be seen from *Zaverbhai v. State of Bombay*¹ that even when the Parliamentary legislation does not expressly state that a particular law is repealed, the State law will be void if it conflicts with a later law passed by the Parliament with respect to the same matter. Though the State Act No. X of 1961 has thus been repealed by the Parliamentary Act No. XXXI of 1961, the power of the State Legislature to pass a fresh legislation with respect to the repugnancy in accordance with the proviso to art. 254(2) of the Constitution, still remains intact and that power has been properly exercised after reserving the Act for the consideration of the President. It is not disputed that the President has accorded his assent to the Maharashtra Act No. III of 1963, which was validly passed by the State Legislature. Consequently, the impugned notifications, which were issued under Act No. III of 1963, cannot be challenged.

The next contention of Mr. Phadke was with respect to the fixation of rates for skilled, semi-skilled and unskilled labourers. According to him, these rates were arbitrarily fixed at a very high level as compared to the rates prevalent for other employments falling under the Minimum Wages Act. The learned Additional Government Pleader, however, pointed out that the rates in other employments mentioned in the petition were already revised in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Minimum Wages Act and were duly published in the Gazette. In view of that statement of the learned Additional Government Pleader, Mr. Phadke did not press this ground of attack.

The last contention of Mr. Phadke was that the State Government had acted illegally and arbitrarily in fixing the cash value of the payments to be made to the employees in kind. According to him, rule 20 mandatorily required that the Government should take into consideration the prevailing market rates before fixing the cash value of the payments in kind. According to him, the cash value fixed by the Government in the notification on October 1, 1963, had no relation whatsoever to the prevailing market value and, therefore, he wanted us to interfere with those rates. The contention of the petitioners that the Government had not considered the prevalent market rates did not appear to be well founded. In para. 12 of the return, the State Government had denied this allegation of the petitioners. It was the case of the Government that the Committee duly appointed under the Act had considered all relevant factors including the prevailing market rates. We have no material before us to say that the market rates were not considered, as was the case of the petitioners. We do not think that there was any question of taking judicial notice of the prevailing market rates and to hold that the rates, as fixed by the Government, are ridiculously low as compared to those rates. After all, the prevailing rates in the market would be the rates charged to an individual consumer whereas the rates considered by the Committee were apparently on the basis of the cost to the Government. There is no material on which we could interfere with the Government.

The petition is dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

MAJOR HANMANTRAO NARAYANRAO JAGTAP.*

Bombay Court-fees Act (Bom. XXXVI of 1929) s. 6(iv)(d) & (iv)(j)—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947)—Suit by sub-tenant for declaration that he is entitled to be sub-tenant of landlord on termination of head-tenant's tenancy—Consequential relief for injunction restraining landlord from evicting him—Whether suit governed by s. 6(iv)(d) of Bombay Court-fees Act.

The word "tenancy" as used in s. 6(iv)(d) of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, relates to tenancy as understood under the ordinary law, which is interest in immovable property, and not to statutory tenancy under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, which is not tenancy of immovable property.

Therefore, a suit by a sub-tenant of the original tenant for a declaration that he is entitled to be the sub-tenant of the landlord on the termination of the tenancy of the head-tenant in view of s. 14 of the Rent Act and for an injunction restraining the landlord from evicting him from the suit premises, is not a suit governed by

CORRIGENDA.

On page 211 of 67 Bom. L.R. in line 2 read s. 6(iv)(j) instead of s. 5(iv)(j); and in line 11 read B. N. Shrotri instead of B. H. Shrotri.

... one half of the ad valorem duty. It further came to the conclusion that the Bench could be held to be 20 times the annual rent. It accordingly directed the plaintiffs to pay Court-fees on the valuation arrived at by it. Aggrieved by this order the plaintiffs-petitioners have filed the present Civil Revision Application.

Mr. Shrotri, who appears for respondent No. 1, has taken a preliminary point that the revision application is not competent and in support of his said contention he has relied on s. 29(3) of the Bombay Rent Act. Section 29 of the Rent Act provides for appeals from decrees or orders in suits or proceedings made by Courts exercising jurisdiction under s. 28 of the Rent Act. Under sub-s. (1) it is provided that in Greater Bombay from a decree or order made by the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, the appeal will lie to a Bench of two Judges of the said Court and elsewhere the appeal will lie to the District Court. The proviso to the said sub-section restricts the right of appeal by providing that no appeal will lie from decrees or orders in suits or proceedings falling within the four parts of the said proviso, the first being where from the decree or order in the suit or proceeding no appeal lies under the Civil Procedure Code. Under sub-s. (2) it is provided that except for the appeal that is provided under sub-s. (1), there will be no further appeal. Sub-section (3) then states:—

"Where no appeal lies under this section from a decree or order in any suit or proceeding in Greater Bombay, the Bench of two judges specified in clause (a) of sub-section (1) and elsewhere the District Court may, for the purpose of satisfying itself that the decree or order made was according to law, call for the case in which such decree or order was made and pass such order with respect thereto as it thinks fit."

Mr. Shrotri has argued that in view of the said provision that remedy of the plaintiffs against the order passed by the trial Court was to the District Court and not to the High Court under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

It seems to me doubtful whether interlocutory order in suits or proceedings, which are not appealable under the Civil Procedure Code and which by virtue of s. 105 of the said Code can be challenged only in the appeal from the decree or final order in the suit or proceedings are made revisable at an interlocutory stage by the Court to which the appeal lies under the said sub-section. Under the first part of the first proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 29 the right of appeal given under the main sub-section is made available subject to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. In other words, the availability of appeals from decrees and orders in suits or proceedings under the Rent Act is the same as under the ordinary law except that the appeals from the decrees or orders in the suits or proceedings under the Rent Act will lie to the special Courts of appeal specified in the Act. The further parts of the first proviso, however, take away the right of appeal from decrees and orders in certain suits and proceedings specified in the said parts irrespective of whether an appeal lies from such decrees or orders under the Code of Civil Procedure. It is, therefore, arguable that power of revision given to the Courts of appeal under the Rent Act is only in respect of such decrees or orders in suits or proceedings where the right of appeal is taken away by the provisions of s. 29 itself and not in respect of those from which no appeal lies under the Civil Procedure Code. I do not, however, find it necessary to go further into the matter and express my final opinion on it because even if it is assumed that the order in the present case was capable of being revised by the District Court under s. 29(3) it will in no way affect this Court's jurisdiction to entertain and deal with it under its revisional power under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is well-settled that even in cases where an appeal is provided to another Court or an alternative remedy is available, the High Court can exercise its powers under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. (See, for instance, Sashi Kanta v. Nasirabad Loan Office, Goel v. Kadambari, Kadambini Dasi,² and Babu Ram v. Manohar Lal.)

It cannot, therefore, be said that the present Civil Revision Application is not maintainable. The only question is whether this Court should entertain it. As I have already pointed out earlier, it does not appear to be quite clear whether the order is revisable by the District Court. Moreover, the revision application is already admitted and the point involved is an important one affecting a large number of suits under the Rent Act. Even if the matter is returned to the District Court, it is quite likely to come back again to this Court in revision from the order passed by it. Even assuming, therefore, that the order was capable of being revised by the District Court under s. 29(3) of the Rent Act, I do not propose to decline to entertain it on that ground and will, therefore, proceed to deal with it on merits.

Proceeding then to the merits of the revision application, the short question to be considered is whether the plaintiffs' suit falls within s. 6(iv)(d) of the Court-fees Act as held by the trial Court. Section 6(iv)(d) reads as follows:—

"In suits for declaration in respect of ownership, or nature of tenancy, title, tenure, right, lease, freedom or exemption from, or non-liability to, attachment with or without sale or other attributes, of immovable property, such as a declaration that certain land is personal property of the Ruler of any former Indian State or public trust property or property of any class or community—one-fourth of ad valorem fee leviable for a suit for possession on the basis of title of the subject-matter, subject to a minimum fee of eighteen rupees and seventy five naye paise."

The third proviso thereto is:

"Provided also that, in any of the cases falling under this clause except its first proviso, when in addition any consequential relief other than possession is sought the amount of fee shall be one half of ad valorem fee and when the consequential reliefs also sought include a relief for possession the amount of fee shall be the full ad valorem fee;"

2 [1944] A.I.R. Cal. 809.

The view of the trial Court is that, as the plaintiffs have sought a declaration as to the nature of their tenancy and have sought a further consequential relief by way of injunction restraining respondent No. 1 from evicting them from the suit premises in execution of the decree obtained by him against respondent No. 2, the suit is governed by s. 6(iv)(d) read with the third proviso referred to above. It seems to me, however, that the plaintiffs' suit is not for a declaration of the nature of their tenancy of any immovable property. The word "tenancy" as used in this provision relates to tenancy as understood under the ordinary law, which is interest in immovable property. The plaintiffs in the suit filed by them do not claim any tenancy rights in any immovable property. Their suit is for a declaration that they, having been the sub-tenants of the original tenant, are, in view of the provisions of the Rent Act, entitled to be the statutory tenants of the landlord on the termination of the tenancy of the head-tenant in view of s. 14 of the Rent Act. In other words, the plaintiffs want a declaration that they are entitled to the status of statutory tenants and to the protection afforded to them under the Rent Act and consequent on this declaration they want an injunction against the landlord restraining him from evicting them from the suit premises. Statutory tenancy under the Rent Act, it is well settled, is not tenancy of immovable property. A statutory tenant has no rights or interest in any immovable property. As has been held by this Court in Rodrigues, In re⁴ the statutory tenancy to which an insolvent becomes entitled under the Bombay Rent Act is not his 'property'. The right of a statutory tenant is merely a personal right to retain possession. It is not a right, which he can assign or deal with and no relationship of landlord and tenant is created between him and the landlord (See *State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai*⁵). Statutory tenancy does not involve a right of property but merely gives a personal right or a status of irremovability. As is often said, the term 'tenancy' used in relation with the right of a statutory tenant is really a misnomer. The declaration, therefore, which the plaintiffs have sought in the present case, cannot be considered as a declaration in respect of the nature of tenancy of any immovable property. It is not contended that the declaration sought by the plaintiffs would come within the ambit of s. 6(iv)(d) in any other manner excepting as a declaration of their status as statutory tenants. It must, therefore, be held that the plaintiffs' suit is not governed by s. 6(iv)(d) of the Bombay Court-fees Act. The appropriate provision of the Bombay Court-fees Act, which, in my opinion, will be applicable to the plaintiffs' suit, is the provision of s. 6(iv)(j), which is as follows:—

"In suits where declaration is sought, with or without injunction or other consequential relief and the subject-matter in dispute is not susceptible of monetary evaluation and which are not otherwise provided for by this Act—thirty rupees."

In view of this provision, the plaintiffs were entitled to pay the fixed Court-fee of Rs. 30 on the claim in suit.

I accordingly hold that the Court-fee of Rs. 30 paid by the plaintiffs on the plaint was the correct Court-fee to be paid by them in the present case and the order of the trial Court, requiring them to pay ad valorem Court-fees on the value of the suit property as determined by it, is erroneous. The order passed by the trial Court is, therefore, set aside and the rule is made absolute. There will be no order as to costs.

Rule made absolute.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

A. S. R. Chari, instructed by Kantilal Parikh & Co., for the petitioner.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General (Amicus Curiae).

KOTVAL J. Pursuant to the order passed by a Division Bench on October 28, 1964, we have heard the Advocate General amicus curiae on the question of competency and the jurisdiction of this Court to issue a rule or writ in the instant case. This matter was originally presented to this Court as an appeal but it appears that at the said hearing before Mody and Gokhale JJ., the memorandum of appeal was amended, and the petitioner now seeks to invoke our constitutional powers under art. 226. Though this is a matter which is merely placed before us for admission, it is necessary to pass a full order and indicate our reasons because it involves an important point and counsel were heard at length.

The plaint in pending suit No. 912 of 1960 was presented on the Original Side of this Court some time in 1960. In that suit, Nathnaraj M. D. Thackersey has claimed damages of Rs. 3,00,000 for publication of an alleged malicious libel in the weekly journal "Blitz" from its editor and publisher R. K. Karanjia and from the paper itself. The article under the caption "Scandal Bigger than Mundhra" was published on September 24, 1960.

The hearing of evidence commenced on June 24, 1964, and evidence is still being recorded before Mr. Justice Tarkunde, the sole respondent before us. One Bhaichand Goda was a witness on behalf of the defendants. He had given evidence and was probably discharged, but it transpired that there were some statements made by him to the Income-tax authorities between the years 1954 and 1963 which were required to be put to him and so with the permission of the Court he was summoned for recording of further evidence. He appeared before Mr. Justice Tarkunde on Friday, October 23, 1964, and it is in connection with what transpired at that hearing that the petitioner asks for an "appropriate writ or order or direction".

Since we are at the stage of admission only, we will accept the statements of the petitioner in paras. 9 and 10 of the petition as correctly representing what transpired on October 23, 1964. The petitioner says that (Para 9:) "On Friday, the 23rd October, 1964 when the said Bhaichand Goda came to the witness box he made a prayer to the trial Judge respondent No. 1 to the effect that the publication in the press of his earlier evidence had caused loss in business to him, and that the learned Judge should protect him against his present evidence being reported in the press.

(Para 10:) Arguments were addressed to His Lordship and His Lordship said that his evidence should not be published. It being pointed to him that the daily press (viz.) the Times of India and the Indian Express gave only brief accounts and that the Blitz gives a full report, His Lordship told Mr. L.M. Zaveri, counsel for defendants 1 and 2 that the petitioner who was the reporter for Blitz should be told not to publish reports of Bhaichand Goda's evidence in Blitz. The petitioner all along has been reporting the proceedings in the said suit in Blitz."

Then the petitioner alleges that after this order was passed when the hearing of the suit was resumed on Monday, October 26, 1964, counsel for the defendants in the suit pointed out to the learned Judge that a fundamental principle in the administration of justice was being infringed in so far as the proceedings must be public and open to the public and that exceptions to such public administration of justice were rare. It has been further stated that it was urged before the learned trying Judge that "no witness could claim protection from publicity on the ground that his evidence if published might adversely affect his business" and that the "Blitz" would publish a report of the evidence if the learned Judge had merely made a suggestion or given advice but that if the learned Judge gave a written order forbidding such publication the "Blitz" would naturally obey it. It is further alleged that Mr. Justice Tarkunde stated that he had already made an oral order and that no written order was necessary and he expected obedience to his oral order. It is against the said oral order that the applicant has presented this application.

The petitioner was not a party to the suit. The petitioner claims to be a reporter serving on the staff of the "Blitz" of which the publisher and editor was defendant No. 1. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendants in the suit are parties to this petition but the sole respondent is Mr. Justice Tarkunde. The petitioner claims that the oral orders of the trying Judge have affected "the fundamental principle in the administration of justice... that the proceedings shall be open to the public and the public should have the right to inform themselves of the manner in which justice is administered by reading fair and accurate reports of proceedings in Court". He has also averred that "the fundamental right of the freedom of speech and of the press" which embraces the right to publish faithful and accurate reports of proceedings in open Court has been infringed thereby.

When this matter came up for admission before Mody and Gokhale JJ., they felt that it was necessary to ascertain at least prima facie that the petition was competent against the sole respondent. They, therefore, invited the learned Advocate General to address them on the question whether the Division Bench could in the circumstances have jurisdiction to issue a writ against the respondent, a Judge of this Court.

After hearing the learned Advocate General amicus curiæ and Mr. Chari on behalf of the petitioner, we are pleased that in this case this Court can have no jurisdiction to issue a writ in respect of the order passed by Mr. Justice Tarkunde nor any writ against him. We may briefly state our reasons as follows:

The principal argument has been that in respect of an order passed even by a single Judge of the High Court in his judicial capacity, no other Bench of the same Court can issue a writ having regard to the powers given under arts. 225, 226 and 227 of the Constitution. Article 225 lays down generally the jurisdiction of the High Courts and it says that subject to the provisions of the Constitution and to the provisions of any law of the appropriate Legislature made by virtue of powers conferred by the Constitution,

"the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court, and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court,...sitting alone or in Division Courts, shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of this Constitution".

Thus the powers of the Judges in relation to the administration of justice in the High Court and the law to be administered, remain the same as before the Constitution save and except that it is modified by any provision of the Constitution or by legislation by an appropriate Legislature.

In order to find out what were the powers prior to the Constitution we must turn to cl. 36 of the Letters Patent of this Court. Clause 36 declares that

"...any function which is hereby directed to be performed by the said High Court of Judicature at Bombay, in the exercise of its original or appellate jurisdiction, may be performed by any Judge, or by any Division Court thereof..."

The clause, it is not in dispute, speaks of the judicial functions of the High Court and it is clear, therefore, that where a single Judge is performing judicial functions on the Original Side of the Bombay High Court he is as much the High Court, as a Judge sitting singly on the Appellate Side. Clause 36 draws no distinction between the Original and the Appellate Sides. It says in terms that each and every function of the High Court can validly be performed by a single Judge sitting on either side of the Court.

The combined effect of art. 225 read with cl. 36 of the Letters Patent is, therefore, clear. After the Constitution the respective powers of the Judges in relation to the administration of justice remain the same as before the Constitution—and in all their pristine plenitude. Those powers are of course subject to and may be modified by any provision of the Constitution or by any law made by the appropriate Legislature duly empowered by the Constitution which now includes the Letters Patent. Any Judge of the Bombay High Court no less than a Division Bench or Full Bench of the High Court may, therefore, perform all the judicial functions of that Court in exercise of its Original as well as Appellate jurisdiction. The judicial decision of a single Judge, whether given in the exercise of Original or Appellate jurisdiction would be a decision of the High Court as much as any similar decision given by two or more Judges sitting together.

In the due performance of his judicial function, therefore, a single Judge is no whit inferior to any other Judge or Judges. Sitting as he was in exercise of the Original jurisdiction of this Court Mr. Justice Tarkunde was, undoubtedly, functioning judicially and as the High Court and the question that arises is whether a Division Bench or any two or more Judges of the High Court can lawfully interfere with that function.

Article 225 of the Constitution is expressly made "subject to the provisions of this Constitution" and that would let in arts. 226 and 227. Article 225 must, therefore, be read as subject to arts. 226 and 227. Mr. Chari relied on the provisions of art. 226 to spell out a power in this Court to issue a writ against the learned Single Judge. He urged that art. 226 gives every High Court the power "throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction to issue to any person or authority..." including Government,—directions, orders or the writs specified for the enforcement of fundamental rights or for any other purpose and that so far as Mr. Justice Tarkunde was concerned, he would come within the ambit of the words "any person or authority".

The plenary words of art. 226 are "Every High Court shall have power..." and we have already shown that Mr. Justice Tarkunde sitting on the Original Side was as much the High Court as any two or more Judges thereof sitting together as a Divisional Bench or a Full Bench. The power thus exercised is in any case that of the High Court. Now there is nothing in art. 226 to suggest that one and the same High Court can issue rules or writs against itself, nor it seems, should we hold so, unless we are forced to that conclusion by the clearest and the most compelling language. Such a principle would impart a dangerous want of finality to the decisions of this Court and render the law uncertain. We shall show a little later when we come to consider the nature of the writs mentioned in art. 226, that the same conclusion will also follow from a consideration of the scope and extent of the writ of certiorari which alone is involved in the present case.

So far as art. 227 of the Constitution is concerned, it gives power to every High Court "of superintendence over all Courts and Tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction." The power is one of superintendence and, in our opinion, by its very nature, is a power over subordinate Courts and Tribunals within the territories in which the High Court exercises jurisdiction. Article 227 does not indicate that a single Judge of a High Court, as we have shown functioning judicially as the High Court, can be corrected by the same High Court or by any two or more Judges of the same High Court in exercise of its power of superintendence. In fact, sub-art. (1) of art. 227 uses the words "every High Court" in contra-distinction with "all Courts and Tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction". It can hardly be urged that in the words "all Courts and Tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction" would also be included the High Court itself. Neither art. 226 nor art. 227, therefore, leads to the conclusion that two or more Judges of one and the same High Court can either exercise superintendence over the judicial functions of a single Judge of that Court, whether sitting on the Original or Appellate Side, or correct him in any way so long as he is exercising judicial function.

Next Mr. Chari sought to draw a distinction between a Judge presiding in a Court and the Court itself. He pointed out that clause 36 of the Letters Patent speaks of a Judge whereas art. 226 of the Constitution makes no reference to a Judge but only to the High Court. No doubt, the distinction is understandable but if we have regard to other provisions of the Constitution, it does not appear that so far as the exercise of judicial functions by a Judge or Judges is concerned, the High Court is different from the Judge or Judges of that High Court. Article 214 lays down that there shall be a High Court for each State. Article 215 says that "every High Court shall... have all the powers of such a Court including the powers to punish for contempt of itself". Then art. 216 lays down that "every High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and such other Judges as the President may from time to time deem it necessary to appoint". Therefore, every Judge is part of the constitution of the High Court. The High Court itself consists of the Chief Justice and the other Judges. Every Judge functioning, whether on the Original or the Appellate Side of a High Court, is functioning as the High Court. There is, therefore, no scope for drawing a distinction between the Judges of the High Court and the High Court itself so far as the question of exercise of judicial functions is concerned.

Even looking to the terms of cl. 36 of the Letters Patent the same conclusion would follow. Clause 36 says

"any function which is hereby directed to be performed by the said High Court of Judicature at Bombay, in the exercise of its original or appellate jurisdiction, may be performed by any Judge, or by any Division Court thereof..."

The clause itself uses the word "Judge" where a single Judge is intended to be referred to, but uses the words "Division Court" where more than one Judge is intended to be referred to. It does not say "a Judge or a Bench of two or more Judges". Thus the clause itself makes no distinction between the Court as such and a Judge or Judges composing it.

Then it was urged that even having regard to the provisions of art. 226 of the Constitution, there is a distinction between the Original Side and the Appellate Side of a High Court. It was urged by Mr. Chari that so far as the Original Side of the High Court is concerned, cls. 11 and 12 of the Letters Patent indicate that its jurisdiction is of a limited nature. The function of the High Court in its Original jurisdiction extends only to the area of Greater Bombay whereas the function of the High Court in the exercise of its Appellate Jurisdiction extends to the area of the entire State. It was, therefore, urged that a single Judge sitting in the exercise of the Original Jurisdiction of this Court would be a Court inferior or subordinate to a Court exercising Appellate Jurisdiction.

This argument, in our opinion, fails to draw a distinction between the area over which a particular Judge or Judges of the High Court may for the sake of convenience be exercising Original or Appellate function and the jurisdiction inherent in the Court over which the Judge presides. We have already referred to arts. 214, 215 and 216. Every High Court is a Court for each State and consists of the Chief Justice and other Judges as the President may appoint from time to time. Article 226 confers jurisdiction on the High Court throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction. Therefore, the power under art. 226 would be exercisable by every Judge of a High Court throughout the territories in relation to which the High Court of which he is a Judge exercises jurisdiction. That is the fundamental jurisdiction conferred upon every Judge of a High Court and, therefore, it cannot be urged that a single Judge sitting on the Original Side has his jurisdiction limited only to the area of Greater Bombay.

The distinction between the Original Side and the Appellate Side was brought into existence by cls. 11, 12, and 13 of the Letters Patent. But if we turn to cl. 36 of the Letters Patent we find the same idea expressed though in different language. We have already quoted the clause and what is of prime importance are the use of the words "any function" in the opening part of cl. 36 and the use of the words "in the exercise of its Original or Appellate jurisdiction" in the subsequent portions of the clause. The distinction is between a function to be performed and the Original or Appellate jurisdiction of the Court. What we have referred to in the preceding paragraph as the inherent or fundamental jurisdiction of the High Court is referred to in this clause as the "function" of the High Court in contradistinction with "appellate or original jurisdiction". When Mr. Justice Tarkunde sitting on the Original Side of the Bombay High Court decided this matter, he was performing the function of the High Court, but a function within the Original jurisdiction of the Court. He was, therefore, functioning as the High Court, as much as any other Judge of the High Court, whether in the exercise of Original or Appellate jurisdiction. Nothing, therefore, turns upon this distinction between the Original Side and the Appellate Side of this High Court.

Reference was then made to a decision of this Court in Emperor v. Krishnaji Vithal. That was a case where a question of construction of s. 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which gives revisional jurisdiction to the High Court in criminal cases, arose before a Division Bench of this Court. Section 435(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code gives power to the High Court and a Sessions Judge to call for and examine the record of any proceeding before "any inferior criminal court situate within the local limits of its or his jurisdiction for the purpose of satisfying itself or himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed, and as to the regularity of any proceedings", and the question that arose before the Division Bench was whether a single Judge sitting in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction with the aid of a Jury in the High Court of Sessions was a Court inferior to the High Court. The Learned Chief Justice held that it was an "inferior criminal Court" within the meaning of s. 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It was urged by Mr. Chari on the strength of this decision that if a Judge sitting to decide a case with the aid of a Jury in the High Court of Sessions was held to be a Court inferior to the High Court under s. 435 of the Criminal Procedure Code, then by analogy the learned single Judge sitting on the Original Side who disposed of this matter would also be a Court inferior to the High Court.

The decision in that case, however, turned on a question of interpretation of that particular statute, the Criminal Procedure Code. The question was what was the meaning of the words "inferior criminal Court" having regard to the hierarchy of Courts empowered by that Code to try criminal cases. We shall show presently that the expression "inferior Court" in the Criminal Procedure Code carries a totally different meaning than the expression "inferior Court" when used in contradiction with "superior Court" when we are considering a question of the jurisdiction of Courts. For the time being however we may say that it would be dangerous to apply the interpretation put upon a certain expression in such a special statute as the Code of Criminal Procedure to the interpretation of any other statute not in pari materia and it would be much more dangerous to do so where the question arises as to a provision of the Constitution. We do not think that an interpretation which prevailed so far as the particular terms of a statute relating to criminal law ought to govern the construction of a provision of the Constitution.

Article 226 in the first place does not refer to superior or inferior Courts nor does it make any distinction in the matter of subordination of Courts. Secondly, when speaking of the powers and jurisdiction of a Court the distinction which we make between superior and inferior Courts comes to us from the long history of the English Courts. How it arose is explained by Halsbury (Simonds' edn.) in Vol. 9 at p. 348 et seq. arts. 817 to 821. It has been explained that the inferior Courts were so called because, they were and are in the great majority of cases subject to the control and supervision of the Court of King's Bench or Queen's Bench Division as the superior Court. One of the distinctions between the superior Courts and the inferior Courts is thus stated in article 820:

"It is in connexion with jurisdiction that we find the chief distinction between superior and inferior courts... Prima facie, no matter is deemed to be beyond the jurisdiction of a superior court unless it is expressly shown to be so, while nothing is within the jurisdiction of an inferior court unless it is expressly shown on the face of the proceedings that the particular matter is within the cognizance of the particular Court."

Another distinction is that the Courts of superior jurisdiction are Courts which always have the jurisdiction to decide finally a question whether they have jurisdiction or not in a particular matter.

Bearing this distinction in mind and having regard to the constitutional provisions to which we have already referred, it is clear that a single Judge sitting on the Original Side is in no sense a Court inferior to the High Court or any two or more Judges of the High Court. The meaning of the same words in the Criminal Procedure Code cannot thus apply even by analogy. The authority, therefore, of Krishnaji's case cannot apply here.

Article 226 of the Constitution in laying down the power of the High Court to issue writs, directions or orders specifically includes "writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari or any of them". In the early years of the Constitution it was a question of acute debate as to what was the scope and extent of the power thus conferred by including by name these specific and well-known writs issued by the Supreme Court in England. In some decisions the view was taken that by the specification of the writs it was intended that the High Court must conform to all the limitations and follow the exact procedure, as in England in regard to these writs, whereas other decisions took the view that even though these writs were particularized it was only in order to illustrate the scope and extent of the power and, therefore, only the broad principles upon which these writs were being issued in England ought to be followed. This controversy has now been set at rest by several decisions of the Supreme Court. We may only refer to one such decision in T. C. Basappa v. T. Nagappa.² At page 256: Mr. Justice Mukherjea (as he then was) laid down the following principles:

"...In view of the express provisions in our Constitution we need not now look back to the early history or the procedural technicalities of these writs in English law, nor feel oppressed by any difference or change of opinion expressed in particular cases by English Judges. We can make an order or issue a writ in the nature of certiorari in all appropriate cases and in appropriate manner, so long as we keep to the broad and fundamental principles that regulate the exercise of jurisdiction in the matter of granting such writs in English law.

One of the fundamental principles in regard to the issuing of a writ of certiorari is, that the writ can be availed of only to remove or adjudicate on the validity of judicial acts."

We have quoted this passage in extenso in order to emphasize two points: Firstly, that it is only the broad principles which normally govern the issuance of these writs in England that ought to govern the exercise of the power conferred by art. 226 and, secondly, that a writ of certiorari is alone available against judicial acts, and then "only to remove or adjudicate" their validity.

In the present case, the Order which Mr. Justice Tarkunde passed was without doubt a judicial Order, and if at all we have the jurisdiction to interfere with it the appropriate writ would be a writ of certiorari. Now, in regard to that writ, the High Court in England has consistently refused to exercise its jurisdiction to issue it where the Order is passed by a single Judge of the High Court. The decision is to be found in Rex v. Justices of the C. C. C. : London County Council, Ex parte.³ That was an extraordinary case. By the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834, the salaries and expenses of the Central Criminal Court were ordered to be paid as to a certain proportion of them by the treasurer of the County of London. An order was made by the Central Criminal Court that any taxes demanded by the Inland Revenue authorities in respect of an honorarium payable to Sir Herbert Austin a clerk of that Court shall be paid by the public bodies by which the salaries of the Court's officials are payable. It was against that order that the King's Bench Division was moved to issue a writ of certiorari. At page 53 of the Report Lord Hewart Chief Justice discussed the position of the Judges of the Central Criminal Court under the said Act and observed:

"...That then is the Court to which it is urged that a writ of certiorari should be issued by this Court. In other words, it is said that the well known remedy for removing into the King's Bench Division an order made by an inferior Court is a remedy which is applicable to the Central Criminal Court. In my opinion, not only is there no authority for that proposition, but all the authority which one can find is in the opposite direction."

After discussing the several authorities the learned Chief Justice went on to state (p. 58):

"With regard to the main question in the case it only remains to add that various inquiries, no doubt of no little historical interest, have been stirred in argument. I shall not enter into these inquiries because, with due respect, they seem to me to throw little light upon the immediate question. I think it right, however, to remark that a clear distinction is to be drawn between two matters, on the one hand the removal, by means of certiorari, of indictments or presentments in order to bring about what may be called the domestic or internal arrangement or rearrangement of business, and on the other hand the removal for the purpose of quashing it of an order which has been made by a superior Court. In other words, in my opinion, the statutes and decisions in regard to mere change of venue are not upon the same plane with a proposal to bring from a superior Court an order which has been made by that Court for the purpose of quashing it. In the one case the superior Court is making for good reason a useful redistribution of its business; in the other case the superior Court is invited to quash that which itself has done, and the process involves the rather ludicrous position that it calls upon judges to show cause to themselves why they should not be directed to remove, so that it may be quashed, something which they themselves have determined. In my opinion the beginning of the truth about this matter is to distinguish the things which ought to be distinguished. There is no authority for the proposition with which those who seek to support this order nisi must begin—namely, that in a case of this kind there is jurisdiction in this Court to issue a writ of certiorari.”

Another decision which lays down the same principle is to be found in Skinner v. Northallerton County Court Judge.⁴ There the order impugned was an order passed in the exercise of bankruptcy jurisdiction by a County Court Judge. But the Bankruptcy Act of 1863, gave the County Court Judge sitting in bankruptcy the powers of the High Court. Against a warrant issued by the County Court Judge a writ of certiorari was asked for. It was alleged that the warrant was in form wrong and liable to be quashed. The Lord Chancellor Lord Haldane affirmed the refusal of the writ holding (p. 441):

“Now, this county court judge was sitting in bankruptcy, and the confusion which is imported into it is that because, as I will assume for the moment, the judge issued a warrant which in form was wrong, but could have been put right, therefore, it could have been put right, not in the Court in which it was issued, but in the High Court. The absurdity of that is that the statute itself has made the county court the High Court for this purpose. You might just as well argue that a warrant, defective in form, issued by the Court of Queen’s Bench could be set right by certiorari. Of course that is absurd. This is the High Court for this purpose. If the warrant was ever so bad, it was issued by a bankruptcy judge in respect of bankruptcy proceedings which were before him, of which he was seized—a warrant which he had perfect jurisdiction to issue. If there was any irregularity or inaccuracy in point of form in the warrant that did issue, that could be put right by proper proceedings, but the proper proceedings would be in that Court itself, and not proceedings by certiorari in the Court of Queen’s Bench.”

The same principle applies—contrary to common belief—even to the writ of habeas corpus. Until the Judicature Acts were passed in 1873 in England an exception so to say was made to this principle in the matter of issuing of the writ of habeas corpus and an applicant could apply successively to the several Judges of the same High Court for a writ; but since the Judicature Act of 1873 the Courts of Queen’s Bench Division and the Court of Chancery no longer exist as separate Courts. There is but one Supreme Court to which all Judges are appointed and they are then assigned to do the business of the Court in a particular Division. A comparatively recent decision in Hastings (No. 3), In re.⁵ illustrates the principle. Hastings had already applied twice for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus to the Court of the Queen’s Bench Division. He applied a third time for the issue of a similar writ in his favour to the Chancery Division. The application was negatived on the ground that there was no such writ available once the Queen’s Bench Division had declined to grant the writ. Vaisey J. laid down the principle in language which is at once memorable and instructive. At page 377 of the Report he said:

“...The mistake the applicant or his advisers made was to assume that the Chancery Division is a separate entity, a separate court, and that either by single judges or by a Divisional Court it can deal with the matter afresh.

The applicant used an expression which he must suppose to be flattering to us who are sitting here. He said in his affidavit that he had decided to come for a ‘complete hearing before a hitherto unconnected and impartial bench, and this I seek in the Chancery Court’. The number of misconceptions which are bound up in that sentence is almost beyond reckoning. To begin with, while I hope it is an impartial bench, it is certainly not an independent bench. Indeed, as Lord Parker has ruled with, I think, perfect accuracy, as soon as the Divisional Court of the Queen’s Bench Division has come to its conclusion there is an end of the matter, and, as I observed yesterday, it always has to be remembered that our orders are not orders of any particular Division or any particular Divisional Court: our orders are orders of the High Court. How we, judges of the High Court, could be heard to override, overrule, or otherwise interfere with a judgment which was the result of the hearing by the Divisional Court, or how we could be heard to say that the conclusion of that Court, and its order—an order of our own court, the only court which exists, the High Court of Justice—was wrong, and that something else should be done, is beyond my comprehension.”

Mr. Chari sought to brush aside the impact of the principles laid down in these decisions by urging that these decisions were the result of the special and peculiar historical growth of these writs in England, with which we in India are not concerned. He argued that we should confine ourselves to the express terms of art. 226 or 227 and ought not to interpret the power to issue those writs in the light of the historical back-ground that prevailed in England. In our opinion, the decisions to which we have referred have nothing to do with the historical growth of the writs. The decisions have crystallised the broad and general principles upon which those writs can be issued and it is precisely such broad principles which their Lordships of the Supreme Court have in Basappa's case directed us to follow. To quote

“...We can make an order or issue a writ in the nature of certiorari in all appropriate cases and in appropriate manner so long as we keep to the broad and fundamental principles that regulate the exercise of jurisdiction in the matter of granting such writs in English law.”

Applying these principles, therefore, this petition for a writ against Mr. Justice Tarkunde must fail.

We have indicated above that, in our opinion, the Order which Mr. Justice Tarkunde passed was a purely judicial order to which if at all a writ would be attracted it would be a writ of certiorari. We would here make it clear that whatever we have said in the foregoing discussion, we have said only in relation to a judicial order. We notice that in Rex v. Justices of the Central Criminal Court it could have been held that the order was an administrative order. In the notes of arguments of the Attorney General Sir Douglas Hogg at p. 47 of the Report it does appear that the point was raised but the learned Chief Justice did not rest his decision on the short point that it was an administrative order and therefore a writ of certiorari would not lie but on the ground that the Judges of the Central Criminal Court were themselves the Supreme Court of England. A fortiori that judgment would apply where the order is a judicial order as in the present case. In In re Babul Chandra,⁶ it has been observed that even where an order is made by the High Court on its administrative side, a Bench of the High Court has no jurisdiction to issue any writ or direction or order to the High Court. As to that part of the Patna decision we say nothing. We are not here concerned with an administrative order.

It was finally urged by Mr. Chari “ad misericordiam” that if the view which we have taken is to prevail, then the unfortunate petitioner will be left without a remedy and that were he to go to a higher Court it would not be an equally convenient or cheap remedy and that that would work great hardship upon him. In the first place, in determining a question of jurisdiction such as has arisen in this application, hardship or otherwise of a case can hardly be material. But we do not think that the petitioner is entirely without a remedy and even as convenient and cheap a remedy as is available under art. 226. We think he can still apply to the learned Judge who decided the matter for a review of his own order, if he so chooses. He has also a remedy by way of an application for special leave to the Supreme Court under art. 136 of the Constitution.

We are clearly of the opinion that there is no jurisdiction in this Court to issue any writ against the respondent in respect of the Order impugned in this petition. The petition is summarily dismissed. We record our appreciation of the valuable assistance we have received from the learned Advocate General appearing as “amicus curiae”.

Petition dismissed.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Gokhale.

KALA BHIKA BARIA v. THE STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Sec. 336—Act committed with intention of causing injury—Whether such act a rash or negligent act—Intentional pelting of stone whether covered by s. 336.

If a person commits an act with the intention of causing an injury to somebody else, it is an intentional act done with consideration and cannot, therefore, be a rash or negligent act within the meaning of that expression in s. 336 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860.

Where the accused pelts a stone at the complainant with a view to assault him a charge under s. 336 of the Indian Penal Code cannot be sustained against him.

Mahendra v. State,¹ Gaya Prasad v. Emperor,² Babu Ram v. Emperor,³ Maung Ba Kyi v. Emperor,⁴ *Empress of India v. Idu Beg*⁵ and Smith v. Emperor,⁶ agreed with.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

D. P. Shukla, for the petitioner.

R. S. Bhosale, Hon. Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

GOKHALE J. This is a revision application against the order of the learned Presidency Magistrate, 25th Court, Girgaon, Bombay, convicting the petitioner-accused for having committed an offence under s. 336, Indian Penal Code, and sentencing him to pay a fine of Rs. 10, or, in default, to suffer simple imprisonment for two days. The prosecution case is that the complainant Gangaram Bapu worked as a driver of refuse van No. BMS 7622 on August 15, 1963. That was the day on which the municipal workers in Bombay had been on strike. The complainant, who had apparently not joined the strike, had taken the van near the Marwadi Vidyalaya in a lane on the backside of Opera House at about 12 a.m. A police party consisting of three or four policemen accompanied the van for its protection. In the van there were six sweepers and one Mukadam for collecting refuse. At the place where the van was stationed the sweepers were collecting refuse and loading it in the van. The police party were in the police van, which was standing at a distance of 10 or 12 feet from the van of which the complainant was the driver. After the van was loaded and the complainant was about to enter the van, at about 12.15 p.m. the accused came there and abused the complainant and pelted a stone at him. The stone missed the complainant but hit the front right wheel of the van. The police chased the accused and apprehended him at some distance from the police station and the first information report was recorded. On these allegations the accused has been prosecuted and convicted and sentenced as stated above, for the offence under s. 336, Indian Penal Code.

The prosecution have examined three witnesses including the complainant Gangaram Bapu. The other two witnesses are Murlidhar Govind and Jagan-nath Maruti, both police constables, who were members of the party in the police van which was on the spot to protect the van of the complainant. The learned Magistrate has considered the evidence of these three witnesses and has observed that the evidence of the complainant is supported fully by the two police constables who were standing nearby. He has accepted the evidence of the two police constables to the effect that they saw the accused pelting a stone at the complainant. The learned Magistrate then observed as follows:—

*Decided, November 16, 1964. Criminal Revision Application No. 284 of 1964, against the order of conviction and sentence passed by T. S. Bhole, Presidency Magistrate, 25th Court, Girgaum, Bombay, in Case No. 42/P of 1964.

"Voluntarily pelting a stone at others is definitely a rash act so as to endanger human life or safety of others and it amounts to an offence under s. 336, I.P.C."

Mr. Shukla, who appears for the accused, contends that the findings of the learned Magistrate that the accused was the person who pelted a stone at the complainant was, on the face of it, unsupportable by the evidence led by the prosecution. It was his contention that if the circumstances in which the alleged offence is stated to have been committed are taken into consideration, it is unbelievable that the accused should be held to have pelted the stone at the complainant. The evidence of the complainant and the two police constables was read over to me by Mr. Shukla and I am unable to accept the contention that the finding of the learned Magistrate that the accused pelted the stone at the complainant, which missed its target but, instead, hit the right front wheel of the van, is erroneous. It is not possible to rely on minor variations in the evidence of these witnesses for holding that the accused was not the person who pelted the stone. I am satisfied that the evidence of the prosecution is consistent so far as the main allegation is concerned, viz., that the accused threw the stone aiming it at the complainant but it did not hit the complainant but, instead, hit the right front wheel of the van. This is a revision application and I do not see any reason for interfering with the finding made by the learned Magistrate in this regard.

It was contended on behalf of the accused that he was on sick leave from October 7, 1961, to the date of the incident and that he had gone to the doctor for treatment. The plea of the accused has also been considered by the learned Magistrate. No evidence is given as to who the doctor was and as to whether the accused really went to the doctor on that day. In the face of the consistent evidence of the prosecution witnesses, I would confirm the finding of the learned Magistrate that the accused pelted the stone at the complainant, but the stone hit the right front wheel of the van.

Mr. Shukla then submitted that if this finding of the learned Magistrate that the accused pelted the stone at the complainant were to be accepted, the accused cannot be convicted for the offence under s. 336, Indian Penal Code. He pointed out that the complainant has stated in his evidence that the accused wanted to pelt the stone at the complainant. Murlidhar Govind, one of the police constables, examined by the prosecution has stated that the accused threw the stone deliberately and that he actually saw the accused throwing the stone. Jaganath Maruti has also stated to the same effect. Moreover, all the three witnesses are consistent in the story that before the stone was pelted the accused abused the complainant in filthy language. On the basis of this evidence Mr. Shukla contends that the act of the accused in pelting a stone at the complainant was not a rash or negligent act but was a deliberate act. Section 336, Indian Penal Code, to the extent to which it is relevant, provides as follows:—

"Whoever does any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with..."

Mr. Shukla says that the offence consists of danger caused to human life or the personal safety of others, by an act which can be called rash or negligent. When a person deliberately attempts to assault or assaults another person and when such act is preceded by consideration, it cannot be called rash or negligent. There is considerable substance in this contention of Mr. Shukla. He invited my attention to a judgment of the Patna High Court in *Mahendra v. State*¹. The learned single Judge observed (p. 1008):—

"...A rash act is primarily a hasty act, and is thus opposed to a deliberate act. Of course, a rash act is also a voluntary act... An act done voluntarily may be a rash act, if it is done without due deliberation and caution."

The learned Judge relied on two cases of the Allahabad High Court. In *Gaya Prasad v. Emperor*² it was observed as follows (p. 745):—

"...A rash act is primarily an overhasty act and is opposed to a deliberate act.

Even if it is partly deliberate, it is done without due thought and caution. Here there is no question of want of thought or want of caution. The applicant desired a certain result to follow from the throwing of bricks and he deliberately threw the bricks at the temple for that purpose. According to the findings of the two subordinate Courts, there was neither rashness nor negligence in the act."

The same view has also been taken in Babu Ram v. Emperor.³ In Maung Ba Kyi v. Emperor,⁴ Spargo J. observed that if the act complained of was a deliberate act it cannot be called a rash or negligent act. The position has been very succinctly stated by Straight J. in Empress of India v. Idu Beg.⁵ The learned Judge has observed as follows (p. 779) :—

"...I may remark that criminal rashness is hazarding a dangerous or wanton act with the knowledge that it is so, and that it may cause injury, but without intention to cause injury, or knowledge that it will probably be caused. The criminality lies in running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness or indifference as to the consequences. Criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally or to an individual in particular, which, having regard to all the circumstances out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted."

These observations of Straight J. were quoted with approval by a Division Bench in Smith v. Emperor.⁶ I respectfully agree with the view taken in these cases. Where a person commits a wanton or dangerous act with the knowledge that it is so and he commits it without knowing that it may probably cause injury or without the intention of causing it, it will be a rash act. In such a case the person committing the act does not know that the result of its recklessness or negligence may probably cause injury to somebody, and he never intends that such an injury would be caused. When a person is negligent as to the consequences of his act and there is a failure on his part to take reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury to somebody else, it may be a negligent act. But if, on the other hand, a person commits an act with the intention of causing an injury to somebody else, it is an intentional act done with consideration and cannot, therefore, be a rash or negligent act. In the present case, the entire prosecution case is directed towards proving that the accused intentionally threw a stone at the complainant. The evidence also consistently shows that before the stone was pelted, the accused had abused the complainant. There can be no doubt on the evidence that the act of the accused was an intentional act, namely, of pelting a stone at the complainant with a view to assaulting him. This cannot be said to be an act undertaken rashly or negligently. It is undertaken with a positive intention of causing injury to the complainant. The fact that the act may endanger human life or the safety of others may be a common factor both in the cases of intentional as well as rash and negligent acts. But that by no means is the decisive factor. Even the finding of the learned Magistrate leaves no room for doubt that the accused had intentionally pelted the stone at the complainant. The fact that the stone missed its target makes no difference. It may be that on the facts established the charge could have been for attempt to cause hurt, but I fail to see how the charge could be of a rash and negligent act, as the present charge is, under s. 336, Indian Penal Code. In this view of the matter, while confirming the finding of the learned Magistrate that the accused pelted the stone at the complainant but the stone missed the complainant but, instead, hit the right front wheel of the van, I cannot confirm the conviction and the sentence imposed on the accused for the offence under s. 336, Indian Penal Code.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of conviction and sentence imposed on the petitioner-accused for the offence under s. 336, Indian Penal Code, and acquit him. Fine, if paid, shall be refunded.

Order of conviction and sentence set aside.

STATE v. MADHUKAR GOPINATH LOLGE.*

Bombay Prohibition Act (Bom. XXV of 1949)—Test whether liquid claimed to be liquor is in fact liquor or not—Syke's Hydrometer test whether a reliable test for this purpose.

Syke's Hydrometer test furnishes no data to determine whether a particular liquid is liquor or contains alcohol. Once it is known that a particular liquid contains alcohol, the percentage of alcohol in that liquid may be found by the Hydrometer test. Therefore when the basic question to be determined is whether the liquid does or does not contain alcohol, the Hydrometer test alone is not the proper test to come to any such determination.

C. R. Dalvi, Hon. Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

S. S. Shinde, (appointed), for the accused.

ABHYANKAR J. This is an appeal by the State challenging the acquittal of Madhukar Gopinath Lolge, a tonga driver, of Ahmednagar, under s. 66(I) of the Bombay Prohibition Act, by the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, III Court, Ahmednagar.

The respondent, Madhukar, was charge-sheeted before the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Ahmednagar, on the accusation that on September 13, 1962, early in the morning, at about 2-30 o'clock, the respondent, Madhukar, and his co-accused, Khandu, were found going on a bicycle, carrying illicitly distilled country liquor in two bladders having a total quantity of 24 bottles. They were thus charged with having committed offences under ss. 66(I)(b) and 83 of the Bombay Prohibition Act.

Both the accused pleaded not guilty. The respondent Madhukar stated in his examination, under s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that he had been falsely implicated in this case by the Police Inspector Pawar, that he was in the service of one Vithal Hari Lagade as a tonga driver who owned a tonga, that on the night in question, at about 1-30 a.m., he had returned to the Sarjapura locality in the tonga from the railway station, that he kept the tonga and its horse behind the Police Head Quarters and started going home on foot. When he came near the chowk in the Sarjapura locality, a policeman came near him in a Jeep car and told the respondent that he was called by the Home Inspector Pawar. He was taken in the Jeep car near the petrol pump. He was beaten by the Home Inspector. At that time two rubber bladders and one bicycle were found lying near the Police Inspector Pawar. He denied that he had ridden the bicycle or that he had borrowed it from anyone. He also denied that he was transporting liquor on that bicycle. He further alleged that he was implicated on a mere suspicion and that the witness Shankar Kadekar, who was examined as a Panch, had given false evidence as he had not given him a free lift in his tonga.

At the trial the prosecution examined one Shankar Kadekar, who in his examination-in-chief supported the prosecution case to a substantial extent, but admitted in cross-examination that his elder brother Gulab was a policeman and that since the last 2 or 3 years Gulab was serving as an orderly constable under the Police Inspector Pawar who had challaned this case. He also admitted that this Gulab occupies quarters in the Police Head Quarters and that the witness was also residing with Gulab. To further questions by the Court, the witness also admitted that he had made certain statements before the Court because he was told to say so by the Inspector Pawar and that he had made a false statement in his examination-in-chief that he had seen accused Nos. 1 and 2 throwing down the bicycle and running away. It is obvious, therefore, that this witness did not inspire the confidence of the Magistrate and not much reliance has been placed on the testimony of this witness in this Court either.

The second witness examined by the prosecution was one Rabha Hari, who apparently supported the prosecution case in his examination-in-chief, but gave it up altogether when he stated that he failed to disclose during investigation that the respondent was then driving the bicycle or that the other accused was on the bar of that bicycle. He admitted that he had seen accused No. 2 for the first time in Court after he saw him on that night and that he could see the face of accused No. 2 that night for a second. Even the testimony of this witness was not, therefore, of much assistance to the prosecution.

The third witness is one Shaikh Shabir Hussein Rajabali. Possibly he was examined to show that the bicycle, which was seized at the spot, was hired or borrowed by the respondent, Madhukar, but the witness did not support this part of the prosecution case. In fact, he stated that he had given this bicycle to one Moti Mahomed, that Moti Mahomed did not return the bicycle to him and that it was Moti Mahomed who told him that he had given the bicycle to the respondent. This Moti Mahomed not having been examined by the prosecution, the prosecution failed to connect the possession of the bicycle with the respondent. It was this bicycle which was alleged to be ridden on the night in question by the respondent and on the bar of which the bundle containing the liquor tubes was supposed to be carried. The prosecution thus failed to prove that the bicycle found on the spot, where it was alleged to have been thrown away, in fact belonged to the respondent or that it was borrowed by him.

The only witnesses from whom the prosecution could derive support was the police constable Abubakar Lalbhai and Inspector Pawar. Of these, Abubakar, the head constable, seems to have been examined as an expert. He claims that he had undergone training in testing liquor by the Syke's test. He brought a Hydrometer as well as a thermometer to test the contents of the two sealed rubber bladders brought before the Court. After taking the necessary tests he stated that the liquid contained in each of the two bladders was liquor containing 48.8 per cent. of alcohol and 51.2 per cent. of water. Inspector Pawar proved the prosecution case to the extent that he saw two persons riding a bicycle as he was about to get down from the police Jeep, the two persons got down, threw down the bicycle and took to their heels and ran towards the Maidan. He despatched two policemen to catch these two persons, but only one of them was actually caught in pursuit and that person was the respondent Madhukar. He claimed that he had seen the faces of both the persons who were riding the bicycle and, according to Pawar, the respondent Madhukar was riding the bicycle and the other accused was occupying the bar of that bicycle. It was Pawar's case that a bundle was attached to the handle of the bicycle, that it was wrapped in a Dhoti and that the bundle contained two rubber bladders in which about 8 gallons of liquor was alleged to be discovered.

After holding a panchanama he arrested the respondent. He thereafter charge-sheeted the two accused.

The learned Magistrate found no difficulty in acquitting both the accused. There was practically no evidence against the second accused, i.e., Khandu, who was not caught at the spot. As regards Madhukar also, i.e. the respondent, the learned Magistrate felt grave doubt whether he was really detected riding the bicycle which had the bundle alleged to be containing liquor in tubes. The learned Magistrate felt that the respondent could not be convicted on the sole testimony of the Police Inspector Pawar, especially because the witnesses who were called by the police were obviously got-up witnesses. In fact, the learned Magistrate came to the conclusion that there was an obvious attempt made by the police in this case to fabricate evidence in which they had failed. Giving benefit of doubt, the respondent was acquitted by the learned Magistrate.

It appears that the question whether the liquid found in the tubes was or was not liquor as deposed to by the police head constable Abubakar Lalbhai on the basis of the Hydrometer tests, has not been specifically decided by the learned Magistrate.

In support of this appeal it is contended that the evidence of the Police Inspector Pawar should have been accepted as the respondent was caught running away, keeping the bicycle there, after he was detected riding the bicycle. I do not see any compelling reason to differ from the finding of the learned Magistrate, who had an opportunity to see the witnesses in the witness-box, that it may be unsafe to convict the respondent on the sole testimony of the Police Inspector Pawar, in view of the circumstances of this case. But, in my opinion, there is a further infirmity in the prosecution evidence which goes to the root of the matter. There is no legal evidence, in my opinion, on which it could be held that the liquid, for the possession of which the respondent was charged-sheeted, is, in fact, established to be liquor or prohibited liquor by any legal evidence which can be accepted and acted upon. The testimony of Abubakar Lalbhai is brief and is to the following effect:—

"I have undergone training in testing liquor by the Syke's test. I have brought today a Hydrometer and a thermometer to test the contents of the two sealed rubber bladders now before the Court. (Note: The seals on the two bladders are intact and they are removed in the presence of the Court and the two accused and their pleader and the witness is [are] asked to examine their contents). After taking necessary tests I say that the liquid contained in each of the two rubber bladders is liquor containing 48.8 per cent. of alcohol and 51.2 per cent. of water."

Relying on this testimony, it is urged by the learned Assistant Government Pleader that the Syke's Hydrometer test has been accepted as a reliable test to come to the conclusion whether a liquid claimed to be liquor is in fact liquor or not and, in view of the decisions of this Court, the evidence of the witness should be accepted. The witness claims to have undergone training in testing liquor. But what is the nature of that training is not testified by the witness at all. In fact, he has given no information to qualify as an expert. Another serious infirmity in the testimony of this witness is that he has given no data from which he could come to the conclusion, even by applying the Hydrometer test, that the liquid was liquor. He has not stated what was the specific gravity of the liquid which he tested, nor the temperature, nor has he disclosed the principle with reference to which he came to the conclusion that the liquid should be liquor.

The learned counsel for the State relied upon the following decisions in support of his contention that the Hydrometer test should be accepted as a safe test to find whether a particular liquid is or is not liquor:—

State v. Pandu Natha Mandale,³ State v. Davji Mahadu Nadge,⁴ and State v. Pira Mhatarbā Jedgule.⁵

I have had the benefit of most of these judgments produced before me. State v. Shantaram Gangaram was an appeal against the order of the Sessions Judge acquitting an accused of an offence under s. 66(b) of the Bombay Prohibition Act, as the learned Sessions Judge took the view that the Hydrometer test has not been approved. The learned Sessions Judge in that case referred to some decision in this Court, but neither counsel appearing before the Division Bench were able to discover what that decision was. The learned Sessions Judge in the judgment under appeal had observed that there were many liquids which may have the same specific gravity as liquor and the Division Bench held that in coming to this conclusion the learned Sessions Judge had travelled beyond the record to which, according to the Division Bench, he should have confined himself; in other words, there was no evidence before the learned Sessions Judge in the judgment under appeal before this Division Bench to come to the conclusion that there could be many liquids which may have the same specific gravity as liquor. But I do not find, on a careful scrutiny of the judgments that the Division Bench have come to the conclusion that the Hydrometer test is a reliable test to find out whether a liquid contains alcohol or not.

In another Division Bench decision, on which reliance is placed, viz., State v. Pandu Natha, decided on August 12, 1957, which also was an appeal against the judgment of acquittal by the Sessions Judge, the Sessions Judge had observed in the course of his judgment that the Hydrometer test is a contrivance of determining the specific gravity, i.e., density of liquid and not for finding whether the liquid in fact contains any alcohol. It is observed:

"Now, from the body of the judgment it does not appear wherefrom the learned Judge got this conception of a Hydrometer. It is possible that he might have got it from the Smaller Oxford Dictionary. But then if we turn to Webster's New International Dictionary, it would appear that Hydrometer means a floating instrument for determining specific gravities, especially of liquids, and thence the strength of spirituous liquors, saline solutions, etc. It is, therefore, not right for the learned Judge to minimise the importance of a Hydrometer test by merely saying that a Hydrometer is an instrument for testing nothing but specific gravity. Upon the authority of Webster's Dictionary it would be clear that Hydrometer is an instrument for ascertaining the strength of spirituous liquors, saline solutions, etc., from a determination of the specific gravity of the said liquids...."

Here again it seems the Division Bench took the view that there was no material before the Sessions Judge to decide on sufficiency of Hydrometer test.

The other three decisions quoted above are Single Bench decisions which generally followed the view taken in State v. Shantaram Gangaram.

I felt some difficulty in accepting the evidence of the police head constable as evidence of an expert. It is not shown how he has qualified himself to be an expert in testing liquors. But even assuming that by his experience he may have attained some degree of knowledge, the reason he has given, viz., the test carried out by Hydrometer and thermometer to determine whether the liquid was liquor or not, is certainly far from satisfactory. If it is known or proved that a certain liquid is liquor or contains alcohol, then it is certainly possible, by means of Syke's Hydrometer test and by use of thermometer, to determine the percentage of alcohol from that liquid; but if the basic question that has first to be proved is whether the liquid under test does or does not contain alcohol, it does not appear that Hydrometer test alone could be sufficient to come to any conclusion. An opportunity was, therefore, given to the learned Assistant Government Pleader to call any expert in this subject who may have the necessary knowledge and experience in the matter of testing liquor or alcohol and liquids to find out whether Syke's Hydrometer test would furnish a necessary test for determining whether a liquid does or does not contain alcohol. Accordingly, the case was adjourned for recording the evidence of such an expert and was taken up to-day, when Shri Harbhajan Singh Mahal was examined by the State as an expert. Shri Mahal entered the witness-box and has given his opinion regarding the Syke's Hydrometer test and what can be determined by applying that test to a liquid. Shri Mahal is a Director of Forensic Science Laboratory and the Chemical Analyser to the Government of this State and, by his qualifications and experience, he seems to be a scientist of sufficiently wide knowledge and experience. He seems to have made special study of estimation of alcohol in blood and contributed Papers in well-known American periodicals. He was specifically asked about the Syke's Hydrometer test and what conclusions can be drawn from such test. What he has stated, in his own words, is as follows:—

"I know what is Syke's Hydrometer test. It is a test for determining the density of liquids. The test is made with the help of an instrument called Hydrometer. The instrument is allowed to be emersed in the liquid to be tested and is allowed to float. There are calibration marks on the stem of this instrument. These marks show the density of the particular liquid. When the Hydrometer is emersed in the liquid to be tested and the level of the liquid reaches a particular mark on the stem, it will mean that the liquid is of that particular density, calibrated at the place upto which the liquid reaches the stem. There is a standard chart or table by reference to which the reading on the calibrated stem can be interpreted to find out the density of that liquid. ... If I am given a liquid and asked to test or find out its specific gravity by Hydrometer test and it is found that the specific gravity is between 1.0 and 0.7 it would not be possible to conclude from this much data alone that the liquid contains ethyl alcohol. This would be so even if readings were obtained at different temperatures."

To Court questions the witness has stated that a fairly reliable method to find out whether a liquid is ethyl alcohol or contains ethyl alcohol is by subjecting it to a chemical test and this test is known as Iodoform test.

In view of this clear and unequivocal testimony of the expert witness, whose opinion one would always prefer to the opinion of Abubakar Lalbhai, who is a police head constable, claiming to have undergone training in testing liquor by the Syke's test, it is clear that the Syke's Hydrometer test will furnish no data to determine whether a particular liquid is liquor or contains alcohol. It may be that once it is known that a particular liquid contains alcohol, the percentage of alcohol in that liquid may be found by the Hydrometer test. But when the question to be determined is the primary question, namely, whether the liquid does or does not contain alcohol, the Hydrometer test does not appear to be the proper test to come to any such determination.

The learned counsel for the respondent has relied upon certain other Single Bench decisions of this Court in which similar view has been taken. These decisions are:

State v. Uttam Bala Gaikwad,⁶ State v. Bhagavan Daji Pawar,⁷ State v. Hanumanta Ramayya,⁸ and Ganga Piru Gaoli v. State.⁹ This last case is reported in (1962) Nagpur Law Journal as Note No. 26.

In view of the testimony of Dr. Mahal, who is the Director of Forensic Science Laboratory in this State, there is hardly any room for canvassing that the evidence of the police head constable as to the liquid being liquor could be accepted as legal or sufficient evidence to come to the conclusion that the liquid was liquor or prohibited liquor.

6 (1962) Criminal Appeal No. 1854 of 1962, decided by Shah J., on August 26, 1962 (Unrep.).

7 (1962) Criminal Appeal No. 36 of 1962, decided by Chitale J., on July 24, 1962 (Unrep.).

8 (1963) Criminal Appeal No. 57 of 1963, decided by Shah J., on July 12, 1963 (Unrep.).

9 (1961) Criminal Revision Application No. 97 of 1961, decided by Kotval J., on February 22, 1961 (Nagpur Bench) (Unrep.).

It is, however, urged that the circumstances in which the respondent was caught, the manner and the method of carrying the liquid which was out of the ordinary, viz., in rubber tubes, and the time of the night when the respondent was seen hurrying away with these contraband articles, are all circumstances which may well be taken into consideration in determining whether the liquid was not liquor. In my opinion, all these circumstances would raise a grave suspicion about the respondent, but none of these circumstances would be useful or reliable to determine whether the particular liquid which was carried was liquor or not. Though it is true that the usual modus operandi of transporting liquor clandestinely is found to be carrying it through rubber tubes, that fact alone can hardly be determinative of the crucial question, viz., whether the liquid is liquor or not. As opined by Dr. Mahal, the reliable test on which the Court of law can act would be the chemical test or the Iodoform test. Therefore, if the question is put in issue, the prosecution must prove beyond doubt that the liquid which was seized was liquor or prohibited liquor. In view of this conclusion, it is not possible to interfere with the finding of the learned Magistrate.

The result is the appeal fails and is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 11—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Sec. 29—High Court Act, 1861, Sec. 15—Government of India Acts, 1915 and 1935. Sec. 107(c) and Sec. 224(b)—Constitution of India, Art. 227(b)—Court summarily rejecting appeal under s. 29 of Rent Act—Whether Court must record reasons for rejecting appeal.

The Court hearing an appeal under s. 29 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, must follow the rule of practice framed by the High Court under Civil Circular 51 of 1890, and therefore, while summarily rejecting the appeal under O. XLI, r. 11, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, must give reasons in short for rejecting it.

The present application arises out of a suit filed by the petitioner against the respondent for eviction on three grounds—(1) arrears of rent for more than six months, (2) alterations in the premises without the permission of the landlord and (3) for non-payment of water charges. The case is governed by the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, to which we will refer as the Rent Act. The defendant-opponent resisted the eviction and one of his contentions was that the notice to quit was bad in law. The learned trial Judge dismissed the suit holding that the notice was bad in law. He also rejected the other contentions of the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed under s. 29 of the Act. The learned Judges rejected the appeal under O. XLI, r. 11, of the Civil Procedure Code summarily without assigning any reasons whatsoever for rejecting the appeal. This revisional application comes before us against this order.

It is very regrettable that a revisional application should take almost 5 years for being heard in such a petty matter. One only wonders at the patience of the litigants who must be seriously affected by the delays of litigation. The main ground urged by Mr. Valavalkar is that, the learned Judges while rejecting his appeal summarily do not give any reasons whatsoever for the same, which they were bound to give. On the other hand, it is contended for the opponent that it is not necessary for the Appellate Bench to give reasons while rejecting an appeal. The question is of some importance and, therefore, it was ordered to be heard by a Bench.

Order XLI, r. 11, which deals with the dismissal of appeals at the stage of admission, does not require that the Appellate Court should give reasons while dismissing an appeal summarily but then this High Court has under the High Court's Act framed circulars—Civil Circular 51 of 1890 by which a subordinate Court dismissing an appeal summarily is required to give reasons for the same. The Civil Procedure Code was recast thereafter by the present Code of 1908. This Court in *Hanmant v. Annaji Hanmanta*¹ held in a Full Bench decision that the effectiveness of that civil circular was not affected in any manner by the provisions of the present Code. That has been the law for the subordinate Courts and in *Sunderlal Manekchand Sheth v. H. H. the Maharaja Saheb of Morvi*² J. C. Shah J. held that the same law applies to the Small Causes Court at Bombay, dealing with an appeal under the Rent Act.

Under s. 31 of the Act the Court has to follow the prescribed procedure i.e. the procedure prescribed by the Act or the rules framed under it. Chapter IV of the rules deals with Small Cause Courts at Bombay and r. 9 prescribes that the Court in appeals shall follow as far as may be and with necessary modifications the practice and procedure prescribed for appeals by the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true that the Code itself does not contain any provisions requiring the Appellate Court to write reasons while rejecting an appeal. It is, therefore, argued that the Appellate Court is not required to give any reasons whatsoever for rejecting an appeal. This argument cannot be accepted. The Court under the Rent Act is a special Court different from the Small Causes Court as such and it is not governed by the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act and is subordinate to the High Court. The restrictions, therefore, regarding the applicability of Orders and Circulars of the High Court to Small Causes Court in Bombay do not apply to the Bench hearing appeals under the Rent Act. As a Court subordinate to the High Court it is bound by the circular issued by the High Court since it is not functioning as a Small Causes Court as any other subordinate Court. After Hanmant Rakhmaji's case the decision in *Tanaji Dagde v. Shankar Sakharam*³ cannot be regarded as good law.

It is then contended that the circular had been issued under the powers vested in the High Court under the High Courts Act, 1861, and since the said Act has been repealed by the Government of India Acts, 1915 and 1935, and the Constitution of 1950 which do not contain similar provisions, it cannot be regarded as good law. Section 15 of the High Courts Act defines the powers of the High Court in relation to the subordinate Courts and it provides amongst other things that the High Court shall have powers to make and issue general rules for regulating the practice and proceedings of such Courts and the rules so made shall be observed by the said Courts. Sections 107(c) and 224(b) of the Government of India Acts of 1915 and 1935 and art. 227(b) of the Constitution are in the term as above excepting the latter parts quoted above. That, however, cannot, in our view, make any difference since it could not have been intended that the High Court should make a rule in vain.

There is nothing inconsistent in O. XLI of the Civil Procedure Code which should render the rule invalid. The Court hearing appeals under s. 29 is bound to obey the rule of practice framed by the High Court.

It is contended on the authority of the decision in *Dayanand Pandurang v. Daji Narayan*⁴ that circulars issued by the High Court have not the same efficacy as rules framed under the rule making powers of the High Court under the Civil Procedure Code. It is, therefore, said that even if the circular is held to be applicable, the Court is not bound to follow it. There is no substance in this contention. The ratio of the case cannot apply to all circulars merely because they are included in the Civil Manual. Fawcett J. makes it clear that “unless it is passed under some enactment, which gives it the force of law. Obviously the mere fact that a circular is issued under the authority of the High Court is not sufficient to give it that force.”

Circular 95 which is reproduced in r. 410 of the Circulars was issued by the High Court under the High Courts Act, 1861, which power still continues in the High Courts and is, therefore, binding on the subordinate Courts. A reference was made to the decision of Chagla C.J. in *Hussain Sab v. Vighneshwar*⁵ in this connection. The learned Chief Justice was considering the question as to the Court to which an application for amendment of a decree is to be made in a case where an appeal is dismissed summarily, under O. XLI, r. 11. That has nothing to do with the manner in which an appeal should be summarily dismissed.

Apart from this, matters which arise under the Rent Act are very important and often involve large claims and important rights. Even if no appeal lies under the Act to the High Court, it has got revisional jurisdiction in such matters. If no reasons are assigned for dismissal the High Court is not in a position to ascertain how the Court has dealt with the matter. The Court being without assistance from the judgment of the subordinate Court has to waste much time in investigating the matter which can hardly be justified. In order that the appeal Court should assist the High Court, it ought to record its reasons in short even when it dismisses the appeal summarily.

The effect of not requiring to give reasons can be appreciated in a case like the present. The trial Court held that the notice was bad on the ground that it was only by the notice that the permitted increases were demanded by the landlord. In the view of the trial Court, before a notice is given there must be an earlier intimation of the increase in the standard rent, which apparently is not warranted by the Rent Act. Certainly the question is a very important question and unless the Appellate Court gave its reasons why it agreed with the trial Court, the High Court would not be in a position to know how the appeal was disposed of. We may also incidentally point out that in *Rajpati Sudama v. Taj Mohamed*⁶ this Court disagreed with the Small Causes Court and held after considering the relevant provisions of the Rent Act that it is not necessary to give intimation of the permitted increases and the fact that the landlord would be charging the permitted increases before sending a formal notice or before the filing of a suit.

We, therefore, set aside the order of the Appellate Bench and direct that it will rehear the appeal and dispose of it in accordance with law.

Costs costs in the cause.

Order set aside.

AMICHAND VALANJI v. G. B. KOTAK.*

Defence of India Rules, 1962 [Part XIIA. Gold Control], Rules 126A-126Z—Defence of India Act (51 of 1962), Secs. 3, 44—Constitution of India, Arts. 25, 26—Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), Sec. 123(2)—Rules 126A-126Z whether ultra vires rule making power of Central Government—Relation inter se between s. 3(1) and 3(2) of Defence of India Act—Connection between rules framed and purposes prescribed under parent Act, nature of—Expression “authority” in s. 44 whether includes Central Government—Construction of statute—Circumstances in which enactment passed whether could be considered by Court.

Rules 126A to 126Z of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, are not ultra vires the rule making power of the Central Government and are not a colourable piece of legislation in the sense that they have been framed for some purpose other than the prescribed purposes in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962.

Per Tambe J. No additional or independent rule making authority or power is conferred on the Central Government in any of the clauses of s. 3(2) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. Therefore, the limitation imposed in s. 3(1) of the Act will be equally applicable and govern the rule making power of the Central Government relating to the subjects mentioned in clauses 1 to 57 of s. 3(2) of the Act. The power of the Central Government to make rules on any of those subjects is exercisable only for securing the purposes authorised by s. 3(1), in the event the Central Government forms an opinion that it was necessary or expedient for it to do so.

King-Emperor v. Sibnath Banerji,¹ Santosh Kumar Jain v. The State,² *Attorney-General for Canada v. Hallet & Carey Ltd.*³ and Makhan Singh v. State of Punjab,⁴ referred to.

The connection that is required to be established between the rules framed and the purposes prescribed under s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962, must be one which is real and not far-fetched, problematical, hypothetical or too remote. It need not necessarily be proximate. Therefore, rules which would, if observed, serve to promote one or more of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Act will be within the rule making power conferred on the Central Government thereunder.

When validity of an act, rule, regulation or order made by an executive authority, to which the power has been delegated by the legislation, is challenged, then, it is open to the Court to see whether the act done by the delegated authority has any connection with securing or realization of the purposes for which the power has been conferred on the delegated authority.

In considering the degree or nature of such connection required to be established the tests laid down by the Federal Court† and the Supreme Court†† that the connection must be “real and proximate and not far-fetched or problematical” and by the Privy Council‡ that the connection should be “capable of being related to the authorised purposes”, are not of general application. The tests laid down are in the context of the contents of the relevant legislative power which their Lordships were considering in each case.

The circumstances in which an enactment has been passed is a relevant circumstance from which assistance could be sought by Court. Therefore, it is permissible for the Court to ascertain the conditions prevailing which caused the mischief to cure which the enactment was directed.

Pukhraj v. D. R. Kohli,¹² *Chiranjitlal Chowdhuri v. Union of India*¹³ and A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkitachalam Potti,¹⁴ referred to.

The expression "authority" in s. 44 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, does not include the Central Government, nor does s. 44 impose any fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government, but is directive relating to administrative or executive acts performed by any person or authority in execution of the powers delegated to them by the Central Government.

*Tan Bug Taim v. Collector of Bombay*¹⁵ and *Lahore E. S. Co. v. Punjab Province*¹⁶ referred to.

Per Naik J. There is no conflict between sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. The clauses listed in s. 3(2) are mere elaboration of what is stated in a general way in s. 3(1). These clauses make explicit what is implicit in s. 3(1). The clauses are 'statutory definitions' and would stand by themselves, unless there is any ambiguity about any of them.

There are two rival tests, one for testing the validity of a legislation passed by a Legislature whose powers have been defined and limited under the Constitution as also a legislation which makes an encroachment or an invasion upon the fundamental rights of the citizens. In judging the validity of a legislation which encroaches upon the legislative functions of another legislative body or which invades upon the fundamental rights of the citizens, the test which must be followed is the test of direct, proximate and intimate nexus between the exercise of the powers and the authority conferred upon the Legislature. In a matter of this nature, the Court is the sole judge to decide as to whether the powers have been exceeded. Another, in the case of a delegated legislation where there is no inherent lack of jurisdiction in the parent body which delegates the power and where the delegate has been given wide discretion in choosing the topic. In the latter case, the test that will have to be invoked is whether the exercise of the legislative authority is wholly unrelated to the purpose or is not capable of being connected to the purposes for which it is meant to be exercised.

The principle that should be applied in testing the validity of the Rules framed on the authority of a section which is as widely worded as s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, is the principle enunciated by the Privy Council in Attorney General for Canada's case (1952 A.C. 427). When wide powers have been conferred upon the Central Government and when the Central Government has been given the right to choose the topic in respect of which legislation is to be framed, the principle that would hold good would be the principle whether the Rules framed are capable of being connected with the purposes for which they are intended. It is not the direct, proximate and intimate connection that should be insisted upon, but some connection which would correlate the Rules with the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) or with the matters enumerated in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. Therefore, the Court can set aside the Rules if on the face of them, the Rules appear to be wholly unrelated or if it is found on examination that they are not capable of being related to any of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Act.

TAMBE J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution of India, wherein the vires of the Gold Control Rules, contained in Part XIIA of the Defence of India Rules, have been challenged. In the prayer clause of the petition, no doubt, validity of the entire rules were not challenged, but only some of them were mentioned. But the arguments advanced before us were in respect of rules in general. It would not, therefore, be necessary to consider each rule separately.

The two petitioners before us are dealers in gold. They profess and practise Jain religion. The two petitioners carry on the business in the name and style of "Messrs. Chandkumar Amichand & Co.". The principal business of the petitioners is in bullion. They buy and sell gold in course of their business. In their petition, they say that the business carried on by them is on a vast scale. Eleven persons are employed by them in the firm and the annual salary paid by the firm to their employees amounts to Rs. 20,000. The firm is also a registered dealer for the purposes of the sales-tax, and the petitioners claim that the sales-tax paid by them in S.Y. 2018 amounted to Rs. 2,56,395.72 nP.

The challenge made by the petitioners is in substance now confined to two grounds. Firstly, it is contended that the rules made are in excess of the rule making power of the Central Government, and, secondly, that, at any rate, the rules contravene the fundamental rights conferred on the petitioners under arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution of India. The other contentions which have been raised by the petitioners in the petition were not argued before us. But Mr. Mehta, learned counsel for the petitioners, stated before us that he did not advance any arguments on those contentions, because the matter stood concluded by the recent decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Makham Singh v. State of Punjab.¹ Mr. Mehta, however, stated that the petitioners may raise these contentions in the Supreme Court if so advised.

To appreciate the contentions raised before us, it would be necessary to refer to the incidents relating to the promulgation of these impugned rules. It is common knowledge that on September 8, 1962, Chinese troops crossed the Indian border. By October 20, 1962, the aggression by China on the Indian borders was on a large scale. On October 26, 1962, the President of India, in exercise of the powers conferred on him by art. 352 of the Constitution, declared that a grave emergency exists, whereby the security of India is threatened by external aggression. By reason of this proclamation, the provisions of art. 358 of the Constitution immediately came into play. That article provides that while a proclamation of emergency is in operation, nothing in art. 19 shall restrict the power of the State as defined in Part III to make any law or to take any executive action which the State would but for the provisions contained in that Part be competent to make or to take, but any law so made shall, to the extent of the incompetency, cease to have effect as soon as the proclamation ceases to operate, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the law so ceases to have effect. The declaration of emergency further under art. 359 empowered the President "to declare that the right to move any court for the enforcement of such of the rights conferred by Part III as may be mentioned in the order and all proceedings pending in any court for the enforcement of the rights so mentioned shall remain suspended for the period during which the Proclamation is in force or for such shorter period as may be specified in the order."

It is also necessary to notice two other articles, and they are arts. 250 and 353(b). Article 250 provides:

"250. (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Chapter, Parliament shall, while a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, have power to make laws for the whole or any part of the territory of India with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the State List.

(2) A law made by Parliament which Parliament would not but for the issue of a Proclamation of Emergency have been competent to make shall, to the extent of the incompetency, cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the Proclamation has ceased to operate, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period."

Article 353, cl. (b) provides that

"while a proclamation of emergency is in operation, then—the power of Parliament to make laws with respect to any matter shall include power to make laws conferring powers and imposing duties, or authorising the conferring of powers and the imposition of duties, upon the Union or officers and authorities of the Union as respects that matter, notwithstanding that it is one which is not enumerated in the Union List."

We have already stated that the emergency was proclaimed by the President on October 26, 1962. On the same day, in exercise of the powers under art. 123, the President promulgated an Ordinance, styled as "The Defence of India Ordinance". It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to refer to the provisions of the Defence India Ordinance, for it is not in dispute that the provisions of the Defence of India Ordinance have now been incorporated in the Defence of India Act, 1962. On November 3, 1962, the President, in exercise of powers conferred on him by cl. (1) of art. 359 of the Constitution, by a Gazette Notification, declared that

"the right of any person to move any Court for the enforcement of the rights conferred by Article 21 and Article 22 of the Constitution shall remain suspended for the period during which the Proclamation of Emergency issued under clause (1) of Article 352 thereof on the 26th October 1962, is in force, if such person has been deprived of any such rights under the Defence of India Ordinance, 1962 (4 of 1962) or any rule or order made thereunder."

By a further proclamation, art. 14 also was added to this notification. The combined effect of all the aforesaid provisions was that the Parliament gained authority to legislate on subjects contained in Lists I, II and III, as it deemed proper during the emergency. The fetter on the legislative power of Parliament contained in art. 19 was removed. Further, if the fundamental rights of a citizen under arts. 14, 21 and 22 were contravened by any rule or order made by the Central Government under the Defence of India Ordinance or Act, recourse to Court for enforcement of those fundamental rights was barred during the period of emergency. The Defence of India Act enacted by Parliament came into force on December 12, 1962. The preamble of the Defence of India Act (hereinafter called "the Act") declares that it is "An Act to provide for special measures to ensure the public safety and interest, the defence of India and civil defence and for the trial of certain offences and for matters connected therewith."

The preamble then refers to the external aggression and the declaration of emergency by the President, and thereafter, it is therein stated:

"AND WHEREAS it is necessary to provide for special measures to ensure the public safety and interest, the defence of India and civil defence and for the trial of certain offences and for matters connected therewith;

BE it, therefore, enacted by Parliament in the Thirteenth Year of the Republic of India as follows:"

Sub-section (3) of s. 1 provides that the Act

"shall remain in force during the period of operation of the Proclamation of Emergency issued on the 26th October 1962, and for a period of six months thereafter."

The clauses of sub-s. (3) provided for saving of certain things, with which we are not here concerned. Section 2 contains definitions of certain expressions. The expression "defence of India" has not been defined in s. 2, though "civil defence" has been defined. Section 3 confers power on the Central Government to make rules, and the Gold Control Rules have been framed by the Central Government in exercise of its powers under s. 3 of the Act. The Central Government promulgated the Defence of India Rules on November

5, 1962. However, there were no rules controlling or regulating dealings in gold by these rules. By a further amendment to the Defence of India Rules, Gold Control Rules were introduced in the Defence of India Rules, as Part XIIA of the Defence of India Rules. They came into force on January 10, 1963. The preamble of these rules reads:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by section 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962 (51 of 1962), the Central Government hereby makes the following further amendment in the Defence of India Rules, 1962, namely:—"

And the short title reads: "These rules may be called the Defence of India (Amendment) Rules, 1963." The heading of Part XIIA of the Defence of India Rules is "Gold Control". It consists of rules 126A to 126Z, and these rules are generally called and known as "Gold Control Rules", and I would hereafter also refer to these Rules as the Gold Control Rules. The Rules initially framed on January 10, 1963, were further amended by two amendments to the Defence of India Rules—(1) by the 7th amendment which came into force on June 24, 1963, and (2) by the 9th amendment which came into force on September 23, 1963. It would be sufficient for the purposes of this case to refer to the provisions of the Gold Control Rules as they stand after both these amendments. It may also be stated that for the purpose of administration of these Gold Control Rules, initially an All India Board called "Gold Board" was constituted. At the time of the hearing of this petition, however, by reason of the amendment of the Gold Control Rules, the administration of Gold Control is not in the hands of the "Gold Board", but is in the hands of the Administrator, respondents Nos. 1 to 4 to this petition are members of Gold Board. No order can be passed against the Gold Board. The other two respondents are—the Collector of Central Excise, Bombay, and the Union of India.

Rule 126A is an interpretation clause. A dealer has been defined in sub-cl. (c) as "any person who carries on, directly or otherwise, the business of—

(i) making, manufacturing, buying, selling, melting, processing or converting gold for the purpose of making or manufacturing ornaments,

(ii) buying, selling, supplying, distributing, melting, processing or converting gold for the purpose of making or manufacturing ornaments, whether for cash or for deferred payment, or for commission, remuneration or other valuable consideration."

There is inclusive clause including an undivided Hindu family, which carries on business, company, society etc., but it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to refer to these various clauses. Clause (d) defines gold:

"'gold' means gold, including its alloy, whether virgin, melted, remelted, wrought or unwrought, in any shape or form, of a purity of not less than nine carats and includes any gold coin (whether legal tender or not), any ornament and any other article of gold."

Clause (f) defines ornament:

"'ornament' means any article in a finished form, meant for personal adornment or for the adornment of any idol, deity or any other object of religious worship, made of, or manufactured from, gold, whether or not set with stones or gems, real or artificial, or with pearls, real, cultured or imitation or with all or any of them and includes parts, pendants or broken pieces of ornaments;"

Clause (g) defines

"'primary gold' as gold in any unfinished form and includes all ingots, bars, blocks, slabs, billets, shots, pellets, rods and wires."

Clause (h) defines a "refiner" as the owner or occupier of a refinery; and cl. (i) defines a "refinery" as a place where gold is melted, processed, converted or refined. Part XII-A has been sub-divided into six chapters. The first chapter, containing rules 126B, 126C and 126D relate to control of business in gold, and these provisions are most important provisions for the purposes of this petition. Chapter 3 deals with licensing of dealers and refiners. Chapter 4 relates to returns and accounts. Chapter IV-A which has been amended by the amendment effected in September, 1963, has made certain concessions in favour of petty goldsmiths, called certified goldsmiths. Chapter V relates to declaration of gold by individuals; and Chapter VI is a miscellaneous chapter. In my opinion, it is not necessary to refer in detail to the provisions of these various rules in the six chapters, but it would be sufficient to state the combined effect of these rules, so far as it is material for the purposes of this case. The business of gold has been controlled by these rules, principally by prohibiting manufacture of articles of gold other than ornaments, by placing certain restrictions on making of ornaments, by imposing certain restrictions and prohibition in the matter of grant of loan by the bankers or the money-lenders on hypothecation of gold, and by requiring the dealers, refiners, money-lenders and persons other than the dealers or refiners, in other words, a common man, to submit certain returns periodically in certain forms. The provisions of these rules thus affect dealers, refiners, money-lenders as well as a common man. Now, the term "dealer" would include persons dealing in gold as well as persons dealing in ornaments, and also include persons who are doing the business of goldsmith. I would now proceed to summarise how these rules affect these different categories of persons.

Dealer: We first proceed with the category of a "Dealer". He cannot make or manufacture any article of gold except ornaments; but after June 24, 1963, a dealer is allowed to make articles other than ornaments, on obtaining authorization in this respect from the Administrator. He cannot accept any ornament of a purity exceeding 14 carats for polishing or repair. No dealer can make or manufacture any article of gold of a purity exceeding 14 carats. He cannot manufacture, prepare, sell or otherwise transfer, agree to sell or agree to transfer or expose or offer to sell or offer to transfer any ornament having gold of a purity exceeding 14 carats. It may, however, be stated that one month's period from the commencement of these rules was allowed to the dealers for disposal of stock of gold ornaments which was already in their possession. A dealer was required to convert the primary gold already in his possession prior to the coming into force of these rules into gold of a purity of 14 carats. He is also similarly required to convert within a week gold that might be subsequently coming into his possession. A dealer cannot carry on the business of money-lending on the same premises in which he is carrying on the business of a dealer. He cannot sell or otherwise transfer to any person any gold on hypothecation, pledging, mortgage or charge on which he has advanced any loan irrespective of the fact whether the loan was advanced before or after the commencement of the order. This additional condition has been imposed by the amendment which came into effect on June 24, 1963. He cannot deliver back the gold to the borrower even where the loan has been repaid by him, much less before, without the permission of the Administrator. A dealer, who has been registered under the Sales Tax Act, cannot any more carry on business except on obtaining the license from the Administrator. Such a dealer is required to make an application for a license. If a dealer, who is required to make an application for a license, fails to apply, or whose application has been rejected or cancelled, has to sell or otherwise transfer all the gold in his possession to another dealer or refiner licensed under the Act within the given time. A dealer who is required to make an application for license or to whom a license has been granted, has to file periodically returns relating to gold in his possession, stating therein the quantity of gold in his possession, description of gold in his possession or under his control, and to give such further particulars as may be prescribed from time to time. In the periodical returns, which he is required to submit, he has to show the additional gold coming into his possession after he has last made his return. A dealer cannot acquire or agree to acquire or buy gold, other than ornaments or declared gold, from any person other than licensed dealer or refiner. He cannot sell gold, other than ornaments to any person, other than a person holding a permit, or a licensed dealer or refiner.

Refiner: A refiner cannot make or manufacture any article of gold other than primary gold. However, after June 24, 1963, he is allowed to make or manufacture articles other than ornaments of any purity on obtaining authorization in that respect from the Administrator. A refiner was required to convert gold in his possession of a purity exceeding 14 carats into gold of purity not exceeding 14 carats within a week of the date, or such further period as may be allowed from the date, the rules came into force. Similarly, he is required to convert the primary gold acquired by him subsequently into gold of purity not exceeding 14 carats. The Administrator, however, could authorise a refiner to keep in his custody or control any primary gold exceeding 14 carats. The primary gold manufactured or sold by a refiner after the date the rules came into force is required to be stamped by a stamp approved by the Administrator giving certain prescribed particulars including the date of manufacture, its purity and identity of the maker or manufacturer. By a subsequent notification issued on May 1, 1964, however, this rule has been relaxed and exemption has been granted in respect of articles such as foils, leaves and wires. But these articles are required to be labelled for the purposes of identification with reference to purity, date of make or manufacture, maker or manufacturer. A refiner is required to obtain a license from the Administrator in order to enable him to continue the business of a refiner. He has to make periodical returns of the gold in his possession or under his control, giving certain details as prescribed including the quantity and description thereof. He has to maintain account-books in the prescribed forms. He cannot sell or deliver gold to any person other than a dealer or a person holding a permit from the Administrator.

Common man: As regards a common man, which includes a minor, a lunatic, deity, trusts, Court of Wards, Receiver, Official Assignee, a Hindu undivided family, company, firm, wakf, institution, and an individual, he cannot place any order with any dealer, whether licensed or not, for making, manufacturing or preparation of ornaments having gold of a purity exceeding 14 carats. He has within 30 days of the date on which the rules came into force, to declare gold other than ornaments in his possession, in excess of 20 grams in the case of a minor, and 50 grams in the case of any other person. He cannot buy or otherwise acquire gold not being ornament except on succession, testamentary or otherwise, or on obtaining a permit from the Administrator. Gold so acquired has to be declared by a further declaration. Gold acquired on a permit cannot be sold without a permit. Gold not required to be declared cannot be sold without a permit. It may, however, be stated that after certain concessions having been granted to certified goldsmiths, it is possible for the common man to convert his old ornaments into new ornaments not exceeding that purity.

Concessions granted to Certified Goldsmiths: This is a concession granted to petty dealers who were not registered for the purposes of Sales Tax, and who were carrying on business of goldsmith since before the coming into force of the Gold Control Rules, on obtaining a certificate from the Administrator. They are allowed to do certain kind of business. They can accept from any person other than a dealer or a refiner, any ornament or ornaments of a purity in excess of 14 carats for the purpose of making or manufacturing new ornaments subject to the restriction that the gold contained in the new ornaments does not exceed purity and total quantity of gold contained in the ornaments accepted. He can also make or manufacture primary gold of purity exceeding 14 carats by melting or procuring or converting any ornaments subject to the restriction that he cannot have at any time primary gold in excess of 100 gms. On cancellation of his certificate, he has to sell or transfer gold to a dealer or a refiner.

These in brief are the restrictions and prohibitions imposed by the Gold Control Rules on dealers, refiners, money-lenders and other persons. It is hardly necessary to state that the effects of the Gold Control Rules are far-reaching and largely affecting these persons. The effect in short is that business in gold exceeding purity more than 14 carats has been brought practically to a standstill. It is only open to convert old ornaments into new ornaments of a purity exceeding 14 carats. The other effect is that persons in possession of gold other than ornaments, over certain very small quantity, have to declare gold in their possession; and thirdly, from the periodical returns which are required to be furnished by persons falling in the aforesaid categories, the Administrator is able to exercise control over the business of gold. It is these provisions which have been challenged before me by the petitioner who is a dealer in gold.

I have already stated the two principal contentions which have been raised on behalf of the petitioner. The arguments advanced by Mr. Mehta, learned counsel for the petitioner, in short, is that s. 3 of the Act authorises the Central Government to make rules for certain purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. The rules framed have no intimate, real or proximate connection with any of those purposes. On the other hand, the rules have been framed for the purposes of bringing about a socio-economic reform with a view to changing the age-long habits of the people of India, a purpose entirely outside the scope of sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. In other words, the argument of Mr. Mehta is that the rules framed are not within the competence of the Central Government inasmuch as they are in excess of the rule making power contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, and is a colourable piece of legislation. According to Mr. Mehta, there are on the statute book various enactments relating to the control or smuggling of gold and foreign exchange in India. If really the Government wanted to control smuggling, they could easily have achieved this purpose by suitably amending those enactments; but in framing these rules, the Government has not really the motive of controlling the smuggling of gold, but, on the other hand, has the motive of effecting a socio-economic reform, with a view to make people change their habits. The other aspect of the argument of Mr. Mehta is that the rules violate the provisions of s. 44 of the Act, inasmuch as they excessively and unnecessarily interfere with the ordinary avocations of life and the enjoyment of property of persons. The other contention is violation of arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution.

Mr. Bhabha, learned counsel for the respondents, on the other hand, argues that in construing the rules, the Court has to approach keeping in view that these rules have been placed before the Parliament as required by s. 41 of the Act. The Parliament has not thought it necessary either to modify or annul these rules. The fetter imposed on the legislative power by art. 19 stands suspended by virtue of the provisions of art. 358 of the Constitution. Enforcement of fundamental rights under arts. 14, 21 and 22 have been barred. The entire legislative power rests with the Parliament by reason of the provisions of arts. 250 and 353(b) of the Constitution. The power to make rules is not confined to sub-s. (1) of s. 3. On the other hand, the Legislature in enacting sub-s. (2) of s. 3 has declared its intention that rules made under any one or more of the clauses of sub-s. (2) would necessarily be for securing any one or more of the purposes of the Act. Therefore, where it is shown that the rules fall under any one or more of the clauses of sub-s. (2), it is no more necessary for the respondents to establish any nexus or real or proximate connection between the rules framed and the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1). Such rules can be struck down only if it is shown by the person challenging the rules that they are totally incapable of being related to or not germane to the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. According to Mr. Bhabha, the rules fall under cls. 23 and 33 of sub-s. (2) of s. 3. In the alternative, Mr. Bhabha contends that there is a real and proximate connection between the rules framed and the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. The object of these rules is to arrest smuggling, and thereby to improve the position of the Government relating to foreign exchange. This object has a direct and proximate connection with the "defence of India" and also for maintaining the civil services essential to the life of the community. According to Mr. Bhabha, these rules serve the purpose of conservation of foreign exchange. It was also the argument of Mr. Bhabha that the expression "defence of India" is a term of wide amplitude, and would include even an economic measure found necessary by the Government to secure the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. There is a presumption in favour of validity of exercise of the power and the burden lies heavily on the person challenging its validity. Section 44 of the Act imposes no restrictions on the rule making power of the Central Government. As regards the argument of Mr. Mehta that the Government could have achieved the object by suitably amending other enactments, Mr. Bhabha contends that it is not open to this Court to make any inquiry as to the necessity of making these rules or consider the question whether the Central Government could have achieved the object by doing something else. The powers conferred on the Central Government under s. 3 are of very wide amplitude, and the matter has been left to the discretion of the Central Government entirely. As regards the challenge under art. 25 and art. 26 of the Constitution, Mr. Bhabha contends that the respondents by their return have denied the allegations of facts made in the petition. The decision of this question thus involves the decision of disputed questions of fact, and, therefore, could not be gone into in this petition. If at all the Court feels inclined to go into these questions, the matter be remanded to the trial Court for recording evidence on this matter. We should have stated earlier that this petition has been filed on the Original Side of the High Court and has been referred to us.

The first question that arises is the construction of s. 3 of the Act. Material part of s. 3 reads:

"The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, make such rules as appear to it necessary or expedient for securing the defence of India and civil defence, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient conduct of military operations, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1), the rules may provide for, and may empower any authority to make orders providing for, all or any of the following matters, namely:—...

(23) the control of trade or industry for the purpose of regulating or increasing the supply of, and the obtaining of information with regard to articles or things of any description whatsoever which may be used in connection with the conduct of military operations or civil defence or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community;...

(33) controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in, coin, bullion, bank notes, currency notes, securities or foreign exchange;"

Turning to sub-s. (1) of s. 3, it authorises the Central Government to make rules for securing the following purposes:

- (1) the defence of India;
- (2) civil defence;
- (3) public safety;
- (4) maintenance of public order;
- (5) efficient conduct of military operations; and
- (6) maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

For securing these purposes, the Central Government is empowered to "make such rules as appear to it necessary or expedient". It would thus be seen that the power conferred by sub-s. (1) of s. 3 is conditioned by two circumstances: The first is that the power can be exercised only for securing one or more of the authorised purposes, and the other is that the Central Government on application of its mind may find or it may appear to the Central Government necessary or expedient to exercise it for securing the prescribed purpose. This is obviously so because the rules and regulations made in times of emergency entrench on the rights and liberties of persons, and it is, therefore, that the Parliament requires the Central Government to apply its mind and consider whether it is necessary in the circumstances of the case to make such rules. It follows that merely because the rules relate to the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3, by itself is not sufficient to sustain the rules. It has further to be established that not only that the rules secure the authorised purposes, but it has appeared to the Central Government that it is necessary or expedient to make those rules. Similarly, it is not sufficient to show that it appeared to the Central Government that it is necessary or expedient to make those rules, but the rules must be for securing any of the authorised purposes. In other words, there must be a connection between the rules framed and the authorised purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. To the extent or nature of the connection, we will advert later.

In my view, it is a well-settled principle that when a particular legislation is impugned, the Court has to see whether the Legislature has acted within its powers, and the second thing it has to see is whether in exercising its powers it has not transgressed any of the limits imposed on it by the Constitution in Part III of the Constitution. In other words, the Court has to see whether in enacting a particular legislation the Legislature has not violated any of the fundamental rights of the citizen. These principles, in my opinion, would equally apply when the Court is called upon to consider the validity or otherwise of a delegated legislation, or a legislation made by an authority to which the Legislature had delegated powers. I have already referred to removal of certain fetters imposed on the Legislature by Part III of the Constitution, by reason of the declaration of emergency and the orders made by the President suspending the enforcement of fundamental rights in arts. 14, 21 and 22. In fact, it has not been canvassed before us that the rules contravene any of the articles other than arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution. I have, therefore, first to consider whether the rules made fall within the rule making power of the Central Government. The ambit and extent of the power of the Central Government under sub-s. (1) I have already stated. The question which next arises is whether sub-ss. (2) and (3) confer any additional power on the Central Government to make rules. It is the contention of Mr. Bhabha that sub-s. (2) of s. 3 confers additional independent power. I find it difficult to sustain this argument of Mr. Bhabha so broadly made. It may be noticed that the word "rules" in sub-s. (2) is preceded by the prefix "the". The prefix particularises the rules, and when sub-s. (2) is read in the context of sub-s. (1), it appears to me that the rules mentioned in sub-s. (2) are the rules which are referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. The rule making power conferred by sub-s. (2), therefore, is subject to the same limitations as are imposed by sub-s. (1) of s. 3. To hold otherwise would amount to conferral of uncanalised control and power on the Central Government. Could it be said that the rules falling under any of the clauses of sub-s. (2) are valid rules even though they have no relation whatsoever with any of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act? I would illustrate: Clause (6) of sub-s. (2) empowers the Central Government to make rules "regulating the publication of news and information". Is it open to the Government to require the newspapers to publish certain news which have no connection whatsoever with any of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1), for instance, the births and marriages at the place of a Government servant? When I put the question to Mr. Bhabha in this form, Mr. Bhabha replied that this entry being ambiguous, it may be open to the Court to investigate the matter further. But it had been the
